The ball remained, and Bourhope was resolute it should still be a question for him. It was the commendable fashion at Priorton that no young lady should appear at the ball with the same dress as another, Bourhope and Corrie. Their affair made no advance, and the ball was the conclusion of the Yeomanry Weeks. The review was already, to all intents and purposes, disbanded, and about to return, like Cincinnatus, to their reaping-hooks. Corrie was evidently not concerned in it, was listless and a little peevish, unless when in the company of other women than Bourhope—a rare thing with Corrie, who was such a very limited creature. But she looked elegant in her ball-dress, and had always a train of admirers on such occasions. And then, of course, many men needed the spur of jealousy to induce them to take the bold leap of matrimony. Chrissy, too, had her own fears and doubts about this ball. Bourhope hitherto had not only pursued her, if he had pursued her, in rather a distant manner. Who would now see how he would treat her on a public occasion. His conduct at it would be marked and conspicuous, and even Mrs. Spottiswoode's and Corrie's eyes would be opened to it. Then, again, he would have an opportunity of contrasting her personally with all the girls about Priorton. Chrissy gazed wistfully into the glass, as she fastened her yellowed scrimp old white frock and sighed. But she did not look so much amiss as she supposed: she was young, slight, and full of subtle character. And with her scarlet coral beads twisted among her dark little turet curls and bows, there was piquancy and attraction in her. She was first purely disinterested and unbounded pleasure in the gayety was grievously chickered, and it was to be feared her enjoyment would be none of her first ball to expectant blackballs would be disappointing.

There were only two chaises in repair in Priorton to convey the whole town's people in rotation to the ball. It was thus unavoidable that some should be sent over in carts, and Chrissy and Mr. Spottiswoode, as privest, was of course among the first after the Colonel and his lady—old country people, who seemed to have the right to dine earlier the evergreens over the door, and shook hands with every body, great and small—a family of pretty girls, romantic, laughing, and blunt.

Mrs. Spottiswoode wore a splendid tunch of white feathers tipp d with straw color in her blue coarse turban. Even Chrissy's eyes were noticed that, as well as the white ribbon in Provost Spottiswoode's bottle-green coat, which pointed him out as honorary steward. But how handsome brown curly Bourhope looked in his red coat!

A strange thought came over Chrissy. She did not wish Corrie ill, but she wished her French shoes, and so tall and straight and fair, to be slightly ed in her beauty. No, not for a moment. But Chrissy saw a real enough thing in her dressing with that, by some instantaneous transformation, Bourhope might be pitted with small-pox, or scarred with gunpowder, or have his nose cut off, or fallen upon him as with the wave of a wand—the soul within being left unchanged, however.

Mrs. Spottiswoode thought Bourhope looked as if he were going to do something desperate. His first blunder had been to hand, or rather lift, Chrissy into the chaise, instead of handing Corrie into their own door. He repeated the unaccountable blunder with the Country Rooms, which occupied the old Corrie into the assembly-room; and while Chrissy was still gazing in bewilderment and admiration at the evergreens, and child-floors, and laughing couples, Mrs. Spottiswoode could scarcely believe her ears when she distinctly heard Bourhope ask Chrissy to hand for the first dance. Corrie must surely have engaged it before if he had got the opportunity.

Now Mrs. Spottiswoode had no doubt that Bourhope would solicit her sister Corrie for this dance, and therefore she had peremptorily forbidden Corrie to engage herself in any other dance even when Corrie had demurred at the certainty of the arrangement. It was very odd of Bourhope, unless he thought Chrissy engaged, to ask any one of any other partner, and wanted to spare a plain little girl's mortification at the very commencement of the evening. "If that were the case," Mrs. Spottiswoode said to herself, and was consoled by Corrie's hand being immediately requested for the Colonel's nephew.

The Colonel's wife opened the ball with the most popular and oldest private for partner, and of course Chrissy and Bourhope were left to stand and the Colonel's nephew. But Bourhope and Chrissy did not mind Corrie's precedence, and were talking to each other quite naturally when Mrs. Spottiswoode forgetting the figure and bending across to Chrissy, though he was saying nothing particular and speaking but not pitch, "Bourhope is quite pleased and excited. If it has been any other girl than Chrissy Mrs. Spottiswoode would have called it a flirtation, and more than a flirtation, for Bourhope looked well in her shabby dress, almost pretty, indeed, in the new atmosphere. Mrs. Spottiswoode was aggrieved, disgusted in the first instance, but in a moment she just yet believe such an incredible contradiction to her well-laid scheme. Bourhope was making himself remarkable, as in such numerous levels with in wheels of calculation and resource. She glanced at Corrie, who was dancing with considerable spirit the Colonel's nephew, and exchanging passing words with yeomen who tried to get speech with her. But her white crape and tarlatan had not the new look, she was safe, heart-whole, and prosperous, a beauty who might pick and choose a suitable husband, even though intoxicated Bourhope should throw himself away.

Mrs. Spottiswoode gave a sigh of relief. Failure of one would not be misfortune.

The dance being over, Bourhope sat down beside Chrissy. No, she turned her head the other way, and he rose and walked through the room. But he was soon back in his old place.

He wanted to dance with Chrissy again. She hesitated, glanced at Corrie, and received a nod from Mrs. Spottiswoode. He went straight across to their hostess and said, "Mrs. Spottiswoode, you have no objection that I dance this dance again with Miss Chrissy Hunter?"

"None in the world, Bourhope," said Mrs. Spottiswoode, with the same look that she had worn before.

"Why, indeed," he returned; "or every dance! May I tell her so?"

"That is as she and you may agree. You are aware that would appear something serious," she said, trying to laugh.

"I will take the consequences," he significantly assured her, and went back and told Chrissy so, and then he drove her to her utmost citadel and beat her from it.

Other eyes than Mrs. Spottiswoode's were attracted to the pair. Half a dozen matrons' heads went wagging significantly: girls whispered and tittered; gentlem n opened their eyes, shaped their mouths as if about to whistle, strolled up and took their observations of the preemptied, unconscious couple into coolly, and then speculated and gossiped.

Mrs. Spottiswoode read these comments as well as what and gone before, and was ready with her m—animality. It was this which constituted her a truly able tactician. She shifted her tack before the shout of malicious exultation and ridicule could have been raised at her discomfiture. By a dexterous sleight of hand she shuffled her cards and altered her suit. In a moment Mrs. Spottiswoode was walking and nodding with the matrons interested in the news of the night. She arrested a good-humored yeoman, and crossed the room on his arm, to express and receive congratulations. "You have found out the secret? Foolish fellow, Bourhope; he can not conceal his foibles, though their dignity is unbounded. I must scold him for exposing himself and her. Poor dear! She is not accustomed to this sort of thing. But I am a doctress—I am, indeed! Such an excellent manœuvre for my cousin Chrissy: a good girl, a very clever girl; such a fortunate beginning for the blackballed Bourhope. Often we say the first marriage makes or mars a family of girls. It is so lucky that I invited Chrissy for the Yeomanry Weeks this summer. I am glad that it is better than if it had been Corrie, because Corrie can wait," with a careless wave of her hand in the direction in which Corrie seemed actually followed by her train. "Corrie has too many admirers to make up her mind speedily, yet she takes it all very quietly. But this is quite a family affair. Mr. Spottiswoode's eyes in and my cousin—nobody could have planned it better."

She turned round and heard a blunt bowbe of a farmer speaking out his mind. She at once took him up. "You would not have thought it? You can not comprehend what has come over Bourhope, or what he means to do with that yellow mite, Miss Hunter of Blackfellows, even though she was as good as a saint, and as wise as the Queen of Sheba? Oh! come, Belquin, you do not allow sufficient latitude to confusion of mind and love. I tell you Bourhope has neither eyes nor ears for any body but that mite; he counts his colleagues dairy far before the gayest princess in the land. I know that we are remarking on them now, and he is holding his head as high as if he had sought and won a queen. He is right, after all, and I am wrong, cheerful wife to him. Bourhope will have the cleverest, best wife in the country for all your swaggering. And that is something when a man comes to be old, and has an old wife, like me. Not old! Belquin? Away with you. I wish the Provost heard you. Do you think to flatter me because I am in spirits about my cousin's match? No, it is not lost a friend gets Belquin."

The public of Priorton did not know whether most to admire Mrs. Spottiswoode's diplomacy or the rare instance of poetic justice.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

NEW YORK abounds in tragedy. But there is no need for the lovers of the real and mysterious to frequent theatres to obtain a knowledge of it. There is many a terrible drama enacted on the stage of life in our own midst from day to day. True, the glittering lights, the gay dresses, the picturesque scenery, the tuneful orchestra, and the well-trained actors and actresses are wanting in secrecy and darkness are the real tragedies usually wrought out. But they are nevertheless tragedies, and the columns of our daily journals spread the deeds of darkness open to the world. In glancing over any newspaper of the day we were fastened by "Tragedy in Beaver Street;" "Tragedy in Thirty-fifth Street;" "Tragedy in a Brothel;" and "Tragedy in the Suburbs" of a similar nature.

The accident which occurred in Forty-seventh Street is still, at this writing, shrouded in mystery. One evening a man, returning from his work, found in his little cottage his wife dead in bed, three little children, the eldest only six years old, and the mother by the bedside in an unconscious state. The room was still warmly dressed, with their hair brushed, and they were shaded by side in bed according to their ages. Whether the precious mother had poisoned her children and then attempted suicide, or whether some less fearful explanation of the circumstances could be developed when the coroner recovers her consciousness sufficiently to be examined, is yet unknown.

An April could be more fickle than has February been. All the alternations of cold and warm, wet and dry, snow and sun, rain and sleet, and hail, have succeeded each other in wonderfully rapid succession. We have had some fine spring-like days, undistorted by cloud or shower, and the first of March was a tornado—sometimes dregies—of fair sight were swept steadily downward into the Atlantic. But on the first new spring goods, which are so fresh and pretty, are the great attraction. Prints and brilliants, and the new shades of blue and grey and greenish tone, make the place of last winter materials. Watkins, tom's birdeye brought with it charming weather, and it is to be a legal holiday, every body enjoyed it to the very uttermost.

Three of our readers who are not so fortunate as to have access to all the New York daily papers will be amused by an extract or two from a spirited account of a recent reception to General Grant by some citizens of New York, in which a portrait of General Scott was presented to him:

"Since Richmond capitulated, and his trusty sword was put away in its scabbard, General Grant has received (General Grant) has passed his days, and ehe his nights, in ranging time in numerous vivic and social, and all he meets and tenses, but always in the first person singular active or passive. As thus:

I receive	Comments.
I have received	Letters.
I shall receive	Speeches.
I have received	Invitation Volumes.
I may receive	Swords.
I can't receive	Horses.
I might, could, would, or should receive	Freedom.

Pronto Form.

I am received by	Citizens.
I was received by	Assemblies.
I shall be received by	Clubs.
I have been received by	Parties.
I may be received by	Societies.
I must be received by	Mayors.
I might, could, would, or should be received by	Nobody.

"It is said that the delightful family anecdote prevailed in Grant Street by the excellent citizens of Philadelphia became such a nuisance of trophies that there is no room therein for the domestic circle, their Lares and Penates. The drawing-room is reputed a storehouse of parlor curiosities, which includes bronzes, photographs, swords, medals, books, compliments, clothes, pictures, china, engravings, horses, carriages, flowers, fruits, confectionaries, and cigar-boxes, which have been given to the General since he arrived at the Astor House.

"Other public men and loyal citizens of New York, their lives, felt that their loyalty and their wealth must find expression in the portrait of a hero of the past, they felt also that this commemorative canvas must be reshaped upon the hero of the present. That gentleman, rigid once, gleamed at his crowded walls, decided on possible background for the picture, and signified his eagerness to receive it."

Nevertheless, the whole affair was very successful, and passed off to the apparent satisfaction and pleasure of all concerned. General Grant, in his characteristically brief reply to the donors, assured them that the portrait of one who has rendered such vast service to the Republic, and whose services have continued through so many years, possessed a peculiar value to him.

A worthy gentleman of this city, who has been often entertained at Washington by quiet evening or morning, room, was the other day bought in his usual way by a decent-looking emigrant from the Emerald Isle. The latter said: "Nothing for me, my good woman," pointed to the gentleman mentioned.

"Don't you offer me no coin?"

"Why yes," returned the merchant slowly, "I suppose I can give you a penny;" and he drew a couple of cents from his pocket and laid them on the table. "But is that enough?"

"Well, sir! if you please to give me two cents more would be better."

The merchant placed two more pennies on the table.

"And is that on right?" he asked.

"Well, sir, now I won't stint you," replied the woman, magnanimously.

Two Milwaukee coppers brought down a shower of blessings on the donor's head.

"Oh! you are going to pray for me, sir, you are?" said the gentleman. "Well, I must give you three pennies more, and they were laid on the table.

"May the blessing of God attend ye!" adjured the woman. "And what might be your name?"

"Mr. Lemon," was the reply.

"William—but no! please ye, sir, the other name, what is it?"

"Oh, no matter about the other name—William is enough. You just run up William and God will attend to you." The woman retired with her coppers.

Last scoundrel in New York under use of contraries was taken for gaining money on a small scale with an old lady. A few years ago a well-dressed man was applied to by a man, whom he knew slightly, to advise him about the purchase of a farm. The latter went to look at the farm, but finding other business awaiting him there, introduced the man to his friend Mr. Lemon, to consult him in the matter. After a few moments' conversation the new client departed ostensibly to obtain some minute papers, leaving Lemon and his friend in the room.

"Why, Lemon, what do you do here?"

"Mr. Lemon—did I drop a five-dollar bill here?"

"Why, I have not seen it," said Mr. Lemon's name."

And a fruitless search was made.

"Well, I have left it somewhere," remarked the man, moving quickly to the door; but returning, as if with a second thought.

"If you will just lend me a V, I can finish up the business without going up town."

Mr. Lemon thought he "smelt a rat;" but remembering he had fortunately just emptied his petty-monies, tot ave by took it out of his pocket, saying,

"With pleasure, Sir—but stop!—I have not a five-dollar note."

When we stopped a well-meaning clerk with, "Here's bill, Mr. X——,

"Stop! all I be right," thought Mr. X——" since no partner knows him." And the outcome client disposed with the money.

Americans, be they ever so eccentric or self-willed, may follow their own inclinations in matters of dress. But no Englishman of any class always has been, and always will be in the reign of Henry IV. no person of lower rank than a gentleman was allowed to wear cloth of gold or silver, or to wear a robe long enough to reach the ground. Long sleeves, also, were strictly forbidden. In later years the same petitions of idle, or any velvet in her kirtle," or "any chain of gold about her neck, or upon any part of her body." And the husband must forbid his parents every three months, unless he gave some other assigned reason, under the penalty of forfeiting forty shillings for every time of pretty things. Bad enough to fine one's husband with a long dress-maker's account, but to transgress on one's back-chain, or to wear all the every-day clothes one may lady could in to the fashion—Whew! Under the Tudors and Stuarts, however, a gentleman was allowed a breast of knee-breeches was certainly to be arrested. A gentleman was arrested by the sheriff in the public act of wearing a necklace thicker in texture than was allowed by law. A lady at court wanting to lose a dollar was fined twenty shillings, and carried to the Fleet prison. A gentleman's hair falling a bit lower his forehead at a time when the fashion was dictated by a queen who did not instantly cut his hair, his head should be shaved by the sheriff's barber.

Cotta, the celebrated French chemist, being consulted as to "sport" on a capital trial, was asked by the prisoner's counsel if he could tell what quantity of arsenic was requisite to kill a fly. The Doctor replied, "Certainly, M. le Président; but I will first ask counsel how many flies he has killed in the commencement, he candida and ladies so long, whether married or single, widow or maiden, whenever he brother. When counsel had time to cool down he gave your quest-n."

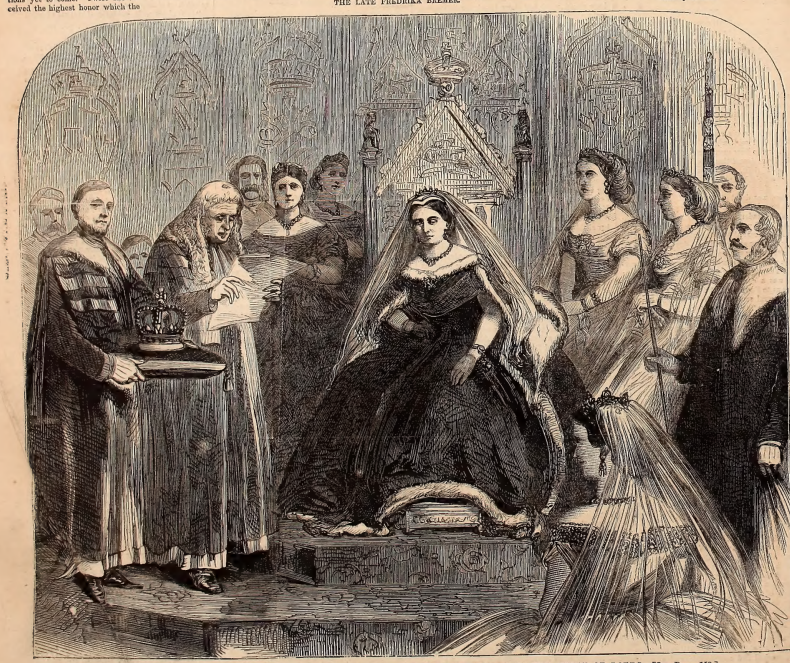
Apropos of the cattle-plague the following recipe for a cure, which appears known as "music ill," will be found in the "Diary of Middlethin," in the pastures of Jamie Lowe's farm in Dumfriesshire. Jamie's father was a near neighbor to the present eighteenth of the learned doctor—I have of, of 1794, and was probably in possession of the secret. Susie pint, and hardly a mistaken, bold of vegetable juice, and horn-shavings, and toasted the cream of the in one whom. You might try in the immediate neighborhood of your own cattle for some guide to use it. Take a kind woman, and steam a single about breast bone. It would be strong, indeed, if the recipe of your cattle not subdued under the operation. Let the woman stay the thousand-and-one notions which have for ages been accepted as remedies for cattle.

An exchange tells of an esteemed man and wife of a young widow on a single-ish, proposed to her in the accepted style, and was met by the usual negative, when some one could ask him for a loan of a few dollars. Being without money, he replied, "I have not got it, but I can get it." "Then," said the widow, "go and get it, and I will be ready to receive you when you return." "Then," said the widow, "go and get it, and I will be ready to receive you when you return." "Then," said the widow, "go and get it, and I will be ready to receive you when you return

FREDRIKA BREMER.

In presenting our readers with the accompanying portrait of FREDRIKA BREMER a few words may not be unacceptable regarding the career of this remarkable woman, whose earthly life closed at ARSTA, the former residence of her family, on the 31st of December last. To the people of this country the career of Miss BREMER is especially interesting from the fact that she has lived among us, and is so well remembered here by thousands of loving friends.

It is now about a quarter of a century since the spirited publisher BROCKHAUS, of Leipsic, introduced to his countrymen and women a series of stories so truthful in their descriptions of simple, often homely life—their living portraiture of fathers, mothers, children, and servants, all the individuals of the home circle, in all their varieties—their tenderesses, their queernesses, their joys and their sorrows, their hopes and their fears—as to seize at once on the public heart. Nobody criticised them, nobody questioned whether they were good or bad; all they did was to read them, to laugh or to cry over them, and to feel astonished how pictures so simple could exercise such a fascination over them. These were the famous "Sketches of Everyday Life," by FREDRIKA BREMER, first and foremost of which stands her inimitable "Neighbors," with its charming Francisca, the excellent Bear, and the powerfully-drawn Ma chère Mère. Now that the once so greatly admired authoress has passed from earthly existence, we shall not attempt a criticism of her works, but remember how much we have loved her, how much we owe her, and how much has been accomplished by a woman of slight physical frame and in any thing but robust health through the greater part of her life, and for how much lasting good her name will be honored in her native land for generations yet to come. Twice she received the highest honor which the Swedish Academy could offer—that of its gold medal. Besides the so well known "Sketches of Everyday Life," Miss BREMER wrote "The Diary," "Brothers and Sisters," and "The Midnight Sun," none of which, however, attained to the celebrity of their predecessors.



THE LATE FREDRIKA BREMER.

No doubt Miss BREMER felt this herself when she changed the pleasant fields of fiction for the more laborious ones of foreign travel. Her travels, to which five years were devoted—two in America and three in Europe and the Holy Land—fill about ten volumes, which contain much close study and deep reflection, and are remarkable for their vivid pictures of life and scenery.

It is not always that the author whose works have delighted and even edified the world lives up to the nobility and truth of his own teaching. This, however, was the case with this excellent woman, whose private life was as remarkable for its deeds of love and mercy as her literary life was for its industry. Those who knew her best loved her most. She enjoyed the society of the young, and surrounded herself by them, generally having one or more young ladies residing with her. One of these assures us that in the twelve months she was in daily intercourse with her she never saw her out of temper, never saw her otherwise than actively kind and assiduous in every way to add to the comfort and pleasure of those who surrounded her. She was received in the highest society of Stockholm, from the Royal circle downward. She was highly accomplished, and spoke several European languages fluently.

Miss BREMER was the means of establishing the Seminarium in Stockholm, an institution kindred to our Ladies' Colleges. She was at the head of every philanthropic work in Stockholm, and many a noble institution both there and in Copenhagen, as, for instance, the Asylum for Destitute Children, owes its existence entirely to her.

TWICE FIVE AND TWICE TEN.

Two children talking together
With the wisdom of twice five years,
And the simple inductive fancy
That rare beyond what appears.

Said Charlie to little Bessie,
Abruptly ceasing to play,
"I saw Bertie's horse in the stable;
He comes nearly every day."

"Don't you know he comes to see Annie?
Ah! ah! I was right in my guess,
I always know when he's coming—
Annie has on that pretty pink dress.

"She always makes a difference,
Be it only a ribbon or rose,
Wherever he comes, she wishes
To look her best, I suppose."

"And do you think she's in earnest?"
"Oh! Charlie, how cruel to doubt—
Why they walk hand in hand together
When the stars are shining out."

"W ll that certainly ought to mean something,
But, somehow or other, I fear
He is not on her or the second;
There may be another next year.

"To-day a new dress or new ribbon,
To-morrow, perhaps, a new rose,
Next year, let us say, a new lover—
Or is it only a dozen, who knows?"

"Now, Charlie, don't be sarcastic;
Would you have her dress always the same?
What has dress to do with affection?
It may be she was not to blame."

"Ah! Bessie, we birds grow cautious
When we see one or two in the net—
The bait may be very attractive,
And the snare very cunningly set.

"But these two or three victims before us,
They seem to whisper, beware!
The woodland berry is safer,
And, perchance, more wholesome fare.

"Give me the girl that has never
Let any one else buy me,
That changes not with the season,
Nor runs after novelty!"

"Ah! Charlie, it must be outrag us
For love once settled to range;
Whatever the season or fashion,
The heart surely never should change."

Take care, Master Charles and Miss Bessie,
There are some things beyond your ken,
The pledges of twice five summers
Are not always redeemed by twice ten.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

SO anniversary of WASHINGTON'S Birthday has had so much significance as the last, which was celebrated in this city with unusual enthusiasm. Among the events of the day worthy of notice were the Military Parade and the presentation by the Union League Club to General GRANT of a Portrait of General SCOTT. In the evening there was a display of fire-works in different parts of the city. Of the display in the Park in front of the City Hall we give an illustration on our first page. It was witnessed by about fifty thousand persons. The pieces, as designated by the pyrotechnists, are as follows: The Indian Palmetto, Golden Circle and Grecian Bend, Peruvian Rose, Coats of Paris, Vestree, Tribune to Cores, Zania Peruvia, Saturn and his Satellites, Star of America, Star of Independence, Golden Waterfall, Yankee Windmill, Passion Flower, Fairies' Frolic, and, lastly, a Grand Temple of Liberty, covering the entire front of the City Hall, and representing GEORGE WASHINGTON as-isted by Justice and Liberty. Over the heads of the three figures were three golden eagles; and underneath the whole were the words, "WASHINGTON, THE FATHER OF OUR COUNTRY." The pyrotechnic display was concluded without accident at about half past eight in the evening, when the great multitude dispersed.

THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND OPENING HER PARLIAMENT.

FOR the first time in five years, QUEEN VICTORIA had on her throne in person on February 6. It was the opening of the Seventh Parliament of her reign. The last occasion of her personal presence in the House of Lords was to inaugurate the Session of a Parliament (the Sixth) which had been three sessions in a similar manner. On that occasion the Prince Consort stood by her side.

The following is an abridged description of the opening of the Seventh Parliament as taken from an English paper:

"Mendwise an interesting scene had been for some time visible within the House of Lords. At noon a long line of carriages entered from Pall Mall to the 'peers' entrance of the Palace of Westminster, most of not all, of which were occupied by ladies in full evening costume—the wives, daughters, and sisters of peers, and of members of the Government, and some few others, perhaps, not so easily connected with the Upper Chamber, but who had influence enough to procure the entree from the courtesy or stupidity of such friends. One of the most notable of the arrivals was a lady who came into the House early in the part of Lord Cole, and who was recognized as Lady Ann Hamilton, Miss Rose Mary Yorke, the granddaughter of George Canning, Lord Bristol.

"At 2 P. M. the Prince of Wales, the Prince in the full uniform of a general officer, and the Princess tastefully attired in a flower of white tulle, relieved with black lace, wearing a tiara of diamonds and a long flowing veil of white gauze, entered side by side. The Princess was conducted to the place of honor on the woolsack, immediately to the throne. The Prince of Wales took his seat on the bench, alongside the Duke of Cambridge, with whom he was speedily engaged in conversation. At twelve minutes past two the door on the right of the throne was thrown open, and we had just a glimpse of the cream-carpeted vestibule, with the gigantic Gendarmes mounting guard. Then the door was slowly closed. Preceded by the Gentlemen-at-Arms at the end of the line of the bewitching, and the banner of the state sword and cap, on her Majesty, accompanied by Princesses Helena and Louisa, Princess Mary and Prince Casimir, of Schleswig-Holstein, walked round to the front of the throne. Attending the duke, she was followed by the Princesses, who, as soon as her Majesty had seated herself, pushed their trains from the right side of their skirts and hung loosely on the throne. Her Majesty wore a velvet robe of the same purple shade as the cushioned bench, bordered with ermine, a mantle of the like material, which she has worn during her widow's reign, and a heavy diamond necklace. The two Princesses dressed in white, stood with Prince Casimir on the left of the throne, while on her Majesty's right were two ladies in waiting, dressed in black, the Countess of Desart, by Lord Chancellor, etc.

"During the interval that elapsed between the summons of the Commons and the reply, the Queen sat silent and motionless, with her head bent slightly forward.

The Speech from the throne was then read by the Lord Chancellor.

"CAUGHT NAPPING."

THE picture engraved on page 162 is by a promising young English artist, E. A. H. Story. We must leave the reader to speculate how the idle little urchin and designer of burning came to commit the outrage on the sculptor's property which he is to be about to be visited with condign punishment. Perhaps the dominie has been about a short time and returned unexpectedly; perhaps the little offender has fancied himself out of observation, beneath the desk of the despot immediately behind him. Possibly the slave of this petty reign is the blind wielder of the leathern Nemesis has himself been nodding; if so, his anger would, of course, be heightened tenfold by the presumption that this fit event are in following the example of its impossible power. As the child is father of the man, so it is school ad antecedent to the world. Here we find him being manfully to his task, there another makes faces at it, either in disgust or for his own and others amusement; and, yonder, a third neglects it altogether. While what more characteristic of adult nature than that we should make merry over our neighbor's misfortunes? Even some of the older sex, it seems by this picture, are capable of this sympathetic pleasure. Let us hope, however, it is only when there are little womanly hearts attuned to thrill with pity and compassion at misfortunes and pain; and now and then to make the tears irradiated with the heavenly light of unselfish love.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

FIGURES 1 and 4 furnish two distinct representations of a cassque known as "the Sappho," which has met with much favor in the grand monde, and promises to become very fashionable generally. It is made of black velvet, trimmed with a passementerie of black silk and jet ornaments, which terminate in a fringed fringe, with a couple of tassels at the extremity. In the parts which are turned over by the collar and the cuffs is a fine and narrow guipure. The waistcoat is trimmed with a guipure of similar pattern but of greater depth.

The bonnet adapted to this cassque is extremely stylish. It is composed of black velvet, with a black ostrich feather, and having a kind of diadem in front ornamented with small black canoes.

Figure 2 is a tall-dress of straw-color satin, over which is a jupon of white tulle, which covers the entire robe, with the exception of the corsage and the extremity of the train. The corsage and the bottom of the jupon are trimmed with puffs of tulle, through which is run a ribbon. The train of the robe is scolloped. The coiffure is composed of a branch of yellow roses, which descends as low as the waist.

No. 3 is an evening dress made de rigueur, striped blue and white, with a large relevé fixed behind by a bow of blue velvet with very long ends. The sleeve, which is of blue satin, is bordered—as well as the body and the bottom of the robe—with velvet to match. At the extreme end of the robe is a pyramid bible.

The "coiffure Josephine" is composed of a chignon of small curls, covered with a net, and fastened on by a large gold comb. A diadem, also of gold, is worn in front.

On the same page with our Fashion out we give several engravings of fancy work, consisting of ladies' wool work, to each of which we shall make separate allusion:

"BANDEAU GREC" OF PEARL MOSAIC.

This bandeau can be very easily manufactured at home out of chased bronze pearls, imitation coral, or any other fancy beads, in the following manner: The first inner frame is made by the pattern, are passed alternately, first through one, then through two beads, forming a diamond square. The outer thread, 6, are then run through a single bead and crossed inside of the two inner beads in the middle of the diamond. A bracelet can be on the to make the "bandeau" in the same manner with fine elastic cord.

"FLOCONNE" CROCHET STITCH.

This stitch is admirably adapted to coverings for the feet and footstools, not only on account of its beauty, but its warmth and elasticity, and when worked in two colors—for example, black and white—forms a good imitation of the Polish animal's muffs and collars. It is set up in tolerably loose meshes and worked backward and forward, thus:

1st Row.—To each mesh of the original casting one ordinary close mesh.

2d Row ch.—One close mesh passing the needle through both be ge, which forms an open mesh; one tuft of mohair, to be passed from 8 to 10 times round the fingers into the wool once around the needle, then make a loop through the mesh formed by the last close mesh, and always using the same mesh for the three loops. Take off the wool from the fingers, and work one close mesh, as is shown in the first row of the pattern. Repeat an open mesh and crochet it with that which remains upon the needle.

3d Row.—Make this round every single and every tuft mesh.

4th Round.—Repeat the same, except that the loops for the tuft are passed through the second open mesh below the top, contained in the pattern by an asterisk (*). The hole for the close mesh is the one surrounding the tuft, and is worked in the pattern by a cross (+). The contrasting color may be worked in longer tufts for a fuller appearing to the above design.

KEEP WITH POCKET.

This perfect protection against the severity of the winter furnishes a beautiful and suitable gift, and will be found by the recipient a needless outlay in being manufactured of materials to match the dress, and being furnished with a pocket, the opening of which is worked in the side. The arrangement of this muff may be varied, but the above design is worthy a pre-eminence. The outer covering is of black velvet laid in folds at the side as undertook the arm-bones, which are trimmed, as well as the lapet, with broad bands of fur. The whole is lined with white satin. The lappet is adorned with a rich application of black satin, embroidered with pearls, in the middle of which is a shield with an initial laid on. The lappet is closed with buttons, and the muff is furnished with rich cords and tassels.

A more simple style for children is shown in pattern No. 2. This consists of dark blue velvet, lined with blue silk, and trimmed around the arm-holes and lapped over the front with silk bound at the same. The whole is completed with bands of blue velvet and mother-of-pearl buttons.

KNITTED BORDER FOR PELERINES, BASQUES, ETC.

Material: White zephyr worsted, purl-gray worsted, two fine wooden knitting-needles, and a flat reed, four-ninths of an inch wide, such as is used in netting.

This fringe-like border is peculiarly fitted for pelerines, basques, and fichus, and is knitted with white and pearl-gray worsted in interlacing points. The required amount of stitches is cast on with pearl worsted, every taking care that it be capable of being divided by 14, that number being necessary for each point; and it is knitted backward and forward, as a garter.

1st Row loop.—The first stitch is taken off without knitting. The setting wool is then placed in the back of the work, the thread brought through the next stitch, and the thread thrown over by the thread is then placed round the wool from above, again thrown over the needle, so that the latter has two strands, the wool only one, and the stitch is taken off. The process is repeated from * to the end.

2d Row is knitted regularly without drawing out the wool, every double stitch being made into one. The work is then drawn, and the 1st and 2d row alternately repeated until the border, which consists of ten rows, is completed. In the 3d row of loop two white every twelve must be made of white worsted, and the same number of white must be added in each successive row, until in the 8th row two meshes of pearl appear between every twelve of white. Two rows of plain loop finish the border.

The use for which the article is designed must determine the arrangement of the colors as well as the strength of the material to be employed. *

LAUGHABLE.—All the world and his wife seem to be inhaling the laughing gas, and having their teeth extracted, at the Cooper Dental Association, 19 Cooper Institute. The danger is that, Dr. COLTON having destroyed the pain, people will practice their teeth when they should save them. Call around to see it with a dozen artificial ones.

FIRST PREMIUM IMPROVED
$5 SEWING $5
MACHINE.

The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity.

Originally patented May 15, 1865; Improvement patented June 5, 1866. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with its many additions, is now considered as a complete machine for family sewing, by making every seam required, and works backward, forward, and sideways, with ease and rapidity, making the strongest, most perfect and regular Stitch by hand, and will do every description of sewing, making alterations to each evolution of the Wheel. With certainty, ease, and rapidity, will sew on buttons, hem, fell, gather, stitch, quilting, cording, tucking, braiding, and every variation of Stitch required in family sewing, and executes it more perfectly than can be done by hand, and more expeditiously than the most skilful operator can with any other machine. Warranted not to get out of order for three years, unless the manufactured name has been altered by the removal of all the figures from the face of the Wheel, by which the number is ascertained. It is the only low-priced sewing machine that can execute a perfect backstitch by reverse. All other sewing machines at the same price are deficient in this.

In all the above number it is invariably for the benefit of the purchaser to have the Gem. "Seeing is better than hearing."

With single or double thread, it silently yet very naturally sews and fells, and will make the very best of Stitch, nearly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

Every machine is fully warranted, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions for management, at the price, $5. Self-driver in operation. Agents wanted every where. Circular, containing liberal inducements, sent free. All letters (if orders, FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY,

The great feature of our Prize Concert is the manner in which it is gotten up, differing from any thing of the kind yet before offered to the public:

1st. The Prizes are a great deal more valuable.

2d. All of the Prizes, excepting gold and silver goods, the very best manufactured. The pianos and sewing-machines are new, and the unredeemed pawnbroker and left-goods notice that they are surpassed by none.

3d. The Ticket-holder has a right to a drawn ticket as he disposition authorizes: those are placed in a wheel and thoroughly mixed, a disinterested person selected to draw a ticket—but in no event at the concert) draws these duplicate numbers from the wheel—the first one drawn out gets the largest prize, the next one drawn out the next largest, and so on, the last number until all are drawn.

To enable us to give away the valuable prizes we first sell a sufficient number of tickets to insure a profit on them. The prizes are then distributed in order as the duplicates are drawn from the wheel, to each gift who owns the ticket, and should you draw a large prize the proprietor sends a check for the value you draw, and you can consequently you obtain if ever get any thing worth what your ticket cost you.

Don't throw your money away on valueless concerns but send a dollar for tickets each, if you would secure them, as the larger portion has been already sold. Every ticket is registered before being sent out—the number, name of party purchasing, and address—and all will be notified of the result of drawing.

Tickets all one, or eleven for $10, sent by mail on receipt of order and money. BRIGGS, LEMON & CO., Bankers 78 Clark, Chicago, Illinois.

P. S.—The above Prizes will positively take place on the 28th. Parties at a distance sending us funds for tickets, until they all be sold, will have the money returned to them. BRIGGS, LEMON & CO.

GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 39 First Premiums, gold and silver medals, at the Principal Fairs held in the country within the last ten years, and in addition thereto they were awarded a First Prize Medal at the Great International Exhibition in London, 1862, in competition with 760 Piano-Fortes, the pick of the World.
That the great superiority of these instruments is now universally conceded is abundantly proved by the FACT that Messrs. Steinway's "scales, improvements, and peculiarities of construction" have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both hemispheres (as exhibited at recent International Exhibitions), in utter disregard of patent RIGHTS, and that their instruments are used by the most eminent pianists of Europe and America, who prefer them for their own public and private use wherever accessible.

THE SITUATION.

DURING the great debate in which the country is now engaged it is well to remember that temperance of tone and a careful regard for truth are always powerful allies. We have lately had signal illustrations of the folly of the transparent fictions and personal aspersions, and there can be no more palpable absurdity than that those who stood steadily together against rebellion when rebellion was formidable are now anxious and plotting to surrender the Government to rebels defeated and disgraced. Yet these are charges gravely made against such men as CHARLES SUMNER on the one hand, and ANDREW JOHNSON on the other. Now either or both of these gentlemen may be mistaken in the policy of reorganization which they favor, but there is surely no reasonable ground for believing that they are hostile to the Union or Government. Their views of the true course to pursue may hopelessly differ, but certainly while their intentions are beyond suspicion the difference of their views may be discussed without acrimony. The situation is entirely without precedent, and denunciation, insinuation, and fierce partisanship merely confound the confusion and exasperate honest differences.

It is as unjust to assert that Congress is hostile to the loyal men at the South as it is to insist that the President is anxious to have all disloyal men sit in Congress. It is as inaccurate to declare that Congress means to sustain a paper class of freedmen at the expense of the Government as to argue that the President intends to betray the freedmen defenseless into the hands of those who hate them. It is as untrue to say that the course of Congress violates the Constitution as that the policy of the President overthrows it. The truth lies between all these extremes, as may be seen by looking at the last point we have mentioned. If, for instance, it be alleged, in defense of what is called the President's policy, that the war was to prevent secession; that it was successful; that secession was therefore prevented; that the States are now, as before, in the Union; and that, consequently, Congress has no constitutional right to prohibit their representation—it is no less true that if those States are in the Union they were equally so in May last, and that the President has no constitutional right to appoint a Provisional Governor of a State in the Union. The truth is, that the President acted from the necessity of the case; and that must be the principle of action until reorganization is complete. Then, and not before, the authority which is called the war-power ceases, and the normal habit of the Union is resumed. The argument is by no means ended, as Senators DOOLITTLE and JOHNSON seem to suppose, when it is proved that the late rebel States are not out of the Union. They were not out of the Union a year ago. Was any representative which South Carolina might have chosen to send to Congress at that time to be therefore admitted without question? No sensible man will affirm such an absurdity.

Neither the President nor Congress hold that the mere fact of laying down arms raised against the Government proves either the loyalty of those who surrender or the propriety of admitting against question the representatives whom they send. Senator REVERDY JOHNSON himself concurred in the report made to the Senate in February of last year that it was "improper for this body to admit to seats Senators from Louisiana till, by some joint action of both Houses, there shall be some recognition of that State Government as being in harmony with the Government of the United States" and recognizing its authority." All that Congress asks is that the subject shall be investigated and the facts ascertained, and for that sole purpose was the Reconstruction Committee appointed. The President also confirms the same view when he says, in speaking of the late rebel States: "When they comply with the conditions, when they have given sufficient evidence of their loyalty and of what can be trusted, when they yield obedience to the law, I say extend to them the right hand of fellowship, and let peace and union be established." So says the President; so say we all. But here are points to be decided, and by whom? Is it not evident that Congress must decide them for itself before it can admit a single member? The President may for himself be satisfied upon some of these points, and he says in his Veto Message that, in his judgment, "some of the late rebel States have properly be admitted to representation. But surely neither he nor any other man can expect that his conviction will bind Congress. There was never a subject, indeed, which required more deliberate consideration. The honor of the country pledged to the freedmen, the security of the national debt, the increased representation given by the Emancipation Amendment to the late rebel States; the danger of any risk of assumption of the debt in any form—all require the most thoughtful care in legislation.

But the most truly patriotic men may honestly differ about methods, and if upon any point Congress and the President disagree, the Constitution indicates the course to pursue. He may interpose his veto. If Congress overrides it by the Constitutional vote, its will becomes a law of the United States which the President is sworn to execute. If his veto prevails, the will of Congress so far fails to become a law. But the President, if he have any regard for the dignity of his office or for the security upon the part of the Government, must distribution of powers in this country, must see that the will of the people finally rules.

But we confidently trust that no such appeal will be necessary. The President and Congress have the same end in view. They both desire the recognition by every State of its inalienable right in the Union at the moment consistent with the general peace and security; and if Congress, accepting the facts of the situation, trusts something to time, something to the traditions of the Government, something to the sure laws which, despite passion and prejudice, still control human affairs; and if the President, mindful of the equal dignity and responsibility of Congress, remembers that firmness is not inconsistent with forbearance, nor conviction with conciliation; and if patience and firmness reflect that Habeas Corpus is always feeble and futile, the great party of loyal men who saved the Union will secure its peaceful perpetuity by mutual moderation and wise concession.

ENGLAND AND IRELAND.

THE "load and general cheers" that greeted Sir GEORGE GREY when he announced in the House of Commons on the 16th of February that he should bring in a bill next day for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus in Ireland; the remark of Earl DERBY, in the House in the House of Lords, that he would not interpose a moment's delay; the special session of Parliament on the 17th, when the suspension bill was brought in and carried by a large majority, the Opposition leader; Mr. BRIGHT's protest without intention of opposition; and the passage of the bill by a vote of 226 to 34 in the House of Commons on the same night, show that the British Government is seriously alarmed by the condition of Ireland, and that it means, if possible, to prevent, not to subdue, an insurrection.

The suspension of the great writ is a favorite method of prevention with that Government, and especially in Ireland. During the present time it has been suspended during this century in that country. An act to that effect was in operation in 1800, at the very time of the Union; from 1802 to 1805; from 1807 to 1810; in 1814; from 1822 to 1824; and last in 1848, when the fresh people were arming and organizing and drilling, and the cannon to be used to sacre and plunder.

In England also the suspension has been frequent. In 1745 the Solicitor-General stated that the act had been suspended nine times since the revolution of 1688. From 1745 until 1794 the law was inviolate, but in that year, amidst the wild turmoil of the French Revolution and fears of the Britich Government, Mr. PITT moved its suspension. FOX, GREY, and SHERIDAN eloquently resisted. In one of his speeches FOX said that the proposition was insulting to the common prudence. He declared that the suspension made the will of Ministers the real Government of England, and that the Habeas Corpus was a relic which was to be suspended. Yet thirty-nine members only supported the opposition, and the writ remained continously suspended for eight years. In 1817 it was again suspended; but for the fifty years since, as the Constitutional historian of England says, "Ministers, animated by a higher spirit of self-confidence, have known how to maintain the authority of the law in England without the aid of abnormal powers."

But Ireland is always an exception to all English rules. The tone of English feeling toward the unhappy country is generally, not always, harsh and hostile. The popular English conception of the island is that of a wretched people in a chronic state of suppressed or latent rebellion. The traditions of wrong and suffering, which would gradually perish in a thriving and intelligent community, are kept forever fresh in one which is ignorant and wretched, whether the wretchedness be the result of local causes or of English legislation. The problem of Ireland has never been solved; and Carlyle expressed doubtless a vague English feeling of despair when he suggested that the only solution was the submersion of the island in the sea for twenty-four hours.

Now if the true view of international relations upon the globe were simply the-devil-take-the-hindmost, we might complacently "chaff" England upon her late conduct toward us, and "thank thee, Jew, for teaching" us the word Neutrality. But acutely suffering as we are from the sorrows of civil war, it is impossible not to sympathize with a kindred famine which is unrelieved by it; and while the British policy in Ireland can not be approved by those who believe that justice is essential to peace, yet if the Fenians or Irish revolutionists propose to invoke the sympathy of the world in an appeal to arms, the world must distinctly know their grievances. A general plea for independence, a general protest against unjust laws, are not sufficient. Discontent with the church establishment and the land-tenure in Ireland are not enough to justify bloodshed, unless it is plain that legal redress has been sought and refused. All the Fenian fury of invective is impotent compared with one plain statement of the leading wrongs which the Government refuses to remedy.

It is true that England did not wait for such a statement from our late rebels before Earl RUSSELL declared that we were fighting for dominion. But if we can find no better example for our conduct than Earl RUSSELL and British sentiment in our war, we shall deserve the scorn which we lavished upon him. Sir GEORGE GREY, in moving for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, said that the British Government was wholly discountenanced by the American Government; and Mr. LABOUCHERE called attention to "the indulgence of the laws to which we had a right by her international obligations toward foreign countries." There is our revenge, and it is a thousandfold sweeter than pettifogging a Fenian Alabama out of New York Bay.

We need not fear to trust our principles or our traditions. The hostility with which so many Irishmen regarded our struggle to maintain free Government will change to admiration of the humane and honorable conduct of such a Government in all its dreamed-of international relations. If England falls into trouble our duty is to do what England ought to have done during our troubles, not what she did.

THE BEGINNING OF CONTRACTION.

WHILE Congress is disputing about the proper method of inaugurating a policy of contraction, this member declaring that no policy at all will be wisest unless his scheme be adopted, and that member announcing that no other plan than his can save the nation, the Secretary of the Treasury in the absence of appropriate legislation, is quietly in his own way curtailing the currency. On 1st November, a little over four months ago, the aggregate legal-tender currency was $709,671. On 1st March the aggregate legal-tender currency was only $665,984,414: a reduction, in four months, of $43,737,586. It is true that during the same period the volume of national currency was increased more than $30,000,000. But over these issues the Secretary had no control; and in all cases banks are compelled to hold in their vaults legal tenders to redeem their notes on presentation, any substantial reduction of the former will quickly compel a recall of the latter.

It will be noted that this reduction of $27,725,197 in the legal-tender currency is the result of what was effected without any "funding loans." By offering $50,000,000 of Five-Twenty bonds in exchange for compound legal tenders, in January or February last, the circulation would easily have been raised to $77,000,000 instead of $27,000,000 without disturbing trade or industry.

"Not a bit of it," a joint upon it," the Secretary has ample power under existing statutes to curtail the currency—even though Congress should deny him the additional authority he has asked for. So can any one quietly exchanging compound legal tenders, Seven-Thirty notes, and other short date obligations for long bonds, as the rate of at least $5,000,000 per month throughout the year, without creating any very serious disturbance in the money market, and he can employ his surplus revenue in paying off the principal of the public loans. In this way he can curtail the currency perhaps as fast as it would be safe to curtail it, and he can do it in a way which will not involve periodical spasms in the money market.

The two weak points in his position are the deposits on call and the debt certificates. Talk to a Bull in gold about contraction, and he responds triumphantly:

"Contraction, Sir! Impossible! Ridiculous! How can the Secretary contract when he has $118,000,000 on call after ten days, and $65,000,000 more on debt certificates, maturing on the average within eight months?"

It can not be denied but there is a good deal in this reasoning. So long as Government may be called upon for $118,000,000, on ten days' notice, the Secretary does not create a tight money market if he suddenly withdraw what he have had in London for six weeks would—if established here—have brought the United States Government to the verge of bankruptcy. Every dollar of the temporary deposits would have been called, and it would have taxed the resources of the Government to the utmost to have responded. Surely this is clear enough to dictate the necessity of at once abandoning the seductive but fatal expedient of receiving money on temporary deposit. We have drawn attention more than once of late to the bad policy, in a mere business point of view, of paying interest, at the rate of 4 and 6 per cent. per annum on money which lay idle in the Treasury, and was not required by the necessities of Government. But if contraction be fairly adopted as the policy of Government, these temporary deposits will become an element of danger as well as expense. They constitute an impregnable bulwark behind which the banks can defy the Government. So long as they exist Government can no more afford to distress the banks by curtailing the currency than a debtor can distress his creditor by purchasing the latter's paper.

In war time, when the great object of Government was to get money at once in any way, and to postpone the day of payment, debt certificates and temporary deposits were a fair expedient. They answered very well, and more than once helped the Secretary out of grave embarrassments. But now the Government ought not to need to resort to such methods of finance. The revenue is in excess of the expenditure, and Government ought to occupy a position above and beyond the control of local banks or bankers. It is in the power of the Secretary to pay off the bulk of the temporary deposits, and to reduce the debt certificates to a small figure. Until he does so all the legislation in the world will not enable him to curtail the currency, because the parties to be injured by such curtailment will tell then hold a call on him for currency to which he can not respond, while he has done so he will be in a position, without further legislation, to curtail the currency about as fast as it ought to be curtailed.

REMEDIES AGAINST FIRE.

THE complete destruction by fire in the daytime of Dr. TYNG's Church and of the Assembly Rooms in Broadway, notwithstanding the best efforts of the Fire Department, and without any want of water, is a fresh illustration of what it is the construction of our buildings which exposes them to such certain destruction. The question involves not only the interests of owners and Fire Insurance Companies, but the safety of occupants and the contribution which the generation on the stage makes to the one that is to succeed in the shape of permanent improvements.

Buildings in the Old World are made to stand for ages. Their destruction by fire is as impossible as it is to make houses from bricks once destroyed which are built on the American plan. A traveler walking the streets of Florence and Rome is not a little astonished at the preservation of the palace built by the Medici family about the year 1300, and of the Pantheon built for Pagan worship or some other purpose before Christian era. Some of the walls which has stood about three hundred years, is safe from destruction by fire, or indeed by any means short of an earthquake.

Although these specimens of architecture have been so long the subject of examination, and although the fire of 1835 swept over about sixty acres of the most valuable part of New York, we still build on the plan of Dr. TYNG's Church and of the Assembly Rooms, which in a few hours became a mass of ruins. The principles about our houses which now exposes them to rapid and certain destruction by fire is the presence of lath and plaster throughout their interior, constituting with the brick on the outside, and a complete wooden structure incased in walls of masonry. The succession of wooden chimneys leading from cellar to roof from basement, and of well-devised drafts or passages leading to them between the beams on each floor, constitute a perfect contrivance for the steady and rapid progress of fire, secure from the action of water drawn from without. Architects must know this difficulty full well, but yet either from the eagerness of owners to have cheap structures and large rents, or from the habit of architects to be constantly engaged in the work of rebuilding, no proper remedies are provided, and reliance must probably be placed on Legislative measures to correct the fatal effects of their joint cupidity.

If those who are engaged in the business of insurance were equal to the necessities of their situation, the great fire of 1835 would not have been without some value as a warning against a pernicious mode of building. A few buildings, it is true, have since been constructed which are proof against fire. Among these are the Merchants' Exchange, the offices on the southeast corner of Broadway and Liberty Street, the structure on the broken in Broad Street, and more recently the elegant house of Mr. STEWART in the Fifth Avenue. But take the mass of houses and churches built since 1835, and they all possess the same vice which exposed the city to a fire extending over sixty acres of valuable property. The last fire on occasion occurred before the introduction of the Croton but it was due to the prevalence of extreme cold and a high wind, which made it difficult to subdue with water a fire which suddenly became extensive among houses favorably constructed for its ravages.

Take any ordinary corner house as an example of this peculiarity of structure. The walls—front, rear, and sides—are of brick, the front faced with stone. This is well enough. Behind the front and rear walls are carried up about a foot back extend from cellar to garret. On these are nailed laths, and all the woodwork of inside shutters and a deep base. The open space, about a foot deep, forms a perfect draft or chimney of wood completely dried. The exterior side on the street is similarly constructed, except that the strips to which laths are nailed are inferior in depth to the ordinary joist, but there is nevertheless an open space extending also from cellar to garret between the plaster on the external side and that on which the openings between the beams are conducted, thus extending the draft or chimney under every portion of the floor. In addition to all this staircases are universally built of wood, with the disadvantage, in case of fire, of a well protected open space between the treads and risers each of laths and plaster, which also constitutes the finish at the back of the stairway. Although many houses have an inside wall above the main hall, yet more generally this and all other or most other partitions are made of joists resting on beams or on each other, covered on each side with lath and plaster, and constituting a further means of conducting the fire rapidly to each floor and to the roof of the building. The wonder is not so much that such structures are completely destroyed—such is the well known phrase—but that they are ever saved from this result if fire ensue.

The interior ornamentation of Dr. Tyng's elegant church consisted mainly of lath and plaster from floor to roof, constructed on an infinity of wood formed to represent solid work, but as ready for the flames as any thing which ingenuity could devise. This building and the Assembly Rooms, in open day, defied the skill and unremitted exertions of firemen. We can scarcely expect that the same and expense devoted by pagans to the Pantheon for the safety of their house of worship, or by the Catholics in the time of Michael Angelo in the construction of St. Peter's, will be adopted in our structures, but we can easily show that a very slight attention to details in building will prevent such complete destruction as that without much expense beyond what is usually borne.

In lieu of the system of joists and lath and plaster for floor, front and rear of outside walls it would cost but little more to construct a brick wall separated a few inches from the front and rear wall, to receive the plaster, and to have nailed to it the wood-work of inside shutters. The plaster would of course be perfectly dry. Houses in the interior of blocks would by this simple precaution be much more healthful, safe, warm, and durable than are the usual structures, and there would be no loss of room. The outside and inside wall would not need to be tied to each other, but an occasional tie of iron or copper sloping downward from the internal to the external wall would convey any drip from the latter away from the interior. Iron ties were supposed necessary, which we are sure it is not. We have closed the open space between these walls at the place where the work for shutters is affixed by a strip of iron, to include vermin from this retreat, which, when joists are used, constitutes the place in which they are secure from attack, and where they safely breed, mice, and cockroaches. If, in addition to this, the interior walls were of brick and the main hall were of solid material, with a solid or stone staircase instead of the second floor, such houses could be inhabited with safety from fire, and with the certainty, at all events, that no extraordinary efforts would be necessary to prevent any but a partial destruction of the building. A cheap class of tenement houses with narrow halls might have flagging in the halls from the ground to the roof, the external wall on every floor, and an iron staircase to give certain means of exit in case of fire. Such an assurance of safety would enable occupants to take measures themselves to put a fire which could generally be done with ease.

The interior of churches must be constructed on a plan wholly different from that which prevails, or their pastors must share in the anguish of the venerable Dr. Tyng, who, at a period of his life when he most required a secure roof for the worship in which he delights to engage, finds that his efforts to this end have been completely frustrated by the sacrifice made to appearances in the church which his congregation erected. Grand arches made of the flimsy material generally used must be dispensed with if we wish to make certain provision against the carelessness of a workman handling fire. Cast stone, such as we import from France, makes an elegant finish for the interior of churches; but an interior wall of brick, constituting with the exterior a double wall, would be less expensive, the interior wall to be plastered and painted. Where columns are necessary, iron may be used with advantage. It would be well also, in important structures, to have iron rafters and iron lath, but perforated tin or galvanized iron may be used instead of wooden lath. In forming the interior arches galvanized iron may be used with benefit and pressed into whatever shape may be required.

So far as concerns houses built for occupation, the legislation of the State is defective in omitting proper provision for security against fire; and we hope to see such laws passed as may enable the present generation to transmit its industry in the shape of houses to its successors, as a substantial contribution to the wealth of the country. A Commission appointed by the Legislature to examine experts would afford the means for accurate and efficient legislation at the next session.

FOREIGN PROSPECTS.

The Austrian Archduke Maximilian still remains in Mexico in his capacity of titular Emperor of that country, and Lord Napoleon has not yet begun to embark his troops for France. Marshal Forey declares in the French Chambers that "the great idea" of the Mexican expedition could not be realized without more French soldiers, and a minister of Napoleon's rises hastily and says that the Marshal speaks for the Emperor. Troops are already spoken for himself. Meanwhile the Juarez Government of Mexico is both nomadic and shadowy, and—to use a droll expression of the prize-ring of which we forget which—seldom puts in an appearance. This country continues placid, and satisfies itself with keeping an eye upon Mexico. Its new war, and sinking at the Captain Boboli statesmanship that would peremptorily order France out of Mexico. Mr. Conway, a trenchant American writer, now living in London, answers this, and by urging that, if we go to war by way of healing our domestic alienations, it will undoubtedly be a way to settle the Alabama claims in a hurry. While Mr. Matthew Arnold, an accomplished and brilliant Englishman, does not reassure his countrymen by declaring that Lord Palmerston loves Great Britain behind Europe and the United States in the estimation of the world.

It is very clear that none of the Great Powers wish to go to war. If France would fight for Mexico, she sees the United States, the Monroe Doctrine, three thousand miles of ocean, and a native population, as obstacles and lions in the path. If England would haughtily decline to look at the little Yankee bill for the Alabama, she sees Ireland seething with discontent, and a watchful Brance ready to turn all into account. If the United States would insist upon an Alabama settlement or a departure from Mexico, she sees her army disbanded and still stretched over a large part of her own domain, and a debt which she can not wisely increase. We believe, therefore, that all these questions will be peacefully adjusted, and are quite sure they would be adjusted much more rapidly were our own position a little more harmonious. England will disregard the little bill. France will be more reticent than ever, when they hear the President and Congress of the United States mutually denouncing and defying each other.

We must not be surprised if the remarkable prestige with which the event of the war invested us is diminished in the view of the world by our political discords. If the Union party had moved steadily and unitedly forward to the full reorganization of the Government the amazement and admiration of the European world would have been indescribable, and the triumph of the American system would have been complete. The foreign Thomas always should have had definitely and finally in the case of the perils after the war. But they were not unforeseen by us, and our doubting critic may be very sure that the same intelligence which enabled us to abolish the war will establish peace. He may remember that he was signally wrong in his calculations of the rebellion, and he will be no less so in his theories of the practicability of adjustment. The force of our system is shown quite as much by its capacity to bear undisturbed the strain of extreme opinions and hot differences as by its rapidity of adaptation to new circumstances. The war was truly effective because it did not end at Bull Run. The peace will be permanent and secure because it will spring from wise deliberation.

THE SUMMER HEALTH.

The spring is here and the cholera is in the West Indies. Up to the last mail steamer there had been eleven hundred deaths from cholera in Guadeloupe. The pestilence had decreased there, but had appeared at Dominica; and as there are reasons to doubt that it will presently appear among us. Meanwhile an efficient Board of Health has been created, and is now organized and at work. We trust that that work may be relentlessly thorough; and that the owners of the tenement houses which are the hot-beds of disease and vice in their city may be rigidly compelled, as the law allows, to cleanse these disgraceful dens.

The usual method of arranging a tenement house in New York is as follows: Upon an ordinary lot of 25 by 100 feet, a front house 25 by 50 is built, and a rear house 25 by 25. There is a court between, 25 by 25 feet, containing hydrant, cess-pool, and privy. The houses are generally five and often six stories in height above the basement. The principal rooms, four upon each floor, occupy the width of the building, with small bedrooms between, one to each main room. Thus in a six-story building there are usually twenty-four families; each averaging five members and often more, as there are generally other lodgers. Each person has thus a little more than ten square feet of ground area, and 480 cubic feet of air space in the living room. In the main room the air space is 817 cubic feet, and in the dormitories 89 feet to each person. This is stated by the careful sanitary report of the Citizens' Association as the average, but from this the crowding far exceeds this. Light and air are well excluded. Garbage and slops of every kind are thrown into the street, tainting the atmosphere of the whole region, while the privies are filthy beyond description. The condition of the wretched people who inhabit these places is unspeakable, and it is among them that cholera runs riot. In the last great visitation of 1832 the great bulk of deaths was in quarters like these, filled with tenement houses. But the pestilence was not confined to them. Cholera in Greenwich or West streets is death in the Fifth Avenue, for when once it has taken hold of a city it is no respecter of persons.

The work before the new Health Board is enormous, but there is every reason to hope that it will be well done. Mr. Schultz, the President, is a gentleman noted for his energy and administrative skill. His medical associates are gentlemen of the highest professional distinction and personal character; and the Police Commission can at once bring their extensive and detailed knowledge of the city to the most efficient use. The responsibility of the new Board is very great. The City and the State will require rich results from them; but whatever a Health Board can do for a city like New York we are very confident this Board will do.

A COPPERHEAD HISS.

The Chicago Times, one of the most conspicuous "Democratic" journals in the country, suggests that it is the duty of the President to command the arrest of Messrs. Sumner Stevens, and Phillips, and if Congress does not immediately obey the President, it is also his duty to turn the Senate and House out of the capital at the point of the bayonet.

This is a plain proposition that the President of the United States should arrest, during a Congressional discussion, those members who do not agree with his views. It is not a new thing. A little more than two hundred years ago Charles I., King of England, did exactly what the Chicago Times advises the President to do. He went to the House of Commons and ordered the arrest of five members. It was in consequence of this violent assault upon the fundamental rights of Parliament that Mr. Thaddeus Stevens foolishly said, because of the expression of an opinion, that Charles lost his head.

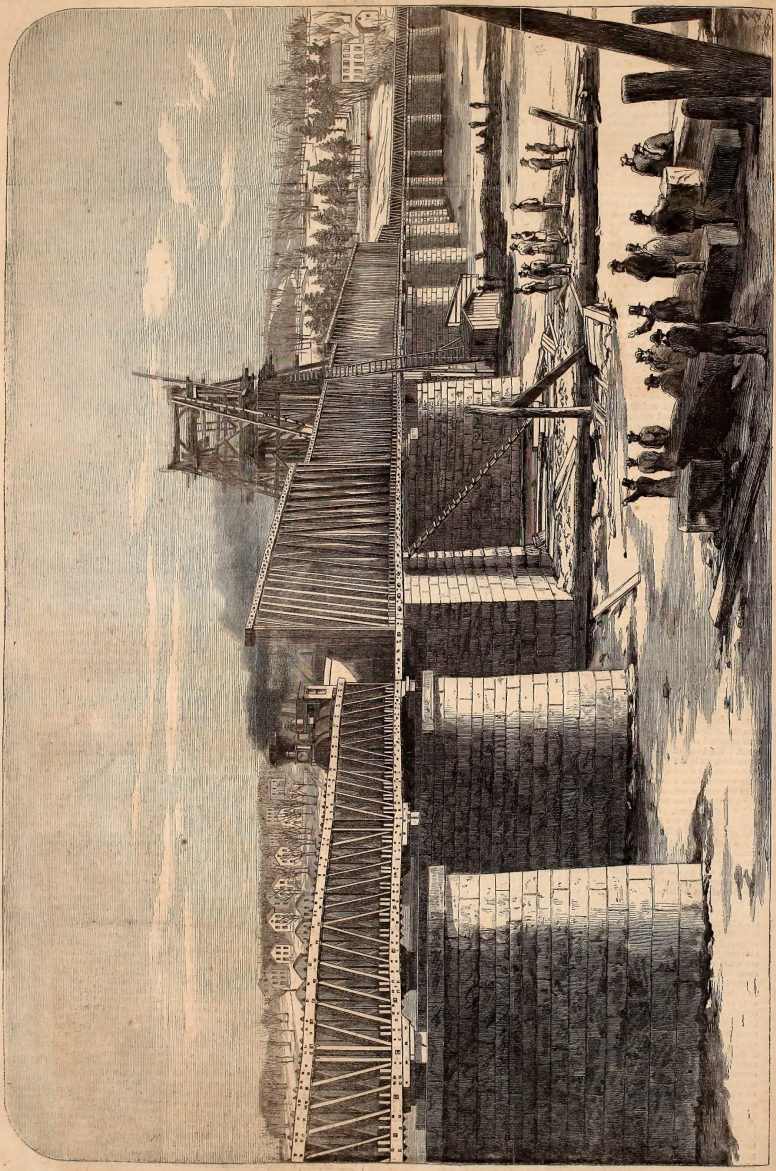
An act which was so intolerable in the English monarchy under the Stuart kings more than two centuries ago that it plunged the kingdom into civil war, is now gravely recommended to an American President by a chief "Democratic" newspaper. Of course we do not assume that the Democratic party responsible for such folly, although Garrett Davis makes a kindred proposition in the Senate of the United States. But it is instructive to observe the spirit of those who are most clamorous that the late rebels shall be at once restored and without conditions.

The Chicago Times was a steadfast and unscrupulous supporter of the rebellion; and as Jefferson Davis failed to overthrow the Government, it is naturally very willing to see any body else undertake the work. The spirit which upon the field and the tortures inflicted at Andersonville were constitutional resistance to coercion, thinks the Chicago Times; but the expression of opinion that loyal men should administer the Government it holds to be "North-ernrebellion." We greatly misunderstand President Johnson if he does not entirely agree with General Grant's expressed opinion, that such a paper as the Chicago Times is one of the chief hindrances of peaceful reorganization of the Union.

GOOD INVESTMENTS

At a time when the price of all kinds of property is declining, and investors are puzzled to know what to do with their money, it may not be out of place to draw attention to two classes of bonds offered for sale, in another column, by the bank of Fisk & Hatch. These are, first, the new Thirty Year Six per cent bonds of the United States Government, issued to aid the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad; and, second, of the Central Pacific Railroad Company's Sevens, interest guaranteed by the State of California. The former are the longest Six per cent. bond yet issued by the General Government; and if, as seems probable, the rate of interest on the public debt be reduced to 4 or 5 per cent. when the Five-Twenties mature, these new Sixes, with the Sixes of 1881, will then command as large a premium as the like security did before the war, when Government bought them up @ 116. It may well be questioned whether, in the event of the continued improvement in the public debt, Government can afford to issue many more such bonds.

The Pacific Railroad Sevens are an equally eligible investment. From the last estimates, it seems pretty certain that the Railroad Company will be able to pay the coupons without difficulty. Should its traffic, however, fall so far below present calculations as to leave a deficit, the State of California is bound to supply the money required to meet the interest on these bonds. The interest on them is payable semi-annually in gold; so that, at the present rate of gold, they are almost a ten per cent. bond, guaranteed by one of the most solvent and honorable States in the Union.



TAKING CARE OF THE HEALTH.

There is an abundance of painstaking on the part of the sick to recover health, but a strange indifference in those who are well to the means of its preservation. We see this contrast strongly marked in relation to consumption, a disease which occasions about one-sixth of all the deaths in the northern portion of this country. In restraining its ravages innumerable more can be done by means of prevention than by those of cure. And yet, partly in the community taken as a whole, but among the intelligent and those who can be deemed decidedly prudent in most matters, very little heed is given to what is said of the causes of this malady for the purpose of escaping them, and this public attention is largely occupied with the delusions of consumption-cures. The same contrast may be seen in regard to other diseases, though in most cases it is not so palpable, because the action of the means of prevention is not so obvious.

Now, what is the manifest failure in loss of health from the endlessly varied causes of disease, the expectation would seem a rational one that there would be, at least with all educated people, more earnest and constant inquiry as to the safeguard against ill-health. Why is it not so? The chief reason probably is, that with the carelessness of vigor and buoyancy of spirits that attend health there is engendered a feeling of absolute security. With this comes in the pressure of present business or gratification. Men are too busy in the pursuit of the objects before them to spare time for the consideration of the laws of health. They pass on, transgressing these laws more or less, till sickness arrests them, and with its impressive lessons compels them reluctantly to attend to the cure of what might have been prevented by reasonable care. Much of this result undoubtedly is the influence of the fact, so commonly observed, that those who write and talk about hygiene are apt to be impracticable visionaries, and their doctrines therefore mostly those who are weak-minded, or are prone to catch up notions and theories, in place of seeking for well-established facts. Such reasoning as is enjoined by some writers and lecturers on health is really so irrational as to degrade the subject, and therefore it is apt to be disregarded by the mind. The true rules for the preservation of health not only commend themselves to reason and common sense, but do not call for such a busy round of appliances as these ultraists recommend, for the human system decidedly prefers to avoid practices of aberration, and will ordinarily keep itself right if it can have fair play. Hygiene is not the cumbersome and repulsive thing that it is so commonly made to be.

It is not merely those who live for the present who are to be censured by what we call fools maxims, that are guilty of sacrificing health by daily inattention to its obvious rules, but very generally those also who live for the good of others and for the eternal future. They are culpably careless in overtaxing their powers, and either out very permaturely or with loss of usefulness to the world unnecessary physical burdens and disquietudes. Hugh Miller is a signal instance. He destroyed his life simply by transgressing the plain hygienic principles which should regulate the use of the brain and nervous system. He had a constitution of singularly great mental labor, with his sturdy frame what a long life of service he might have rendered to his fellowmen! But we are constantly seeing the same thing way to do his duty—for it is in the light of duty that we would put it. There is a real transgression in this neglect to husband properly the physical, mental and physical powers that God has given us. These are talents which we are bound to use in the best manner possible; and if we do not, by improper exercise, wear them out faster than we ought we are accountable for the loss. We do wrong if we tax them to the utmost to-day without regard to their capability of doing the duties of to-morrow. We ought to have an intelligent plan of action which shall take from the accounts of the future to otherwise—to use our powers without due regard to their preservation—as criminal as it would be for a merchant to put a machine to such rapidity of movement as would soon derange it, or even break it down. "It is better to wear out than rust out" is the common proverb used in justification of the error that we have indicated. But surely in excepting an extreme it is not wise to run into the opposite one. The intellectual man has no more right to overtax the brain than the glutton has to overload the stomach.

This subject is most important, and we shall offer some further plain hints upon it.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

BY GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

MR. NEELY.

CHAPTER X.

It is late one afternoon, a few weeks after this, that Edward Arthur, seated in his little room there in Mrs. Bowles's front yard, hears the front gate open and shut, and sees through his window Mr. Neely walking toward the house. In that one glance he sees that Mr. Neely is carefully dressed in his very best; sees all that Mr. Neely has come for; knows almost every syllable of all that Mr. Neely is going to say; sees and knows all this with a sudden glow which tingles him from head to heel—a glow followed by as sudden a chill. We must endeavor to excuse the young minister, the fact being that he has lain wide awake all the previous night on account of the bells.

On account of the bells. At nine o'clock exactly the night before, Bill Perkins, the stage-driver, had driven up to the door of the hotel. Long before he could rein in his horses a dozen voices from the crowd, which now awaits his every arrival in the ample porch of the hotel, hails him—"Any news, Bill? What's the news?"

Bill Perkins is aware of his importance, and is silent and even dignified accordingly. No man there so calm as he, though his team is all in a foam, and he an hour earlier than usual on account of the news which burns in his bosom. Their classic reading being extremely limited, the series of stage-drivers of which Bill Perkins is one are not aware of the fact that they strongly resemble the runners in that one of the old Olympic Games in which each one bears a full speed, and transmits in full blaze to the one next beyond him, a lighted torch. During the last hundred hours or so, each driver on the line, catching the news, with the reins and whip, from the one before, has borne it on like a torch indeed, setting aflame with the great and glorious tidings all the country as he drives along. Perhaps it is on account of its being transmitted so far, and from hand to hand so often, that the torch blazes larger and brighter for every mile it is borne over, as with the very rapidity of its transmission.

"The news! What is the news?" says Bill Perkins, at last, very slowly, and with considerable irritation in his manner. "Ask me if there's any news! I guess there is news!" And Bill Perkins is thereupon silent, enjoying the dependence of the assembled crowd, and all Somerville behind it, upon his single tongue. Here is the possession of power, and, like all of us, he greatly enjoys it. The moment his news is spoken he vanishes from public attention, and he knows it.

"I tell you what it is, you Jake," he says to the negro hostler, amidst the breathless attention of the crowd, "you'd better have them horses a little cleaner when I come to leave to-morrow than they were last time; better had, or I'll Jake you till your very wool 'll come out o' curl! No, they ain't any passengers. What are you unbuckling them straps for? Think I kerry trunks above behind jest for the fun o' the thing? Gentlemen, do shut up till I kin—News? I rather guess there is news! Great battle at Corinth! Glorious victory! Yankees whipped all to smash! Beauregard's taken prisoners all he hasn't killed, an' that's fifty thousand! Battalions, gun-boats, brigades, all kerptured! Sydney Johnson killed, only that's known to be a lie. But get out o' the way, gentlemen, I must drive to the Post-office. Can't you wait till the mail is open and get your papers?"

And having keenly enjoyed his momentary importance, Bill Perkins subsides, as he driver off into private life till the next time.

But the news! It is to the crowd like fire to powder. Such a brightening of faces, such a shaking of hands, such a chorus of yells! People hurry off to their homes to tell it to their waiting families. Men who live in the country can not wait till the mail is opened, but mount their horses, tied hard by, and gallop off at the risk of their necks through the darkness to tell the news at home, then to gallop back again for their papers. Lamum only stops to say, "The bells, boys, the bells! Every bell in Somerville!" and is in the Post-office at his hand in the mail-bag almost before the Postmaster can unlock and draw out the chain through the iron loops thereof.

It is a little strange about Dr. Peel. Up to the arrival of the stage he had been one of the foremost, and certainly the loudest, of the crowd at the hotel awaiting the stage. No man so confident as he was, that "Mark my words, gentlemen, there'll be great news to-night;" consigning his soul most emphatically to perdition if his prophecy is not correct. But Dr. Peel has made many a similar prophecy similarly emphasized before; in fact, he never ceases from prophecies to the same effect all day long and all over Somerville, so that people have come to attach not so much meaning to his words as they used to do. It is strange, that he is not among the foremost in pressing around Bill Perkins when Bill first drives up. Nobody notices him when Bill has first announced the great news, for they would have been surprised at the singular palor of his face as he stands a little back in the shadow cast by the large lamp hanging in front of the hotel from one of the pillars of the porch.

Nobody notices him in the wild excitement of the hour; but he is silent, has ceased to curse and cursing, is suddenly shrunken from his burly prominence,—gone-struck, dumb. It is not for long, however. Ten minutes later, and Dr. Peel's lumbering form and heavy black brow and exclusively Yankee foremost as usual. He can hardly make his voice heard, his own orgasms are ringing at the tavern bell, while Joe Staples, the hotel keeper's little boy, is beating the gong, relieved in turns by such of his companions, specially favored thereby, as are not engaged in firing their revolvers and ringing the church bells.

"Gentlemen," he roars, with stentorian oaths, slapping down a seven-dollar bill upon the bar, as hotel counter as he does so, "there's twenty dollars toward powder to celebrate this glorious news; and there's another twenty dollars more for all who will help me drink success to Beauregard and perdition to the Yankees!"

But there have been more than a dead mere than twenty dollars' worth of powder fired off that night from the two cannon, the four anvils, and the innumerable guns and revolvers of Somerville. As to ten, it was rather many hundreds that went that night across the counters of the taverns there. No cessation of the bells scattering the news meanwhile over all the country for miles around.

All night Lamum is busy in his office reading the papers, writing editorials, answering questions to the crowd pouring through it like a thoroughfare, all flushed and noisy but he. With stooped shoulders, face beaked like a kite, and thin, sharp voice, he is the acknowledged intellect and oracle of the hour, ruling by his very paleness, confidence, and coolness.

There is a tone of asperity even in the manner in which he alludes, from time to time, to the excitement of the hour. "Acting as if you did not know who would whip!" he says. No outward sign thereof; but, ah, how keenly he enjoys the hour! Sweeter taste of bliss this man will never know so long as his soul endures.

All night long people came galloping in on horseback from the country. The dispatches are read over and over again at every bar in town; beside the hotel lamp in front of the hotel; by fathers at home in shirt and drawers and the mothers in night-gowns, and the children starting up from cradle and trundle-bed, wondering and crying. All night neighbors are hurrying into each others' houses to talk it all over; and so, from where the news smote, like a stone in the centre of a lake, there at the hotel door, the waves roll and spread until they die off into all the country around miles away. There has been a slight misunderstanding between Captain Simmons and Bob Withers as a grocery, however.

"What I say is, by George, I want to see all the news confirmed first! Suppose it shouldn't be true, by George?" is what Bob Withers has remarked over and over again as he holds on to an awning post in front of a flaming bonfire.

"Look here, Bob Withers: I tell you, Sir, you mustn't say that; you oughtn't to say that," Captain Simmons has answered, as often as Withers, but only the stiffer in attitude, and the more quarrelsome on that account.

"Confirmed, gentlemen, that's what I say; confirmed is what I want this news to be first. Yes, by George, confirmed!" hiccups Bob Withers, regardless of the Captain.

"Any man, such a glorious night as this, who can refuse to believe news, such news, is a traitor!" says Captain Simmons, still more fiercely. Unlike poor Bob Withers, the Captain prides himself upon being a gentleman in the genteel sense of the word. Were not his powers highly respectable people, members of the church, specially careful in his training? Hence it is the Captain never dresses except in black, even in summer. As to Bob Withers, the drunker he gets the lower he descends. The drunker Captain Simmons is, only that much higher he ascends. When sober, which is becoming a very rare thing with the Captain, he is but a common sort of person; but as he waxes intoxicated his reminiscences of parents, and church, and Bible-class, and college, and the term he served in the Legislature, and all his past respectability in general, become more and more vivid. It is when at his deepest possible point of drunkenness that the Captain is in bearing and language the very Chesterfield of Somerville. He now stands regarding Bob Withers with lofty indignation.

"Confirmed, gentlemen!" exclaims Bob, still more loudly, more dogged in his insane notion, blinking gravely with owlish eyes upon the crowd, "that's what I want, by George!"

"This most disreputable individual is a traitor, gentlemen," says Captain Simmons, slowly and solemnly. "A Yankee at heart, an Abolitionist in disguise. By sainted parents I was carefully instructed never to fight, never even to associate with dreadful scoundrels. This case must be made an exception. He is inebriated. I know, but even his pitiable condition shall be no protection." And the Captain, lifting his cane and advancing upon him, is prevented only by the crowd from inflicting merited chastisement.

But Colonel Ret Roberts is at this juncture dragged out of Lamum's office, after having been called for in vain for the last three hours. Dr. Peel has opened a basket of Champagne, and Colonel Ret Roberts is very drunk by this time, though Dr. Peel and Lamum are not. But zealous friends stand close around the hogshead upon which the Senator totters to catch him when he falls.

Oh, divine gift of eloquence!—given not to one man in multitudes, and not by one man in thousands to whom it is given used but for the basest of purposes. People have heard Colonel Ret Roberts before; no wonder, as the news spreads that he is speaking, all groups break up from hotel, grocery, bonfire, street corner, and hurry toward the spot. In a little while hundreds of excited faces show around him through the half light, half shadow of torch and bonfire as he speaks. The frenzied applause as he stimulates himself to begin drowns even the sounds of scattering shots and the pealings of the church bells, intoxicated with their own clamor.

The bells! As the suggestion had broken from Lamum's lips boys and men had raced off toward every church in Somerville. True, the doors of each church were locked. But what difference did that make? The news, the great news, the glorious news! Sashes were smashed in, doors burst open, the very churches made to take—alas! and not in that way alone during these days—some noisy, rowdiest part in the jubilee. And it is of no use stopping up the access to the bell-ropes afterward. During all these days they hang within open and easy reach to the hand of whosoever chooses to pull.

But the voice of Colonel Ret Roberts rises clear and strong and fascinating above every other sound. Falsehood, fact, fierce invective, anecdote, prophecy, appeal—how smoothly they flow from his lips! No belted earl in Europe has so supreme a contempt for the people as has this South Carolina cavalier; hardly concealed even. He spanks now, as always, not so much to the mob around him, nor for their hearing, as just because he thereby gratifies himself. He speaks as naturally and as necessarily as a river pours its water, or as a mocking-bird sings.

And how they applaud! Men stand there yelling with laughter at his jokes whose dirty business is utterly ruined by what Colonel Ret Roberts and his set have brought to pass. Colonel Juggins has ridden in by this time, summoned through the night and the mud by the tocsin of the bells. How cordially he agreed in the speaker's bitter descriptions of the Abolitionists, not even dissenting at the exciting instant to the horrible oaths with which it is peppered! Colonel Juggins with his plantation swarming with negroes, and so ignorant of the fact that it is just that speaker there before him who, aided by his like, have secured the speedy emancipation of every negro he owns! Abolitionist! For practical abolitionism Wilberforce, Clarkson, Burdett, Beecher, Garrison, Brown, and all the rest, with all their meetings, petitions to Parliament and Congress, speeches, books, papers, pikes, and torches, are, in comparison with Colonel Ret Roberts and his class, but as the jury to the executioner. And not a man in that excited crowd dreams of it!

There is Simpson, the carpenter, listening with both ears, never wincing even when the Colonel culminates his denunciation of the Federal army as being composed of "base mercenaries!" Staples, the hotel keeper, has left his hotel to take care of itself while he can hear Roberts. How he exults in the demoralization of the North, its speedy bankruptcy and ruin, as prophesied by the speaker: so ignorant that, of his three boys turned by the Colonel and his set from thriving citizens into soldiers, one lies at that moment dead at Shiloh, another is to suffer amputation, and consequent death, to-morrow at Corinth, while George, the last but one, is to be returned at the end of the war a drunken loafer until his death. Yes, there stands Staples, his hat left behind in his hurry, his red and enormous crop of hair on head and face full one-fourth of the man it seems, for Staples is but a small man, and was once a tailor; disheveled and bristling under the electric eye of serious news in every fibre, with eyes sparkling through it like those of a ferret, mouth agape, hands extended, how he listens and applauds, and applauds, more of a lunatic than sane to-night!

In the name of God's eternal justice, if Benedict Arnold deserved death for attempting to betray and ruin his country, what do Colonel Ret Roberts and his gang deserve—deserve at the hands of the South, who have so terribly succeeded therein? Let them escape the gallows, unhung as traitors, none the less will they swing forever in the chains of history as the greatest criminals that ever blundered through blood and mire since the days of Cain—criminals whose wickedness was exceeded only by their folly!

"Sheep, sheep, sheep," Mr. Ferguson has been murmuring to himself all night; "and herded here and herded there, as sheep always are, by smart dogs," adds Mr. Ferguson to himself, from recollections of his native hills and glens. As to believing in the news of the night, not exactly. Mr. Ferguson disbelieved it in advance when he first heard, that night, the rattle of the approaching stage. He disbelieved it still more strongly when he heard the great noise that was kicked up announcement. Truth is, by this time Mr. Ferguson and Somerville occupy in regard to each other opposite ends of an ever-moving plank, like children playing see-saw. When Somerville goes down in heart up goes the Scotchman, never so cheerful as when his friend and fellow-citizen are gloomiest. To-night Somerville revels in the ascendant over Yankees and universe, but very low in spirits is the Scotchman, indignant all the time at himself for being so, the news being, whatever it is, so absurd! Not that he would even have felt so unmanly a pain in nature; being all a lie, why should he?

There was one satisfaction in it—he would have another flaming sheet to add to his collection. Beginning with the summer of the burnings, he already had a large one. Not a placard posted on the walls of Somerville from the first in relation to the matter, not a notice of thanksgiving for victory, not a sermon upon the war preached by politician or bishop, not a document of the kind had so far come within his reach but he had seized upon and placed it, in its due order, upon file.

If any man tried desperately to sleep that night Mr. Ferguson did, but Mr. Ferguson did not succeed, the bells were too much for him.

As to the Union people in general, you saw few of them in the streets that night. Doctor Warner went to the office for his paper—but that is no rule. Mrs. Warner made him go. She read the paper on his return, sitting up in bed in her night-cap, the Doctor holding the candle, and enduring in his own heart the pain, like his wife, that the Federal defeat of Shiloh ever again. There were others of the Union people who glided swiftly and stealthily into the office, obtained their papers, and stalled them on their return home—gathering far less cause for the pealing bells and the shouts of cannon and bonfires than others found. It is astonishing, it is perfectly amazing, they should find so much to exult in! they said to themselves—each to his own confidence, to each other next day of the people of Somerville; yet they themselves were far, very far, from being so cheerful under the circumstances as, according to their own views of the tidings, they should have been.

In Secession, as in every town on earth, there existed what may be called the wavering one-third. That is, another third was still more decidedly of the conviction that the tidings were wrong, and had nothing but evil to expect in consequence; the remaining third believed in nothing so clearly, inflexibly, and unreasonably as this—that the winning side was the right side. When with Unionists the waverer was a Unionist too, but "Bless me, we must be guarded in our language during such times as these, you know!" When with Secessionists the waverer was, "Nevertheless, somewhat doubtful about the step at first, but now that we are in it, of course there is but one course left us; we must all agree in that, I suppose!" And now that this last new idea came, the waverer, when with the Secessionists, shakes hands and congratulates the universal smiling and hand-shaking, gladly lost among the crowd. When thrown in private with his Union friend the waverer shakes his head special to somewhat arches his brows and gives a mournful shrug of his shoulder at the delusion of the religionist. The sympathy of Somerville with such a man as Guy Brooks just now—Scottish pealing with all its cannon in his ears—is very much that of the Frenchman of old with all his hat to the antique statue of Jupiter. "Who knows," said the Gaul, "but he may get his head above some one more?"

When the first stroke of the first bell smote on the ear of Edward Arthur, studying in his room, it struck him—it may be also proper here to say of a Southern born, Southern raised man, but none the less must the truth be told—a cruel blow.

"It is the last desperate effort of the Yankees to subjugate the South," Mrs. Bowles had said, before the tea came, that night at the table. "They obtained a partial and greatly-exaggerated success at Fort Donelson, on account of their gunboats. Our Generals were overpowered, perhaps cowardly, then. The South was slumbering in full belief the war was over; but now that our armies are in front of each other near Corinth you will see a different result. Their gun-boats can not help us there. Our Generals are experienced and brave. The entire South has swarmed to their assistance. I believe in our army! I believe in the success of that of a people struggling to be free from cruel tyranny; I believe in a just God, above all, and I know a glorious victory is near!" said Mrs. Bowles, with glowing cheek. "If it was not that Rutledge Bowles is at the head of his Company in Virginia, soon to be reinforced, here I would only regret he is not at Corinth to share that great victory!"

And now hardly has the pastor seated himself after this in his room before the bells, and the shouts, and the roar of cannon announce that Mrs. Bowles is right. And now he has hear the instant and joyful bustle in the house. He hears Mrs. Bowles hurry the negro Charles down to the office for the papers. He hears Alice and her mother conversing eagerly together as they await his return. He hears Charles return, and hear Alice reading aloud the dispatches to her mother; hears Mrs. Bowles's loud "Oh, thank God! thank God!" mingled with certain weeping. Had it been in regard to any thing else in the world he would have been with them, and one with them.

But as it is? A great gulf yawns between him and the rejoicing town; between him and the very family in which he lives, heretofore one in his thinking; between him and Alice! There is a pause; and then the voice of Alice at the piano rings clear to the song of Dixie, and then of the Bonnie Blue Flag. There is another pause; then Alice plays more slowly, sings more sweetly: it is a Psalm the time—the Forty-sixth Psalm. Edward Arthur well knows why: it was the Psalm sung, he has often heard Mrs. Bowles tell, in the Major's father's family in the Union household, which, back, after the news of the surrender of Cornwallis. All this, and he sitting there in his room separated from all the rest!

Shall he dash away from him every thing, go in the house, congratulate them, and join them in song, rejoice with them—with Alice—with the whole world rejoicing around? He sinks his head upon his hands resting on the table before him, and tries to go over the whole question of Secession from the first. Was Secession a right thing? During these last two years has he, in reading and in conversation, made himself perfectly familiar with every thing that can be said on both sides of the question? Has he brought to the investigation no prejudices or partialities except in favor of the South, in which he has loved all his life, or of which he has never expressed or desires to be as long as he lives. Distrustful of himself, he has ever sought divine guidance in regard to himself and his course. Now he sinks upon his knees, and goes again over the whole subject in the language and feeling of prayer. How ardently he had prayed for Secession, under all the circumstances, to have been a right thing before man and before God! But with all the keen sense of right he had been singing at the instant in his ears, for his life he can not effect the slightest, most momentary acquirement in himself of a sense that Secession was—is a wrong thing. But so many at the South disagree with him here? He can not help it! In his conscience it is a grave wrong. But so many pious Christians, learned and pious ministers have believed in it, have written and preached in its favor, have entered into it as the very cause of right and truth and God himself? They are more learned, more holy than he! Is it unlawful; may it not be, to him Secession was—is wrong, wrong! He may be deluded, may be insane, but to him Secession is as much a wrong as Secession is to him as clearly a crime as ever.

Only a little time ago, he remembers, the whole land, North, South, East, West, thought and felt as he thinks and feels to-night. All were unanimous then, at least that people who believe in Secession being regarded, such a little while ago, and by the whole land, with contempt and disbelief, should have any weight with men. He can remember how that sentiment ran through the speeches of all public men, the leading articles of all public journals, the talk of preachers, the platform addresses on all anniversaries, the very school readers and hymns for Sabbath-school celebrations in every country town. And to-night, like a man in full health suddenly dragged into a hideous dream, he finds himself, as it were, alone in the midst of sentiment, all the world changed as in an instant to believe with all their soul in exactly the reverse. But he has not changed! He is the same man that he could have done so; but he has not, and he can not help it. It was—it is a great crime!

Then all that Mrs. Bowles had said to him yesterday comes into his mind. There is no man in Somerville with whom he has held such sweet and intimate converse. Next to Alice, and as with Mr. Ellis, the member and pillar of his church. He has a friendship for Guy Brooks, and the keen sense of all that is noble in devotion piety of Mr. Ellis. He has often conversed, and very agreeably, with Guy Brooks on church matters; but he has never conversed with Mr. Ellis as has with Mr. Ellis, deep into the night, there by his study fire, or here in his chamber, upon doctrines principles, and the like, unveiling to him in Christian friendship, the closest and sweetest of all on earth, the deepest experiences of his soul. He has often talked with Guy Brooks in prayer in private; but it was Mr. Ellis whose devotional spirit rose with his own to the throne of mercy, in the wrestlings of living faith for the common cause of their hearts. Was there a proof of affection and confidence for which Mr. Ellis had not given? Blameless in life, prudent in speech, sincere in soul, liberal of his means to the last cent, and of his valuable typ pious, Mr. Ellis had been the man of all men he had ever known to whom he had clung closest.

"You know I was a Union man to the very last," his friend had said to him only yesterday.

"We agreed perfectly in sentiment on that point. But the country was in convulsion now. We are both Southern men; have and desire to have no country but the South. Well, the South has established her own government nation from the North. We both opposed the step, but it has been taken, and we are not responsible for it. In the provisions of the Confederacy being a nation, and we the citizens there-of, our duty is clear. You know the maxim: 'My Country, right or wrong!'"

And here Mr. Arthur had cried out against this maxim, and left the subject, and left them where they were before.

"When the North actually declared war upon us"—Mr. Ellis continued, at last—"war upon us, think of that! Actual war, simply for desiring a peaceful separation from them, from all that time my feelings have undergone a complete change. I am glad we did separate from a people capable of taking such a course—such a wicked, diabolical step! Henceforth I have no wish but for the success of our arms, and for the defeat, destruction if need be, of the Northern Government. You have not a warmer friend in the world than I am," adds good Mr. Ellis, raising his paster by the hand, the tears standing in his eyes as he speaks; "from my soul I admire and love you—am your sincere friend. Don't mistake in your reasoning. I contend, as ever, for the sake of our friendship, for the sake of Christ's cause—"

If Edward Arthur could only have got his friend then and there to have united with him in prayer, first for wisdom, and then have discussed together the whole thing at the core and centre of it all—Slavery. But he dared not do it. An Abolitionist! Horror. Why Mr. Ellis would have—what would he not have said and done?

As if, deep down under all, Mr. Ellis, and every other Christian at the South was not thinking, in various stages of advance, exactly the same thoughts!

Yet it was strange, too. Long after war had been begun Mr. Ellis had little to say upon the subject. Week after week the pastor, Guy Brooks, Mr. Ferguson, and Mr. Ellis, besides other church-members, met for prayer. On every one of these occasions Mr. Ellis had led in prayer, had prayed for peace, had prayed that God's will might be done, but had never once prayed distinctly for the Confederacy, never for the success of arms and the defeat of its foes. As the months rolled on, Mr. Arthur, standing still himself, could perceive a change in his friend. Little by little he would have scouted, and did scout, with horror the idea of his son Henry going to the war. Mr. Ellis's counsel had been to avoid it, to give up his office to Moloch, were his own words often repeated to his pastor. But at last, Henry did go. Mr. Comfort's Rifle was raised changed. Now he began to pray earnestly for the Confederacy, to give freely up to and expend his money to the demands made upon him toward it; to feast upon the papers, believing all they said of success to the Confederate arms; to seek and gain eagerly in all meetings of street conversations; in a word, to outdo many even of the most violent "from-the-start Secessionists."

As the young minister knelt there in his room, with the bells pealing in his ears, he well knew what no man in Somerville was enjoying more than Mr. Ellis in the news. "We must cease looking back, cease reasoning upon the matter," Mr. Ellis had said yesterday, "and simply give way now to our feelings, to our natural and hearty feelings, as citizens of a nation invaded by a hateful foe."

"But was not Secession a wrong thing?" Mr. Arthur had asked.

"Well, yes, in a certain sense it was," Mr. Ellis had replied.

"And is not this a war, on the part of the North, but an energetic attempt to put down a wrong thing? Is it not, this war, a desperate attempt on the part of the South to establish a right wrong? Have not our hope for the blessing of God, Mr. Ellis, on any effort to establish any wrong? Dare you deliberately pray to God to give success to a wrong?" said the minister.

"All this is mere morbid fancy, Mr. Arthur. Fight? yes, it is the duty of every man in the South to fight. I have sent Henry! I tell you, Sir," continued Mr. Ellis, a fire gleaming in his eyes while he spoke, "I have been there a few months ago, "if there are any among us who are unwilling to go and fight for the Confederacy I would have them torn by force from their homes and made to go; if they are of no other use than to pray, they can pray make breast-works there for those who do love their country."

Mr. Arthur had never been calmer in his life than when he replied, rising as he spoke: "Mr. Ellis, we once thought and felt exactly alike in this matter. We can not do so now. Until this hour exactly where I have always stood—must always stand. Wrong is of the Devil. Right is of God. Any cause against my country, and a Right is eternally a Right. He who fights for the Wrong and against the Right fights for the Devil and against God. I will lift up my right arm wither from its socket before I strike a blow for the one and against the other!"

Only because he was a man of the vague, undefined, instinctive apprehension of a deeper, more desperately wrong thing than that, under that, and of which that was but the second and deadly root, Secession had naturally sprung?

Yes, Edward Arthur—the bells pealing in his ears—could see the error of that to which they had gone over and over and over again so often during the weary months past. Has not the South pleaded that it was in its very nature to be and most desperate men in it? he asked himself. Many a Mr. Ellis drawn into it now: perhaps many a better man than he. Has not the South had at the outset—but that its leaders are men who occupied, two years ago, a position in the esteem of the country, the reverse of that to which they have now risen who can deny? And, suppose Secession successful, what is that but the certain remaining apart, for all time to come, of the South, of States held together by so fragile a tie? Will not Secession be ever before the mind as the easy remedy for any dissension among States? And what is my country, my nation, then? Will not Secession, in such a Confederacy toward nations abroad? What permanency in such a loosely-bound nation for the building of any thing—for the founding of great institutions? What hope for the peaceful spread of civilization and the Gospel in a region perpetually in danger, at best, of crumbling into fragments? Shall I desire and pray that the South may succeed in this effort to make itself another South America of wrangling and warring provinces?

And suppose the Confederacy successful as against the Northern does not the one existing cause—Slavery—still exist? With such a line of frontier, with such hostility to Slavery North, with such jealousies and rivalries, could a peace between two such nations last six months? That, Slavery! Old, and stale, and hackneyed reasoning, perhaps now; but to Edward Arthur that night they were living things with which he wrestled as for his life!

It is an awful contest with long conflict that, on this afternoon after the night of bells, Edward Arthur sees Mr. Neely enter the house of Mrs. Bowles, and in a little visit to Alice, and especially to the daughter.

Just a word or two in regard to Mr. Neely, while he waits on the front porch for Charles to answer his knock. A tall man is Mr. Neely, with fair hair and florid face. When he first came South Mr. Neely had always replied, "Kentucky," when asked where he was from. Because having made an extensive tour of that State before settling in Somerville, he was from Kentucky. But his fair and rosy face was against him; he had always to acknowledge, at last, that shameful and painful fact of having been originally from New Hampshire; in fact, hard to say, "born there." Mr. Neely's body is one of perpetual motion—hands, eyes, feet, tongue—it was only because it was an instrument thoroughly adapted to the purpose of restless motion.

One definite purpose Mr. Neely had in life—to succeed. That is, to obtain as much position and property as he could, in the shortest time, and from being singular. Starting from New England with just one hundred dollars in gold, a good suit of clothes, an old-fashioned watch, once belonging to his father and his father's father, a pleasant person, a ready wit, he had gone into the South as a peddler. Success was it was the first thing that turned up. But it had occurred to him as a thing still better to study a law, and soon after the close of hostilities as a means of support—glorious Daniel Webster before him in that—while he masters enough legal knowledge to practice. Then he would look out an unprincipled man; Mr. Neely would not do a dishonest deed for the world—an undoubted, by undoubted, dishonest thing. Success—but Mr. Neely, all this apart, is resolved to succeed.

Now it is not in New Hampshire that Mr. Neely is expecting to succeed, but in Somerville and the South. Therefore Mr. Neely must adapt himself to Somerville. Mr. Neely has a way that "Hadn't oughter" grates upon the ears of Somerville, and never again does that expression pass his lips. Mr. Neely knows that the calling any one to an account for a thing is vastly better expressed by "obliging" calling them to order for it, but he would prefer death to such language. Mr. Neely often speaks of "throwing a rock," but of such a thing as "throwing" he has never read or heard in the Bible. Cheerfully does Mr. Neely's memory change "evening" for "night," and as freely does he give up "chores" for "jobs" and all other forms of speech unadapted to his new meridian. There now lingers not even the knowledge of one in Somerville, but that the native of Northern New Hampshire and in the old church there, and so unknown in Somerville—why, Mr. Neely has long since ceased even to wonder at it in himself, on principle. "Identify myself with the South" is Mr. Neely's one, plain path; and the only question is, what and wherein is that line, great and small, is simply, which is the Northern, which the Southern side of this matter? Somerville says by this, by that, and makes the Northern and clings to the Southern Pole of the question by a second nature which has become as Southern.

In a word, Somerville contains many hundred Southern-born individuals, but Mr. Neely is the most intensely Southern person in that town, in comparison with the born Southerners, we mean. There are a plenty of other men there —Lamunion, and Mr. Johnson—who feared that he had an argument with some one in which he was defeated. We all remember how many of our generals were making in this defeated condition: "At least, Sir, it was I myself, at last, who furnished my imaginary opponent with all the ammunition with which he defeated me!" The North may flatter itself or bewail itself on the fact as it please, but a goodly number—and the desperation of Southern resistance was owing to muskets and pens in Northern hands under the flag of the Confederacy—New England and New England resolve where raged the battle fiercest in council or in field.

"Mr. Neely is a native of South Carolina, Sir," Dr. Peel had one day replied to Mr. Neely. Dr. Peel was a dark, superb-looking man, almost dazzling in his head-bearing and his words were spoken with his black eye full upon Mr.

Neely, and in tones, to Mr. Neely's ear, so distinct and frigid: "I am a prince of the blood, Sir," would scarce have sounded nobler. Ah, how mean New Hampshire, and how plebeian Mr. Neely to himself, in comparison!

By no one was Mrs. Bowles congratulated, that day after the bells, in her parlor, more cordially than by Mr. Neely. No one had a brighter smile or a more hearty grasp of the hand on the occasion. If there was any defect in Mr. Neely's mind that he was too glad, he never took. But this one thing, brought with him from his bracing mountains, Mr. Neely could not unlearn: this one Southern thing he had not unlearned—to be still. Not that Southerners are not demonstrative enough, but then they are quiet within; and this Mr. Neely could not be.

"A most wonderful victory, Madam," said Mr. Neely, rubbing his hands; "the complete rout of Secession. You will perceive, in my dispatch, Beauregard remarked on the spot that it was a more complete thing than Manassas even. I rejoice sincerely in it."

And no doubt Mr. Neely did. He opened his school with prayer every morning, and never had had Secession in more than a mental petition therein for the victory of the South, and for "the speedy and total defeat of our cruel and implacable foes." Of late he had got into the custom of making little addresses to his school, descriptive of the wickedness of the North and of the glorious and successful revolution which the South was embarked in. As to giving the boys a bulletin of the good news of last night, he would certainly have done that if there had only come to school that morning, which, however, they did not do, having voted themselves a holiday already, and altogether irrespective of Mr. Neely—the fact being that Mr. Neely was the most thoroughly unpopular individual in the school. "Old Neely?" any boy would indignantly exclaim on being remonstrated with on some special act of impertinence to his teacher, "why, old Neely is a Yankee!"

Yes, it was hard, very hard! No man could have been an earlier Secessionist or a more consistent Secessionist than the schoolmaster. His whole language had from the outset been of unwavering and unmitigated hostility to the North. Other men would venture to make exceptions in favor of "some, at least, it is to be hoped—some, however few," to the North; Mr. Neely would not in conscience make any such exceptions. In teaching his boys History he constantly kept up the striking parallel in their minds between the Revolution of '76 and that in which the South was now engaged. He required compositions from every pupil old enough to write them upon the topic of the day, and applauded most highly those in which the Yankees were most terribly assailed. "There is no Tyrant of the Roman Empire, and Lincoln is the Tyrant of America," "Only Powder and Steel can cure the evils of its Fluency," "Jefferson Davis is the Washington of our New Nation," and the like, were the copies set by him for his pupils. Nor did he once highly praise anything he had appeared in the Somerville Star signed N., which Mr. Neely had never denied as being from his pen. In fine, if Mr. Neely had been to undone in proof of his sincere devotion to the cause of Secession it is impossible to imagine what that thing was. When he arrived in Somerville he possessed a Daguerreotype of his father. A large man and a very good-looking one, and an honest, fatherly, clear-countenanced old patriarch the elder Mr. Neely seemed to be therefrom. But this he recorded here had been deliberately broke to stoms and stamped, in his own words, "to flinders" beneath his heel that likeness of the chief fetyron of the world. It may be added that of this he afterward boasted with all phrases suitable to such a deed? Artistically considered this could not to be recommended on account of its improbability, yet was it simple fact.

And yet? True as it is of the teacher it is equally so of all other Northern-born Secessionists—they never were thoroughly trusted and believed in as they really "sound."

"It isn't nature," Mrs. Juggins was continually remarking to husband and visitors, "for any body to turn so agin their own people as he needn't tell me what good Secessionists that Lamun an' Neely an' the rest are, I don't believe a bit more than myself. And there's Mary Barker," adds Mrs. Juggins, after a long pause, approaching the subject with reluctance. "Oh, I know how true and how much to be trusted she—somehow—yes. Ah, well, don't it 'pear to you Brother Barker is too feverish like, kind o' over-fond?" Mrs. Juggins looking up inquiringly and inquiringly in the eyes as she knits.

And this was the universal feeling whether expressed or not. The more violent Secessionists Northern men were, only that much the more did people murmur, "Only put on: you'll see one day if I isn't!" In matters not political and consistent in his course Lamum, for instance, was; though mortal could say no more against his faith and for the South than he, though he harped perpetually on the infamy and the merited haiter of "the traitors among us," at last grew were only suspicious—"I wouldn't all of them!"—to the greatest degree. Had any one of them been detected in the worst practices of the incendiary and Abolitionist, the universal chorus would have broken forth, "A Yankee! I always knew it!"

Mrs. Bowles was pleased to see Mr. Neely, however, and conversed eagerly with him on the glorious news—an unconscious condescension running through all her manner, as of a South Carolina lady conversing with a New Englander —a condescension not more assuming to her part than taken for granted on his. To do female born and living at the North would or could Mr. Neely have been so obsequious, so defer-ntial. It is an unpleasant thing to write, but it is a fact.

But in all Mr. Neely's conversation, though he studiedly limself mainly to Mrs. Bowles, it was with chief reference to Miss Alice that he spoke. The truth is, the man really admired and loved the beautiful and queenly girl as he never loved or admired a woman before. There was a majesty in her erect bearing, a dignity inherited from her stately old father the Major, in her reserve, a serene soul in her full and steady eye, which was more to him even than her glowing cheek and curling lip. He had never seen such a thing in America, but it was the old story of plebeian and aristocrat, squire of low degree aspiring to the hand of dame. Marriage in South Carolinian! It was next to being born there!

"And it must be a great gratification to you, Miss Alice," he said, at last, "that the flag you presented that day to the regiment was in the fight." And Mr. Neely looked back complacently to the day of its presentation, Alice standing on the platform with the colors in her hand, saying a few thrilling words, and receiving a cheer and look and attitude than with tongue, a goddess to him from that moment henceforth and forever. For the moment Alice had entirely forgot both herself and her flag, and there was a sort of "heroine of '76" over again. But, under all this cry of "Our Country!" "Our Glorious Confederacy!" "Our gallant Army!" "Our despicable foes!" there steadily ran this fact, we are fighting for our homes. Ugly enough word for Southern ears—slavery! No, not a thought, an unpleasant but unfleshed consciousness thereof.

"Yes," said Alice; "I am glad more anxious to know the fate of the men that received it, just now, than any thing else." Whereupon Mr. Neely slightly turned his conversation upon their bravery, mingled with reasonings to show why he did not think, at least sincerely hoped, they had not suffered much in the contest. "And you have not heard, you tell me, from Lamun, Captain Lamun, Miss Bowles?" he said at last, turning to Mrs. Bowles.

"Only that he is at the head of his company in Virginia," said Mrs. Bowles.

"I suppose we shall be compelled to inflict another Manassas upon them there. Perhaps the more defeat of the kind may satisfy them," said Mr. Neely.

"Rutledge Bowles was then in Charleston," said Mrs. Bowles, with a sudden pallor. He assures me in his last letter that he will be in the next battle, orders or no orders, wherever he thinks it likely to be fought. I suppose he and many of the youth of South Carolina can not feel as satisfied with Mr. Davis and his arrangements as could be wished. There is a little hard that South Carolina should be second to Mississipi, taking the lead in the revolution the more by many than Sumter Sate did. It is only for the present, however."

Thereupon Mr. Neely entered upon a glowing eulogy of South Carolina, which resulted, too, in the midst of which the bell rang for supper.

"Really, I had completely forgotten myself," he said, as he rose in a manner than when he first came, and with perhaps somewhat more of hesitation and of apology for possible intrusion of self-consciousness. "I have been so interested—"

"You will excuse me, Mr. Arthur," said Mrs. Bowles, when the door had closed upon the table, "but you are really looking as if you had just risen from a severe illness. It was a fact; the poor newspaper boy, Edward, Arthur had suddenly strong at the moment with the rosy and happy countenance of Mr. Neely by his side.

"Yes, Madam," he replied, gravely; "it was the reply of that gentleman as he endeavored to assume a more cheerful manner.

"Why, as to that, you have slept last night," said the schoolmaster. "Glorious news! Was it not, Mr. Arthur?"

"Oh, the infatuation, the pressing the almost hourly temptation to lying those days! What is the use of talking about dissembling, evading, putting off of telling the truth, and all? Had Sarah is Satan, God is God, a lie is a lie! And the lying, downright lying, on the part of the British people at the time, and ever since, on the at least—was one of the most terrible demoralizations of the times. If ever necessity, the fear of consequences, the unparalleled excitement of a case, justified people in this, of course they were completely justified. But can any thing make a wrong be right? Better, surely, a thousand man that he must sin? Alice was cutting cake at the moment, but how keenly she was on the alert for Mr. Arthur's reply, though she raised not her eyes.

"Has any confirmation of it as yet arrived, Mr. Neely?" asked Mrs. Bowles, anxiously.

"Confirmation? It needs no confirmation!" exclaimed astonished Mr. Neely. "The victory is one we already know to be glorious. Victory over the armies joined. The only question was one of place and day."

"You must pardon me if I seem to cast a gloom on the matter, but I frankly confess that my dominant feeling since the news came is one of sorrow," said the minister.

"Sorrow, Mr. Arthur!" exclaimed Mrs. Bowles and Mr. Neely in the same breath.

"At the awful destruction of human life," said the minister, and Alice breathed again. "You know my profession has habituated me to look on things in that light. Pardon me; but to think of a civil war in our country, not in France or Italy, but actually in America! A battle on our soil, with all its hideous carnage! I say nothing about souls hurried by thousands, unprepared many of them, into eternity. Again, pardon me, but you must blame my profession."

And thus Mr. Arthur told part of the truth; but did he tell really the truth in telling only a part?

But not for nothing had Mr. Neely been born in New England. "Why, Mr. Barker is of your profession, and I saw him last night listening to Colonel Ret Roberts, and I really believe he was the happiest man there!"

Mr. Neely was right. Brother Barker was there, and was as happy, to say the least, as any man on the ground. So happy, that in drinking down the Colonel's speech he had not time on the instant even to object mentally to the immoderate oaths, and to its blood-thirsty atrocities. Yes, on that night Barker, as he applauded every sentiment with both of his long hands more emphatically than ever. Whatever Secession had arrested at once the regular annual income of every Bible Society, Tract institution, Missionary Board—domestic and foreign—as well as every other Benevolent Association in the land; what though it was pouring over the land, through the agency of innumerable hands of Colporteurs, Agents, and Society such a torrent of Profanity, Sabbath Desecration, Intemperance, and all kindred evils as the most godless-minded and never dared even to fear: what though ministers were starving at their ministry, or driven from it into other pursuits, churches were being split into fragments and dissolved, all religious worship being comparatively abandoned save in the political sermons and proclamation prayers: members of churches and even ministers backsliding and apostatizing by multitudes; what though the minds of nearly all men were being hardened a thousandfold more in irreligion; even the coming generation blasted in advance by the utter destruction, and the inevitable corruption, mind and heart, by the times, of the very children. What though the cause thereof, avowedly, was the Devil's Church on earth —that of the Gospel—was perishing beneath the deadly influences of war in the land—civil war —yet on that night Brother Barker, minister, clergyman, and heretofore among all beneath Colonel Ret Roberts in eloquence that night.

Ah, if Brother Barker had been the only minister of the sort! It was indeed the hour of the Saviour's crucifixion afresh. Never speak of the soldiers gambling at his feet, regardless of his fellow blood, nor of the taunting multitude, nor of the darkness that covered the earth, nor the quivering beneath, next to the hiding of the Father's face, the darkest, bitterest thing was that, even of Christ's dying hour, that many may come to be reading: "They all forsook him, and fled." We speak not of you who clung all the closer to your Saviour, who continued to the end the ringing spirit of the world, with strong crying to God during all that hour of darkness. You who, humbly with God, were with Him, or as bearing with the South then, kept most heartily of all to Christ—one with each other at least in that—alas that, through you, your number seemed so small in those days of Satan's hour, and the Power of Darkness!

"For my part I do not wonder Mr. Barker should rejoice," said Mr. Neely, after having waited in vain for the minister's reply. "With him, I believe, the cause of the North to become thoroughly infidel. This is a religious war—a war for Scripture doctrine in regard to Slavery against Anti-Scripture, and all the other infidel isms of the North. Mr. Barker rejoices in the defeat of the North as in the defeat of irreligion itself—do I not, Sir?"

"Mr. Neely," said Alice at this juncture, "have been about England and old Scotland—all Protestant England?"

"I do not exactly understand your question, Miss Alice," said Mr. Neely, intensely on the alert.

"I mean, only for argument sake, you know," said Alice, "that the Protestant Europe were to put this question with the North or with the South?"

"Really, I am not sure," began Mr. Neely. But he saw that Alice knew, as well as he himself knew, the facts of the case. "With the North, I believe," he added, under the stress of his clear and queenly eye.

"And are they all infidel?" began Alice.

"I tell you what I frankly think; I mean I shall frankly tell you what I really and truly believe, and that is, that almost the whole Christian Church is becoming infidel, Jacobinical. By Abolitionizing and Secessionizing the old French notions of freedom and equality."

"I think I know what Jacobin means," said Alice, her pale cheek tinged with inquiry upon him.

"In this strife, Miss Alice, between Jacobinism, then, and Conservatism, between infidelity and the Gospel, as I say, I do believe that there is only one spot on the globe in which the pure and genuine Gospel lingers, and that is in the South. I am not one of those who call Africa, Africa—is to be found in South Carolina. I myself was born at the North," continued Mr. Neely, with emphasis, "but I am not one," as if to say such a thing, I would give millions to have been born, of all the world, in South Carolina."

Yes, Mr. Neely actually said just that!

Mrs. Bowles cordially approved the sentiment, and assured Mr. Neely how highly she felt honored. Alice never raised her eyes from her plate.

"Therefore," said Mr. Neely, after some further conversation, "if I, a Northern man, rejoice so in the success of Southern arms, I am sure you must, Mr. Arthur."

"It is impossible for me not to rejoice in whatever may be for the interest and real welfare and prosperity of the South, Mr. Neely," replied the other. "I have every inducement, and it would be unnatural and simply impossible that I should feel otherwise."

And yet, somehow, his reply did not satisfy Mrs. Bowles.

"I am perfectly ignorant of military matters," said Alice at last, "but I do not understand what is meant when the dispatch says that Beauregard fell back from Shiloh some twenty miles to Corinth. I am confident of the gallantry of our soldiers; but why fall back?"

Thereupon Mr. Neely hastened to explain matters, showing that it was a kind of military strategy almost invariably adopted by victorious armies. Alice listened, but replied not.

"Oh, you haven't mind Alice, Mr. Neely," said Mrs. Bowles, at length. "She is a willful girl, and she has an independent habit of her own. She is always endeavoring to form her own conclusions on every subject. When she once gets a notion in her head it is impossible to reason with her. She reads more or more and more of her father, Major Bowles. But, Alice, do let us have some music. We are not tired of Dixie yet—at least not a few of us for the South!—or the Bonnie Blue Flag—any thing."

"What do you say to Yankee Doodle, or Hail Columbia, or the Star-spangled Banner, Mr. Neely?" said Alice, looking back upon that gentleman, with her hands upon the keys of the instrument.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

OF THE FASHIONABLE COLORED HAIR.—"Dear me," said Mr. Guy, "why nowadays all the young gals is light-headed."

A NEW NAME FOR A SEAMSTRESS.—Miss Sew and Sew.

"How fast wicked men can go on in their sins!" exclaimed a good but unenlightened old lady; "it only takes ten minutes to light a fire."

Conceited people are always happy; they do so enjoy themselves.

A lady, complaining how rapidly time stole away, said, "Alas! I am 30 years thirty." "Do you?" said Mr. Haines, for you will get further from that frightful epoch every day."

Why are the English people like the ox of roasting?—Because they are a very-hoary-nation.

When is it useless to try to borrow a book?—When it is Lent.

The following story is told of a father of the church, of an ecclesiastical character, who was called to the use of the rod in inculcating up children. The doctor took the instrument, and the chief operator was a young minister, whose reputation for veracity was not high. He mistakenly thinking that he often do learn to distinguish by unjust punishment, from not knowing the facts of the case, the boy's mother, in a hurry, called out, "Stop, stop, you are so telling the truth." "Well," retorted the doctor, "it's turned you'd do, didn't it?"

"Good blood will show itself," as the old lady said when she was struck with the redness of her nose.

"Mother, what's in the pot?" "A pig's head and tatoes, dear." "Mother, I wish you'd tell Mrs. Smith that she got pepping in the pot, when she saw one of the turnips in the pig's mouth." "Mother, mother!" she cried. "What's the matter?" "Oh, nothing, if you don't come quick the pig will eat all the turnips!"

Artemus Ward tells a good story concerning the professor of the fine art of horse as he took Lord Dundreary: "An aged Mormon arose and went out with his sewing-for wives, and having said he was going to set and sew, he play where a man made such a cussed fool over one wife."

Why is John Bigger's boy larger than his father?—Because he is little Bigger.

MILK AND WATER.—A lad, on delivering his milk in the morning ago to a neighboring lady, was asked why the milk was so warm. "I don't know," he replied, with much simplicity, "unless they put warm water into it instead of cold."

John Randolph met an enemy on the street one day, who refused to give him the wall, which, as a lady, he never turned out for a rascal. "I do," said Randolph, stepping aside and politely raising his hat; "pass on, Sir."

To what tribe do Scotch Jews belong?—Mac-Abees.

A letter was mailed in one of our post-offices the other day that had no postage stamp on it, but in place of it a stamp had the following written on one corner of the envelope: "My Postmaster, will charge no postage on this; the stamp wouldn't stick, so I tore the thing up."

Why did Adam when close did the day very long?—Because it was always morning without Eve.

"I am glad this coffee don't owe me any thing," said a book-keeper to his wife the other morning at breakfast. "Why so?" was the response. "Because I don't believe it would ever pay."

"Hallos, Bridget! what o'clock is it, and where's the chicken-pie?" "It's eight, Sir."

An exchange gives reasons for not publishing a poetic effusion as follows: "It is the rhythm of the pumpkins rolling over a barn floor, while some lines appear to have been measured with a yard-stick, and others with a ten-foot pole."

"The next time I catch you alone, Tom Wilkins, I'll give you a good thrashing!" was the angry bully of the play-ground to a mild-looking boy. "Well," quietly and significantly replied Tom, "if I don't often ought alone, as I generally have my fast and fate with me."

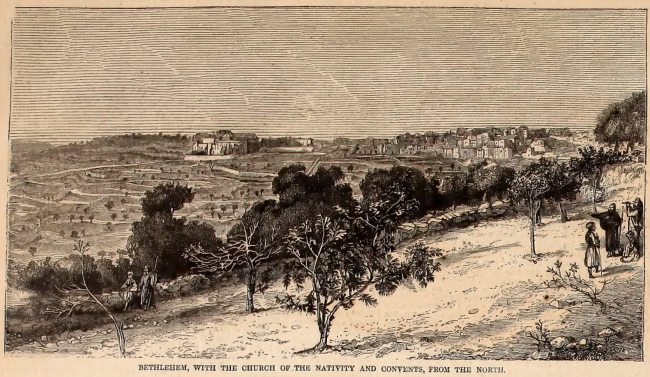
WOMAN'S MIRROR—Sub-mission.

A coquette is said to be a perfect incarnation of Cupid, as she keeps her bean in a quiver.

THE CHILI QUESTION.—"How's your cold?"

It has been discovered that Othello held a legal as well as a military appointment in Venice. He was a Gen-eral.

What is the worst seat a man can sit on?—Self-conceit.



A warning needed at all fashionable assemblages—Look out for the pairs!

NEW ARICH.—A charm in the bank in worth two in the bush.

"Tity," said a mother to her daughter, who had seen but five summers, "what should you do without your mother?" "I should put on every day just such a dress as I wanted," was the prompt reply.

"Can you see any thing in my eye—it feels very sore?" asked a lazy, good-for-nothing student of Oliver Wendell Holmes.

"I can see a very bad pupil," was the reply of the Professor, who never likes to be fussy when he has his professional garments on.

VIEWS OF THE HOLY LAND.

THE views of Jerusalem and of other places intimately associated in our minds with the life of our Saviour presented on pages 168 and 169 are new and interesting. We shall briefly notice the several topics of interest connected with our illustrations.

OF JERUSALEM we give two separate views. How different the Jerusalem of to-day from the City of the Great King in the days of HEROD and PILATE! Within the walls—if we except perhaps the Temple area, that one grand spot of surpassing interest—Jerusalem there is not a street which either the Saviour or his apostles ever trod. The present narrow, if even they follow the old lines, are above the rubbish which "many a fathom deep" covers the ancient causeway. There is not one house standing of that which we can feel certain that our Lord ever gazed, unless it be the old tower at the Jaffa Gate. Only the heavens above and the hills around remain the same. The site of the old Temple was never open to any but Moslems until after the Crimean War. No remains of the old Temple exist above ground. Every atom of its dust, as far as we can discover, has been swept away. Literally not one stone has been left upon another. Its form, however, can be determined with almost perfect accuracy. The huge old cisterns which supplied the Temple with water still remain.

Upon this area JESUS CHRIST taught and wrought miracles. This is the Thermopylæ of the universe. The dust of which man is made alone remains and covers all. Not an object meets the eye on which kings and prophets with JESUS and his apostles gazed except the Mount of Olives and the Holy City.

Yet is not the whole holy feet have trod the steps of that old passage; and His lips may have drunk from the water that "ran by the tabernacle" of old.

Outside of the walls the Valley of Kidron separates Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives. This is also known as the Valley of Jehoshaphat. It is a deep valley curving in from the west to the Valley of Hinnom, or Tophet. Perhaps there is no place on earth where so many thoughts of human agony and misery suggest themselves as among the rocky sepulchres of this valley. The horrible Moloch fires which continued many an agonized child-cry blazed among these stones. It was on the opposite side, on the Hill of Corruption, that SOLOMON set up his shrine in the very sight of the Temple. In this valley is the Aceldama, or "Field of Blood," where, into a excavated pit, now fairly overgrown, were cast, and laid there under a sprinkling of dirt to suffer corruption. It has been closed for a century, but will ever be associated with the dark deeds to render the valley of Hinnom was made the type of hell!

The village of BETHANY, once the home of MARY and MARTHA, and the place where CHRIST raised LAZARUS from the dead, consists now of brown mud hovels. It is the squalid abode of confusion, dogs, and poverty.

Of all the places associated with Scripture history Bethlehem is, on the whole, the most picturesque. The three convents attached to the Church of the Nativity, which crown the summit and the ridge on which the village is built, make an impressive and dignified look of an old medieval fortress. The terraces, which, like gigantic stairs, descend to the lower valleys and the small alluvial plains where corn-fields, have a fine bold sweep, and are rich in olives and fruit trees, the shade and verdure of which relieve the eye from the dazzling glare of white limestone rocks and soil.

Although JESUS was born in Bethlehem, the Holy Family, immediately after the presentation in the temple, or forty days after the birth of the child, removed to NAZARETH. It was here, probably, that the visit of the Magi was made, and not, as is generally supposed, in Bethlehem.

Nazareth, like Bethlehem was the home of CHRIST in his boyhood. Here he labored at his humble trade for many years. Here in this town—among these hills—JESUS was brought up as a child, and here he met his Mate and loving mother, "full of grace;" here as a boy he grew in wisdom and in stature; here for many years he labored as a man at his daily bread; here he lived as an acquaintance, neighbor, and friend. For years he gazed on this landscape, and walked along these mountain paths, and worshiped God among these solitudes.

The Church of the HOLY SEPULCHRE, in which CHRIST is said to have been buried for a time, including under one roof many chapels, in which different "communions" worship. The Holy Sepulchre is not what many people suppose it to be. It is not a cave, or a hole in a rude rock; but a small marble chapel, which rises up from the flat stone floor.

GREENWOOD CEMETERY.

IT is now more than twenty years since Greenwood Cemetery was opened for the purposes of interment. It is now the largest and most beautiful burial-place on the continent. A multitude of beautiful inclosures, and several hundred tombs and monuments involving a vast outlay of expense, may now be seen there—pleasing memorials, in the main, of taste and wealth—certainly of grief and public love. The tombs, for which the slopes of Greenwood afford frequent opportunity, are of every style of architecture. The monuments are various in design, from the modest slab to the magnificent pillar or massive sarcophagus. The great number of attractions connected with this Cemetery have made it an object of interest to visitors second to none in Brooklyn.

The grounds of this Cemetery, now comprising four hundred acres, are situated in Brooklyn, on Gowanus Heights, about two and a half miles from the Atlantic Ferry. They are beautifully undulating and diversified, presenting continual changes of surface and scenery, and are remarkably adapted to the purpose for which they are appropriated. The elevated portions of the Cemetery afford numerous and interesting views, embracing the Bay and Harbor of New York, with its islands and forts, the cities of New York and Brooklyn, the shores of the North and East Rivers, New Jersey, Staten Island, the Quarantine, numerous towns and villages in every direction, together with a view of the Atlantic Ocean, reaching from Sandy Hook to the Pavilion at Rockaway. The various avenues in the grounds (exclusive of paths) extend sixteen miles.

The ENTRANCE, which we illustrate on page 172, has only been completed a short time. It is on the northern side of the Cemetery. It is situated at a point lying nearest to the vast population of New York and Brooklyn. The gateway is in the Egyptian style of Doric edifice, solidly constructed of the best New Jersey sandstone. Two passage-ways through the massive structure are provided for visitors to funerals, the other for visitors. A room for the latter to rest in; and fire-proof offices for the Cemetery business, occupy the lower part of the building. Figward, it terminates in three lofty pinnacles. There is a bell for the passing procession, and a clock to strike the hours. The battering, triangular recesses of the pedipments above the two gateways are filled in, on both sides, with groups of sculpture formed of the NOVA SCOTIA stone. These four groups represent the Saviour's Entombment; His Resurrection; the Resurrection of the Widow's Son, and the Raising of Jairus's Daughter. Figures on the four shields which surmounts the quatrefoils, are figures in relief of Faith, of Hope, of Memory, and of Love.

LOVE AND LOVERS.

I.

WHEN I was still a boy of eighteen, going to school punctually every day, as all boys do who intend to some time be great authors like Mr. Tupper, there was a young lady of the name of Miss Lee, also moving in society, and her name was Christine Bell. Of course there is a vast difference between a school-boy of eighteen and a belle of the first water in society. Christine was a beauty, and she had several beaux. One of these was a prosperous young grocer by the name of Hi Hopkins. Hopkins's Christian name was familiarly abbreviated to Hi, and whose last name to Jack, by the simple-hearted villagers who knew about his grocery business, and by all the boys, when angry and disrespectful, were in the habit of sarcastically calling him High-Low-Jack. Whether it was that Miss Bell preferred High-Low-Jack fine, or whether she felt too proud to marry a grocer (her father was a dealer in dry goods), or whether she had other reasons, I cannot pretend to say. Suffice it that the young lady's name is now Christine Bell Brown. As my name is Brown, and Brown is a very uncommon name indeed, you may naturally conclude that Christine is now my wife. Correct; she is my wife.

It may be unnecessary to explicitly state after this that Hiram Jackson's courting of Christine was unsuccessful. Nevertheless it ended my own matrimonial position, I will state. It was unsuccessful, and he did not marry Christine. He eventually married another lady, and went to California because I wish him to understand and believe that I am relating facts, and that I stand ready to shake hands with Mr. Gradgrind right here (on the other threshold of my story), and he went out into the world to seek his fortune.

He was an ambitious young man, with a soul above molasses and tea, and he aspired to re. h a high place in the world. So he turned his attention to balloons, and ascended. He fell. He became noted throughout the country as a successful aeronaut. He made a great deal of money and a great deal of noise, and finally made the voyage to the Sandwich Islands in a balloon. He came to New York at the end of several years, and built a monstrous hole in the ground on the Central Park, and put a high board fence around it to keep people from falling into the hole without paying the admission fee. I was at this time residing in New York, and advancing rapidly toward the top of that hill upon whose summit stands the temple to which Mr. Tupper ascribes the envy of his contemporaries. I was a writer for the press, and had recently reported (in the capacity of a writer for the press) representing the literary world as correspondent of the Times newspaper.

Impelled by my affection for Hiram Jackson—now Professor Jackson—and also by some little curiosity respecting the inside of that great hole that he had built and surrounded with a fence, I went to see him one very hot day, when the city was a fearful contrast to the cool delight of the sea-side—and found him. He was busy, and I would not have intended to apologize for having married Christine.

"Say no more about it, Mr. Brown," said he; "I forgive you. You made a mistake. Besides that, she jilted me before you knew her. How's your babies? mine are well, thank you."

"How many?"

"Four. What's that sticking out of your pocket?"

"My note-book," said I. "I have been scribbling for the Times a little of late, and of course I had to have a note-book."

"You don't say!" cried Jackson, with much cordiality. "A reporter for the Times? Why, how you are getting on, ain't you? The last I heard of you you had got out a pamphlet of poetry, a yellow cover. I congratulate you on your improved prospects. I have a great respect for the Times, and I was going to ask Mr. Raymond to allow me space to take a ride in my balloon. But I have neglected it, and—by-the-way, that reminds me: wouldn't you like to go up?"

"Why yes," said I; "I should like to go up if I were sure of coming down in a good condition as I find myself at present."

"All right! You shall go up at the end of the rope. It is a thousand feet long, that rope. I'll pull you down again all safe." There was a sort of windlass run by horse-power that let the balloon up and down. "Pretty sight, ain't it?" the Professor added, with a yawn. He was used to it, you see. "That's the way it is, from morning to night; up and down—up and down!"

"Up and down!" I echoed, absently, as I stood watching the balloon dwindle out of sight, or so nearly out of sight that it appeared no bigger than a pumpkin.

"They're coming down now," said Professor Jackson. "Will you go up this time?"

"I suppose it's perfectly safe?"

"Why, you're not afraid, are you? You somehs reminded me of Christine, don't you?"

"When I am compelled to I do," said I.

"Well! what proportion of danger do you real, suppose there exists, now, between a balloon ride and a railroad ride?"

I thought a minute before I replied:

"I'm not up to figuring estimates, but as near as I can put it, in round numbers, I should say the chances were about fourteen million to one in favor of the balloon."

"That's not the precise figure," said Professor Jackson; "but it's very near it—it's very near it."

"Am I to go up alone?"

"No. As you are a little timid, and as I want you to take some notes—not to put in the Times, I wouldn't have you think—I'll send a policeman up with you to protect you."

"How can I thank you enough?" I murmured. "But I comprehend. It is for Christine's sake."

"Oh, bother Christine!" ejaculated Jackson, moving rapidly away, which was now fast ascended to the platform at the bottom of the great hole. "Come!"

The policeman got into the car. It is called a car, but in point of fact it is a basket. Then a young lady got in. This was more than I had bargained for. I suspected my mind was about to a sense of its duty. What a young lady dare do should I hesitate about?

I sat one side of the car. The grapnels were thrown off. We began to go up, and I began to take notes. Here are the notes; when you have read the notes you will not wonder that I failed to put them in the Times.

We are off. She tips [meaning the balloon]. Oh! (a) I'll go by myself (b). Feel sick! Head down below strikes up, "Who will Care for Mother Now?" Ah! who indeed? Thoughtful band! Magnificent panorama opens upon the sight. She tips [the balloon]. Skittish feeling. Mem.—Kitzelich good word. Wind blows us over the Park. That county-Jail. Ludlow Street, etc. May get there. Difficult to realize. Pigmies down there. Look like ants. Wave their pocket-handkerchiefs.—Wave a sad-pouch to them. It drops. Watch it drivel-ate to a speck. The two rivers creeping out of a cloud-bank. Water looks like ice—Lay. Bay dotted with ships. Narrows in plain view. Young lady says glad she came. So am I. Want to stay with Professor. Delightfully cool. Proposition to policeman—cut the rope and take a nice long ride. "Can't see it" [by policeman]. Look his name in the Directory. Find. Out of his element. Young lady excited and talkative. "Where would we go if we cut the rope?" Propose to cut the rope. Policeman threatens to arrest me. Twitch! Balloon going down. Feather gone up. Ah, what a vulgar world we are! Band play "Hail to the Chief." Can't mean the policeman.

"How are you, Professor?" I cried, as I got out of the car and let the rope in my native element once more. I really felt as if I had been an incalculable distance since I saw him last.

"Like it?" he asked.

"Oh, amazingly!"

"But that's nothing compared to a detached ascension, you know," said the Professor, with professional pride. "Nothing at all."

"How I should like to make a detached ascension!" I said, with great enthusiasm.

Mr. Jackson said nothing.

"Do you make detached ascensions much?" I asked.

"Oh, frequently," said he.

"And when do you make the next?"

"To-morrow afternoon."

"How I should like to go!"

The Professor made no reply.

"So you go to-morrow afternoon?" I remarked, as we walked up the stairway leading out of the hole.

"If it's pleasant," said he.

"I wish I could go with you!"

"Come and see me again, Mr. Brown," said Jackson, shaking hands. "And remember me to your lady."

I naturally concluded after that that he did not want me to go with him. But I could not help thinking about it all the way home, and resolving that, one way or another, I would have a detached ascension before the summer was out.

After tea that night I talked so long with Christine about my ride in the air that when I thought about preparing my notes for the Times it was too late. So I ate a large piece of mince-pie and went to bed.—Tee reader may think my recording that I ate a piece of mince-pie a piece of irrelevant information, and has nothing to do with the story. But I think it has a good deal to do with the story.

I was just dreaming that I was awakened by a loud rapping at my chamber-door.

"Who's there?" I cried.

"It's me, sonny, and a father," responded the voice of our Bridget. "A man just brung it to the basement-door, Sir," Bridget continued, as I opened the chamber-door and took the letter. "He says he'll wait for me to bring it up at wanst, Sir, bein' it was important."

I shut the door and opened the note. It said:

"DEAR BROWN,—One of the gentlemen who was going with me to-morrow on the detached voyage is sick, and I was glad to be able to offer you his seat in the car. We start early. Be on hand at 6 A.M. Yours truly,

"HIRAM JACKSON."

II.

I AM by no means fond of seeing the sun rise, but I was up early for this once, and the appointed hour found me on hand. Professor Jackson was down at the bottom of the hole, superintending the preparations for departure. The great balloon was sway-ing in the light morning breeze, impatient of the gregnats that held it to the earth. Half a dozen bags of sand were being put into the car, and various creature comforts in bottles and baskets. There was also a hand-telescope, and on the floor of the roomy car lay a mysterious something—I knew not what—covered with a long canvas case.

"You're on time, Mr. Brown," said the Professor, shaking hands.

"Always am," said I.

"Well, we'll start right off."

"Where's the other man?" I asked.

"You are the other man," said Jackson.

"But his seat, I presumed—"

"Oh, bang it, there is no other! Come, are you ready?"

Was it only my imagination? I could not tell; but it seemed to me as if he asked me this question in a tone more as if I should suppose a hangman—or rather, say some brutal executioner of the time of Robespierre—would use in addressing his victim. But I made no remark, and got into the car. The grapnels were let loose, and the balloon shot up like a rocket.

"Good God!" cried one of the attendants, looking up after us, "who ever see a balloon tear up like that afore!"

The world was sinking away under us with appalling rapidity. Professor Jackson was already untying the string from the neck of the first sand-bag, to regulate our ascent, which was now at full speed. Out tumbled the sand, and almost instantly sank into invisibility. Jackson threw the bag after its contents.

"Why do you waste your bags that way, Jackson?" said I.

"I don't signify," he muttered. "I sha'n't want 'em any more."

I began to watch his movements with a deep and fascinating interest. He was immediately clawing at the neck of another bag, which followed its predecessor. My head swam with dizziness, occasioned by the motion of the balloon.

"How high do we go, Professor Jackson, before we begin to move in a decided manner?" I asked.

"We sha'n't go much above this day, my friend," he answered, in a gruff tone, still untying the sandbag with feverish eagerness. "I see we are going up."

"Up?" I whispered, a dark fear stealing over me.

"Ay, up!"

"How high up?"

"To the moon—to the blue blazes—to any where? We are going up, as he cried, and he tore the bag and hurled the last bag out without emptying it of its contents, impatient of his nervous fingers.

"Are you mad?" I cried.

"Mad? No, I'm not a bit mad."

"I have gone high enough. Let us go down."

"Look here, Brown," he said, and he had read a cock-and-bull story about a mad aeronaut, and how he tried to throw his fellow-passenger out of the car. Now, you don't know my name, do you? I tell you I'm as sane as you are, or as any body is. I'm not going to throw you out to lighten the car."

"For God's sake let us go down!"

"I'm not even going to throw any of these bottles or baskets out. I tell you I'm perfectly sane; and I'm going to do these things just as much sense as on our long voyage—for though we're now going up at the rate of a mile a minute, it'll be a long voyage."

"In what direction?" I again interjected.

"Up! up! And I'm going to keep you in the car for companionship sake. I had a notion for preferring you to the Tribune man, who was going with me first—you married Christine Bell. I wanted her myself, I swore, years ago, that whoever got her I would take him away from her somehow. That's all there is about it, old Bowery—so make yourself comfortable, since you can't get out. You have seen the last of old mother earth; those clouds below us there have shut it from sight forever. Ha! ha! ha!" he laughed, with intense glee, leaning over the side of the car and rubbing his long, yellow hands together. "This is glorious, isn't it? Just have a bottle open. Where's that beastly corkscrew? Much good that'll do you, my friend!"

The last remark was elicited by a spring I made for the valve-rope, in the possession of which was the cork-screw. I caught the rope and pulled it. It broke and fell down in my hands.

"I cut the strain last night, my boy. I knew what you would be up to," said he.

I began to appreciate the dangers of my position in terrible colors at once. Let me be honest in my thoughts. So highly rarefied was the thin atmosphere which we were clearing with steady upward bound that I could not breathe without difficulty. How many minutes more would it probably be ere we reached a height where existence must end? I had a sword, or rather, I possessed a sword in a like danger with this, who had clambered up the net-work of the balloon and opened the valve with his hand? It was a fearfully dangerous feat, but none effort I must make. I threw off my coat, though I was chilled through with sudden cold.

"What are you?" cried Jackson. "You sha'n't do it! I am as strong as two of you."

He seized me, as I was hastening to clamber up the ropes, and struck me a blow.

"Let go!" I yelled. "I won't be murdered."

He only laughed scornfully, but struck me. I made a fierce struggle, and succeeded in getting high enough to touch the swollen monster overhead. Whipping out my pocket-knife, I opened it with the aid of my teeth, and plunged it into the canvas. To my horror, the seam thus opened ran high up the balloon. The gas escaped with a sound like the rushing of a whirlwind. The great globe collapsed like a pricked bubble; the canvas fell downward with a flapping noise; and the next moment we were falling through space with furious rapidity.

"Dog! Fool! What have you done?" cried Jackson, springing upon me and grasping me about the throat. "I was only trying to frighten you. You have killed me!"

He glared at me for a few seconds with bloodshot eyes, and then threw me from him. I fell upon the floor of the car.

"I will not go down!" he screamed. "I will not go! Oh, God that I was! Why did I not go up without you, you beastly coward? I am ruined—ruined!"

He locked down upon the white cloud-lake to which we were now steadily drawing nearer and nearer.

"I'll up! I must go up! I will go up!" And with a sudden spring he bounded upward from the car; then fell down, yelling and cursing.

The cloud-lake passed and the earth dawned upon my view. A current swept me aside, and I saw the madman no more. It was with great difficulty I held to the careering car, but the ropes helped me. I whirled onward toward my death. I shall be muddled beyond all recollection by the fall, I thought, if not a ghastly fate.

Suddenly my eye fell upon the long, mysterious, canvas-covered package that I had observed when we left the stand. What it contained was still unknown to me. I hastily tore off the covering, and perceived the article within to be a something made of iron wires and silken silk. Closer inspection showed me that it was a parachute. What a thrill of joy ran through me as I made this discovery!

It was the work of a minute to open it. There was a handle which shot in among the wires through a socket, and at the end of the handle was a strong silken ring, capable of being grasped by both my hands. I grasped it so, and leaped from the car, repelling it with my foot as a swimmer repels the boat from which he springs into the flood; at the same instant I spread the broad parachute to the air.

For a moment it was doubtful whether the structure would sustain the pressure of the air underneath, so great was the momentum with which I was descending; and I looked up at its wide canopy over my head with terrible interest as I hung suspended below.

"Thank Heaven!" I cried; "it stands the test! I shall be saved!"

I was truly judged, only something like a thousand feet above the earth, and descending with comparative slowness. I began to speculate upon the prospect before me. I scarcely hoped to escape uninjured; but a broken leg was a mere bagatelle to contemplate after the perils with which I had been menaced.

My hands began to feel terribly the strain upon them. God give me strength to hold out to the last! A gentle wind overhead aided me, and I kept looking up. To my horror I saw the handle by which I clung slip out of the socket! The parachute passed to the air and I fell down, down, faster and faster each moment. Unable to endure the agony of sight I closed my eyes and awaited the inevitable death before me.

A frightful jar that seemed to smash every bone in my body.

I opened my eyes to find that I had evidently fallen down the kitchen chimney, for there I was in my own hetchanter, and my darling Christine yawningly wanting to know, my dear, what was the matter; and that I had fallen out of bed, and that she didn't I open the door for Bridget, who had been knocking this half hour.

It is due to the reader to state that this last remark was a feminine exaggeration, for Bridget had not been knocking for more than half a minute.

From that day to this I have never had the faintest desire to make a detached ascension again. I have had quite enough of it. Nor have I since seen Professor Donaldson, though I have heard that he was getting on comfortably in his business. He is quite welcome to his business with its precarious ups and downs.

BET'S MATCH-MAKING.

THE only time I ever tried match-making in my life was a total failure, as everybody knows, and I shall say fingers ever the business that I took care never to meddle with it again. I was living at the time with my father and mother on her farm near Ballytrim. My father was dead, and my step-mother did not like me. She had placed me for a time with a milliner in the town, but finding it expensive supporting me apart from her, had taken me away again. She was thinking of a second marriage, though I did not know it at the time. But that is the reason —that she had written to some distant friends of my father in America, who had unwillingly consented to take me and keep me.

I don't think it would have been half as hard for me to have made up my mind to die; for I was a shy little fellow, without a bit of courage in the face of strangers, and my heart was fit to burst at the thought of leaving the very few friends whom I had to love, and my little dark corner of the world, with the trees and the roads knew me. But I felt it would have to be done, and I lay awake all night after the letter arrived, trying to think how I could make a brave enough to my good-by to my dear friend Gracie Byrne, and to Gracie's lover, Donnell M'Donnell.

Gracie was the cleverest of all Miss Doran's apprentices. She was an orphan without a friend to look after her, and she was the loveliest girl in the country. People said she was proud and vain, but I never could see it, she was either. She and Byrne, one another dearly, though I can not think what attracted her to poor little plain me. She had plenty of admirers, and she queened it finely among them, but the only one to whom I would have given her with all my heart was Donnell M'Donnell. And, oh dear! he was the very one whom she would not look at.

Donnell and I were great friends, and I had promised to do all I could to help him with Gracie. He was young and strong, and as bonny a man as could be seen. He had a fine farm, all his own, some distance across country from my step-mother's place. If Gracie would but marry him she should live like a lady, and drive into Ballymena on her own jaunting-car. But she was always saying that she would go away to London, and be a great "West-End" milliner. This terrified me badly, seeing that London is such a wicked place.

My step-mother was always crying out that Gracie would come to a sorrowful end, which made me fret, and so I lay awake that wretched night I thought a great deal about what might happen to her if she went away to London by herself, and she so handsome, and not having a friend at all. And I wished with all my strength that she would marry Donnell M'Donnell before I went away to America, which would ease my mind about her, and also about him. For I felt the greatest pity in the world for kind big Donnell's disappointment.

My step-mother was provoked at my and face next day, and called me ungrateful. But when I cried bitterly she got a little kinder, and in the evening allowed me to go to Byrne's and say good by to my friend Gracie. So toward sundown, when the snow was getting red upon the fences, I wrapped my shawl about me and set off for the town by myself, lonely to ease my heart, all along the lonely road, where there was no one to hear me but the robins. The brown trees against the dusky sky, the white swelling lines of the fields, the dark chimneys of the town on before me, were all blent in a dismal maze, and how often I stopped to take a sob and smooth me but Gracie's great lover, Donnell. I told him my eyes were only watering with the cold, and he seemed well content to believe that for a good way, while we talked of Gracie of course. He was very angry at her, and said she was playing fast and loose with him, and should be talked to by all the town and country. I took Gracie's part, and so we went on till we came to the white gate on the road, and began to meet the townspeople. Then I told him I was going away, and he looked so vexed that I nearly cried again. I felt so glad to see him.

"Well, little Bet," said he, "we must give you a good dance over in your farm-house of ours before you go. And, in the mean time—"

"I'll see to your business, Donnell," said I, smiling. "Never fear but I'll do your business to the last."

Then he shook my two hands till he nearly squeezed them into pulp, and left.

When I went into Miss Doran's it was past the work hour, and the girls were putting on their bonnets to go away; Gracie was the last, putting close to the candle, putting the flowers on a ball-dress for one of the country ladies. She having the nicest hand, and also the most taste, all the work that came touches to the most particular work. She looked very tired, but oh, so handsome, with her pale cheek against the yellow light, and her soft hair curling all over a mass of white and rose-color tulle.

"A sad heart," said she, "and a sprig there, and then I have done. Bet, you have come with me and sleep. That cross step-mother of yours won't see you again to-night."

A lovely bunch of flowers was lying on her table, and she laughed and blushed, and looked beautiful when she saw me.

"Who is that from, Gracie?" said I. "Donnell?"

"No indeed," said she, tossing her head. But I was sure that was a fib, for she looked as happy as possible, lying resting herself in her arm-chair beside the fire. And I saw that she was looking, looking so glad, and the shabby room looking so snug, and our little tea-drinking being so cozy, I could not bear to tell her that Donnell was now, and began to set about Donnell's business.

"Gracie," said I, "I wish you would marry Donnell soon."

"Soon?" said she, opening her eyes and looking at me angrily. "I'll never marry him!"

"But you know, Gracie, that I, getting hot about it, "that you ought to marry him. He says —that is, I know—you have made him the laughing-stock of the country, Gracie."

"Very fine!" cried she. "And so he has been complaining to you, has he?"

"I'll not say that," said I; "but oh, Gracie, I know you like some one. I saw you smiling over a letter the other day, just the way you are smiling now."

"And what if I do?" said she, laughing and tossing her head; "that does not prove that it must be Donnell."

"There is no one else so good," said I, eagerly. "It could not be any one else."

"You are very, very wise," said she, staring at me, "I think you had better go and marry him yourself."

"I? Oh Gracie!" said I, starting up and sitting down again, and bursting into tears. "I wanted to tell you that I am going to America."

You may be sure we talked no more about Donnell that night.

Donnell did not fail to keep his word about giving me a feast before I left the country. He invited three pipers to play, and had a regular country dance. Gracie and I met at the cross-roads, and walked over to the farm together, she bringing a basket filled with her finest cakes. The farm-house is a dear old place, with orchard trees growing up round the house, and it looked so homely that night. Donnell's mother met us at the door, and unpinned our shawls in her own room. Gracie looked beautiful, with a white rose and some white ribbon. Donnell's mother stroked my hair with her hand, and stuck a bit of holly in the front of my black frock. She also kept saying that Donnell had gone down stairs, holding my hand, and asking me about my going to America. And the place felt so safe and warm, and she was so kind and motherly, after what I was accustomed to at home, that my heart got so sore I could scarcely bear it.

We had a great tea-drinking in the parlor, and then we went out to the kitchen, and the pipers fell to work, and Gracie was as amiable as possible to Donnell. But that is the middle of our dancing—the latch of the back-door was lifted, and Squire Hannan walked in in his top-boots.

"I wanted to speak to you on business, M'Donnell," he said, "but I will not disturb you now."

"Will you do us the honor of joining us, Sir?" said Donnell. Squire Hannan needed no second invitation. He was soon making his bow before Gracie, and Donnell saw no more of her smiles that night. She danced with the squire till it was time to go home, and then, after she had set out for the town, escorted by him and her other beaux, Donnell's mother kissed me, and Donnell drew my arm through his, and walked home with me across the snowy fields to my step-mother's house. He was abusing Gracie all the way, and I was, as usual, taking her part.

He came to see me one day soon after, and brought me a present of a nice wicker pears. He leaned against the wall and watched me making the butter. He was disgusted with Gracie, he said; she was a flirt, and he did not care a pin about her, only he would not be made a fool of. She had refused to let him walk with her across the hills near the village to the consecration of the new church; and if he did not get some token that she had changed her mind between that and this he would cross her, look her way again, but go and marry some one else for spite.

"Oh, no, Donnell," said I; "promise me you won't do that." For I was sure that Gracie liked him all the while.

"But I will," said he, smiling; "at least if other people will not be fools."

"Oh, don't, don't!" said I. But he would not promise.

"It's my mind," said my step-mother, after he had gone, "that you lad's more like a lover of yours than here. Why don't you catch him, and then you'll get to Gracie's place."

"Mother!" I cried, and felt the room spinning round with me till I caught and held on by the door.

"Well, well," she said, "you needn't look so mad. You'll get her by the fern-house of ours before you go. And, in the mean time—"

"I'll see to your business, Donnell," said I, smiling. "Never fear but I'll do your business to the last."

Then he shook my two hands till he nearly squeezed them into pulp, and left.

"I? Oh Gracie!" said I, starting up and sitting down again, and bursting into tears. "I wanted to tell you that I am going to America."

"Well, well, my dear!" said Donnell's mother, wiping her eyes.

Every body was coming to see me now on account of my foot. Gracie came the next day or so, and surely I was amazed at the glory of her dress! My step-mother, who did not like her, left us alone together, and Gracie's news came out. She was going to be married on next Tuesday.

"I know that," said I.

"How do you know it?" said she.

"Donnell's mother told me," said I.

"Donnell's mother! Nothing but Donnell and Donnell's mother from you forever! How should you know?"

"Oh, Gracie, his own—"

"Why," she burst in, "you don't imagine that he's the man? Why, it's Squire Hannan! Only think, Bet, of your Gracie being the Squire's lady?" I was quite confounded. "Oh, oh, Gracie!" I stammered.

"Well," said she, sulking, "are you not glad?"

"Oh yes," I said, "very, on your account; but what will become of Donnell?"

"Donnell again. Now listen to me, Bet. I know when a man likes me, and when he doesn't like me, just as well as any other girl; and I've seen this many a day, that Donnell didn't care a pin about me. So he only wanted me to marry him that the people might not say I jilted him. I told him that the other day, when he asked me to be his wife. 'No matter,' said I want you for,' said he; 'I want you.' 'Thank you,' said I. And then what had he the impudence to say! I'll changed my mind before Sunday I was then with word that he might come to the consecration with me. Then he would set off for the Glens on Monday, and come home bonnier there, and be home for our wedding in a week!"

I screamed out, seeing what I had done.

"The poor foot!" cried Gracie, thinking I was in pain. "Is it bad?"

"Never mind it!" said I. "And what did you say?"

"I said," Gracie went on, "that whatever morning he got up and saw black snow on the ground, that day he might take a fancy to marry some one. And yet he had the meanness to walk with me on Sunday after that! But I have fun of it is, that they say he's gone to the Glens."

"Oh, no!" said I, beginning to groan again, and pretending it was all my foot. After that Gracie talked about herself and Squire Hannan all she went away. And somehow I never had felt as little sorry to part with Gracie before. She seemed not to be my own Gracie any longer.

And now I was nearly out of my senses, thinking what could have come of my meddling. I was sure that Donnell and Squire Hannan would fight and kill one another, and all through me. I thought I would go and tell Mrs. Byrne all to see Donnell before any one else had told him the news, and confess to him what I had done. On Tuesday, about midday, a countryman from the Glens came in to light his pipe, and he said he had passed M'Donnell, of Buckey Farm, on the way.

"An! I knew things must be going badly with him," said he, "for he has a look on his face as black as the potato blight."

"Sometimes he told him, maybe!" said I to myself. And I put on my shawl, and, borrowing a stick from an old neighbor, I hobbled off secretly to the road toward the Glens. I was not tired, and dreadfully cold, as I could not walk fast, and I sat down on a bit of an old gray bridge to watch for Donnell coming past. I had to sit there a considering along, and although it was getting dusk I could see that he had his head down, and looked dreadfully dull and unhappy.

"Donnell!" said I, calling out to him.

"Who's that?" he said. "Why, it's never little Bet!"

"But indeed it is," said I. "Oh, Donnell, did you hear? I came to tell you. Gracie was married to-day to Squire Hannan."

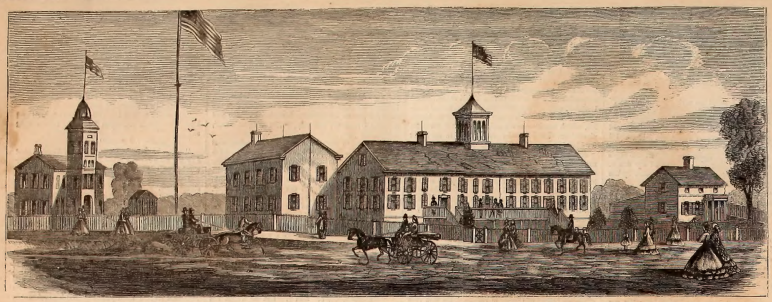
"Whew!" He gave a long whistle. "The jilt!" said he, and he stopped his fingers. But his whole face brightened up.

"She's not so much a jilt as you think, Donnell," said I, "for only how can I even tell—but was I who wrote you the note you got last week, and she had nothing to do with it. I did it for the best, I did indeed, for I thought that Gracie liked you; I did indeed! And oh, Donnell, sure you won't go and kill Squire Hannan?"

"Why," said he, looking awfully savage, "I cut a great blackthorn this morning in the Glens for no other purpose but to beat out his brains."

I threw a great scream, and, thinking myself, fell along with it; but Donnell picked me up, and set me safe on his horse behind him.

"Now, Bet," said he, "I'll tell you what it is, little Bet. I'll make a bargain. You'll marry me, and I won't touch Squire Hannan."



"I agree," said I, "after—after Gracie. Indeed I will not, Donnell M'Donnell."

"I've behaved badly," said he, "but I'm very sorry. But I shall behave a little better than Gracie, but the devil of pride was in me, and the people were saying she would have it. Now, I'll cast off as I felt as if I was goin' to be hung. God bless Squire Hannan! Now will you marry me, little Bet?"

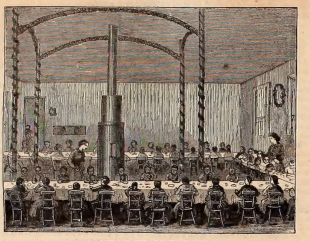
"No," said I. And with that he whipped up his horse, and dashed off with me at the speed of a train. He never stopped till he had stopped at the dear Buckey Farm house door, when he carried me straight into the bright warm kitchen where his mother had the tea set out, and the cakes smoking ready for his return.

"Talk her into reason," said he, putting me into his mother's arms. "I want her to marry me, and she says she won't."

I did my best to keep milky for a proper length of time, but it was the hardest thing I ever tried to do, and they both so kind, and the place so bright and cozy, and I using so happy on the sly all the time! So the end of it all is that I did not go to America, and that I am Mrs. M'Donnell, of the Buckey Farm. But I never tried match-making again.

FITCH'S HOME FOR SOLDIERS AND ORPHANS AT DARIEN, CONNECTICUT.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

SOLDIERS' AND ORPHANS' HOME AT DARIEN.



We illustrate on this page the Home for Disabled Soldiers and the Orphan Children of such as have died in military service in defense of the country, which, by the munificence of Mr. BENJAMIN FITCH, has been erected at Darien, Connecticut. From the beginning of the war Mr. FITCH has been interested in the cause for which our two millions of patriot soldiers have so bravely fought. At the first outbreak of rebellion, too old and infirm himself to shoulder the musket, and appreciating the tender anxiety of those who by going to the field must leave behind them wives and children, whom they might be leaving forever, Mr.

HON. FRANCIS H. PIERPONT.—[See Page 174.]

FITCH promised a large number of men to take under his care all who should be left by them thus without a husband and father's protection. The continuance of the war, and the increasing casualties attending it, soon led Mr. FITCH to see that nothing less than a well-organized Asylum would answer the wants thus created. He therefore, during the spring of 1864, totally unaided by others, purchased and erected suitable buildings, and formally instituted the Asylum since known as "Fitch's Home for Disabled Soldiers and Orphans of Soldiers who have lost their Lives in Defense of the Nation."

Mr. BENJAMIN FITCH, the founder of this Institution, after giving the building and grounds now occupied, worth originally $8000 or $10,000, placed in the hands of the trustees $5000 to be invested as a permanent fund, and $5000 to be expended in making repairs on the building, and in erecting a wing containing a kitchen, dining-room, and a beautiful hall for the use of the institution. He then went to Europe for a season, and on his return presented to the trustees a library consisting of from 5000 to 6000 volumes of choice books which he had collected, and placed at their disposal the sum of $10,000, the estimated cost of the new building.

While in England and on the Continent, with the interest of the soldiers' orphans ever in mind, Mr. FITCH obtained from those with whom he came in contact, and who had the welfare of the country at heart, both American and foreigners, such aid in books, statuary, and paintings as would adorn the home, beautify the life, or instruct the mind of his increasing family of orphans and disabled soldiers at home.

On Mr. FITCH'S visit to Italy he called upon Mr. POWERS, the celebrated American sculptor, who generously presented the Institution with a bust of FRANKLIN, executed in CARRARA marble, of great beauty and worth. He also received donations of pictures from the celebrated artists COSTA and COSTA, of Florence, with others of value; and a picture of the Birth of Christ, given by MRS. ASSTICE, a widow of an English officer who fell in India. All these works of art were shipped to this country, and unfortunately destroyed in the conflagration of a bonded warehouse in this city in September last, soon after their arrival, proving a great loss to the Institution, as insurance having been effected.

In addition to the foregoing Mr. POWERS introduced Mr. FITCH to Mr. LAURENS G. MEADE, Jun., a young American artist of great worth, and engaged with him to furnish a group of statuary, in marble, called the "Returned Soldier," of the heroic, or larger than life-size, of which we give an illustration. A letter from Florence thus describes this work of art:

"The group of statuary represents the Returned Soldier, with an Orphan Child of a fellow-soldier on his knee, to whom he is describing the death of her father on the battle-field, who with his parting breath commissioned him to call upon his family and give them his last dying message. The young orphan, in the interest of the description and with her feelings intensely agitated, presses her face close to that of the narrator, and, with her thoughts completely absorbed, seems to see her dying father expiring on the foughten field. The emotions of each are expressed with good effect by Mr. MEADE, whose experience in the early part of the war, has not been lost upon him."

It is our duty to Mr. MEADE here to say that, on being informed by Mr. FITCH for what purpose the group was intended, he would only accept 1000 francs, which he says will hardly cover the cost of its production, thereby foregoing any profit to himself.

In concluding this notice of Mr. FITCH'S benevolent donation, it will not be out of place to suggest that in every town throughout the country there should be a similar effort made in behalf of disabled soldiers and the children of those who have been killed in battle.

THE COLLAR MANUFACTORY OF THE METROPOLITAN COMPANY, NEW YORK.

THE METROPOLITAN COLLAR COMPANY.

We give on this page an illustration of the Paper Collar Manufactory of the Metropolitan Company of this city. The machine used in this manufactory, and of which Mr. D. M. SMYTH is patentee, is one of the most wonderful and curious inventions of the day. Three peculiarities distinguish this machine above all others in use.

1. Its simplicity.—What by all other processes requires half a dozen distinct and separate operations is here accomplished by one. A single stroke of the die produces a perfect collar, button-holed, stamped, and moulded. All that is done afterward is merely incidental. The collar is turned by a simple machine, and by another is, with nine of its companions, folded for the box. This latter process is in every other manufactory performed by hand. The small number of hands through which the collar passes also prevents it from becoming soiled.

2. Its wonderful capacity.—From our own observation we know that this machine produced two collars per second. The eleven machines which the Company have in operation produce 22 collars per second, 1320 per minute, 79,200 per hour, and 1,900,800 every twenty-four hours. Three hundred machines would supply almost every man, woman, and child in the United States with one collar per day.

3. Its economy of labor and material.—The eleven machines in operation save the work of 236 hands. More than 19 per cent. is saved of the paper which in every other process is wasted.

The Metropolitan Collar Company, whose place of business is 165 Washington Street, has a capital of $500,000. It manufactures collars of seventeen distinct varieties, many of them superior to any in the market, and none of them surpassed, and at a very much reduced cost of production, which enables the Company to defy competition.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The work of reconstruction does not make rapid advance in Congress. The concurrent resolution which the Senate adopted in the House. This amounts to merely to an expression of the opinion of Congress as to the new rights in regard to the admission of representatives. It can not even be called legislation. Obnoxious matters are not introduced in Congress.

In the States there is some progress. The convention in Richmond on February 28 strongly supported the President. The principal speech on that occasion was made by Judge M. F. Conway, formerly a representative from Kansas, and also formerly a radical. This speech advocated immediate reconstruction.

In Texas great progress has been made. The Constitutional Convention met February 8. On the 9th seventy of the ninety delegates were present. J. W. Throckmorton presided. Among the delegates was Mr. Roberts, President of the Secession Convention, who seems to have forgotten that he has been a rebel. Mr. Roberts is the person whom objected strongly to taking the oath to support the Constitution, but were finally persuaded to do it by the large Union majority. On the 10th Governor Hamilton's Message was received. The Governor did not give any gloss upon the rebellion. The rebels, he said, had defied the Government, and had been crushed. He advised the Convention to give to negroes civil rights and privileges. This advice was followed. The Constitution of Texas, so far as could be done by the Convention, has been amended so as to allow the freedmen to own property; to testify in the courts; to make contracts and be protected with respect to wages, hold, and transmit property in all cases the same as the whites; and to be subject to no penal laws based on inequality or distinction.

Hon. James Johnson, late Provisional Governor of Georgia, who is now in Washington, says that the condition of affairs in that State is very far from being as satisfactory as when civil government was first restored. He also spoke of the President's Barnum as an absolute necessity both for the Union and the rebels, and the blacks will be very important that more troops be sent into the State at once.

CONGRESS.

February 21:

In the Senate, Mr. Sumner introduced a resolution which was adopted, that whereas the President had not responded to the resolution of inquiry in regard to the Freedmen's Bureau, adopted January 5, he be requested to furnish the required information if not incompatible with the public interest. The concurrent resolution for the extension of Southern representatives was then taken up. Mr. Dixon moved to amend the resolution. He said the President's position was his own business. Mr. Stone had the same jurisdiction over his own members. The President's policy, he said, had been misrepresented. He was present to-day to urge the admission of Delaware from the rebel section to the Union. Mr. Dixon replied that he had been charged with a purpose to bring his former disgrace in the body blood-thirsty enough to be willing to see the Senate wipe upon the door of Congress and fill those seats with traitors, from whose presence Radicals of his own State, these supplicants and statesmen were in direct contradiction to the President's views and statements.

In the House, the Committee on Amendment giving Congress power to enforce the 13th Article of Amendment was taken up. Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, moved to strike out the word "male" in the second section, because the Southern States were not represented. Mr. Kelley said that the term given in the amendment was involved in the original Constitution, but had been struck out practically by the clause for a right to vote was in favor of representing the right. Mr. Hale said he thought the adoption of the amendment. He would prefer that the proposed amendment was in effect a provision under which all those entitled to vote in the several States by the procedure affecting the individual citizen was to be overridden, repudiated, abolished, and a law of Congress established in its place.

February 22:

In the Senate, Mr. Johnson presented the credentials of William F. Perry, Senator-elect from South Carolina.

Senator Nye spoke in favor of the concurrent resolution.

In the House, Mr. Bingham spoke against his Constitutional Amendment. Mr. Woodbridge, of Vermont, supported it as also did Mr. Bingham. The latter alluded to Secretary Seward's New York speech in terms of disparagement. On motion of Mr. Conkling further consideration of the amendment was postponed until the second Tuesday in April.

March 1:

In the Senate, the concurrent resolution was debated. Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, argued that the States were sovereign powers. His speech was extensive, prolix, and tendency was to make a division between the General Government and the States.

In the House, the Senate bill protecting civil rights, as amended by the Judiciary Committee, was presented, and after some debate went over.

March 2:

In the Senate, after a long and spirited debate, the concurrent resolution was adopted. Mr. Doolittle made a speech against it.

In the House, Mr. Thayer spoke in favor of the Civil Rights bill.

March 5:

There was no session of the Senate, and in the House there was no transaction of business.

March 6:

In the Senate, Mr. Wilson introduced a joint resolution for the representation in Congress of the States lately in rebellion. It provides that they shall be entitled to representation upon their adoption of laws repealing all distinctions of color on account of color, and also that persons conferring the right of suffrage upon all colored men who have served in the army, who can read the Constitution, and who pay taxes on real or personal property.

In the House, Mr. Bingham, from the Reconstruction Committee, reports a joint resolutions for the admission of Tennessee, which were read twice and then committed. Mr. Stevens offered a resolution of inquiry relative to persons pardoned by the Executive, and the amount and disposition made of confiscated land.

NEWS ITEMS.

From the West Indies intelligence is received that the cholera was abating at Guadeloupe, and had not broken out in the islands adjacent.

The evidence elicited in the trial of Major Gen. interrupted examination of Judge-Advocate Norris General shows that of 16,000 prisoners confined in that prison, over 5000 died from ill-treatment in five months.

A great Fenian meeting was held on the 4th instant in Jones's Wood. A hundred thousand Irishmen are said to have been present, and as many dollars to have been subscribed to aid the cause. The meeting was held in direct opposition to the Roman Catholic views of Archbishop McHale.

It is computed, from official data, that since the last Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made on the 5th of December last, he has issued the equivalent amount of the public debt $22,000,000, and has paid $20,000,000 of accruing interest on outstanding bonds, and $20,000,000 coin interest on gold-bearing bonds, making an aggregate of currency and coin interest of $20,000,000 paid.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FENIANISM.

In the House of Commons on February 17, Sir George Grey, in asking leave to bring in a bill amending the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland, said that the Fenian conspiracy had not recently assumed its present proportions. It was necessary to strike an effective blow at the Fenian schemes, which were wholly dependent upon the American Government. The loyalty of the British Army was beyond a doubt. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland earnestly requested the suspension of the act, saying that he could not hold himself responsible for the safety of the country if power was withdrawn from him. The bill was passed in both Houses.

On the 17th in Dublin over one hundred arrests of Fenians were made. The Government documents found in these were both numerous and distributed among the small towns, thus creating a feeling of security.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The second month of that annual epidemic—house-hunting—has come, and the usual signs are to be expect it to rage with increasing intensity, until the great crisis arrives, when "flitting day" rather the triumph of grief. Even at this stage of the disease anxious-looking individuals are often seen consulting the numbers on each side of the street in search of the significant "bill." There are plenty of "bills"—but whichever side of the street the "house" happens to be walking the "bill" seem to happen on the opposite side. He carries his eye to read without a moment's pause, and, in his confusion explain—all on can make out. Of course it is a "house"—he knew that before—but is it "to be let" or "to be sold" or "to be let on lease," and how can he get it? To find out any thing more than that it is a "House" he must cross the street, perhaps encounter a cab or omnibus. He has no resource but to meet up down town for further information as to price, &c. Then he must go back and pass headache saving of shop-basher and temper to have different-colored bills on the house that are for sale and those that are to be let. It is very vexatious, when you are so tired as you can be, to be continually enticed half a block out of your way by the offer of a bill only to find that it is "to let" when you had the hope it might be "To Let."

Apropos of "house-hunting" and "up town," we give for the amusement of our readers the following song by Lovell Fellow's "Excelsior," hoping, however, all will take warning from the fate of the hero of the song mentioned:

"FURTHERUPTOWN."

Tired to death, but walking fast,
Along Broadway, one night, there passed
A youth, with hat pulled down
Umbrella, with this strange device,
Upon his back:

His anxious eyes and weary feet
Hinted the history of his weary quest,
And like a New-York fish-hawk rung
The accents of this unknown tongue,
"Furtherupptown!"

In happy hands he saw the light
Of household fires gleam warm and bright:
Beyond, the spectral street-lamps shone,
And from the hall a portal gave
"Furtherupptown!"

"Try not that street," the old man said,
"A tenement house is in the shade."
A public school it by its side—
Then loud the children's voices grew,
Softly he said, "The rents too high;"
"Furtherupptown!"

"Beware the livery stable's smell,
Beware the engine-house as well!"
That was the sign, the fire at night—
A voice replied, for out of sight,
"Furtherupptown!"

At break of day, as heavenward
The Central Park policemen stared,
Watching the gallant fire-horses there,
A voice rung through the startled air,
"Furtherupptown!"

By following up the annual sound,
A dying traveler they found;
His weary legs he no longer nies
Umbrella, with the strange device,
"Furtherupptown!"

There, in the Reservoir, they say,
"Presently," but before that day,
While somewhere over Bloomingdale
A voice fell faintly, sighed, "Hail,
"Furtherupptown!"

Some time ago, before liberty was every where fashionable, a well-known friend of the writer, who was not much in touch in Scottish quarters, and was reported modest and kind, was riding with his daughter in the streets of his own city, glowing with health and vigor, a friend met him with the warm greeting:

"Why, Mr. B——, how do you do? So you were not killed after all?"

"Well," returned Mr. B——, placing his hands upon his broad chest, and throwing back his head, a little more erect than usual, "does this look like a resurrection body?"

An English review of "A Noble Life," Miss Mulock's last work, says:

"There is such a high moral tone about the writings of this authoress, the stories are related with such purity and delicacy of feeling, that we always welcome a book to meet with in these days, when bigamy and murder are rendered somewhat familiar to the reader by frequent. It is a book which even timid-laced mothers who grow gray agonize over reading aloud to their children, for their daughter's hands, for therein are many noble lessons taught in an attractive manner."

At the marriage of Mr. P. T. Barnum's youngest daughter, which was recently celebrated in Bridgeport, Connecticut, the ceremony was by an unusual method. Instead of pronouncing the bridal pair "man and wife," after the usual fashion, the officiating clergyman announced them "husband and wife," which, of course, is correct, and a decided improvement upon the form ordinarily adopted in such cases. It is said that Mr. Barnum, after the reception which followed the marriage ceremony, he remarked were offered to the bride, and that the latter affair was a complete success. That fashion might well be followed upon such occasions.

It is said—we will not vouch for the truth of it—that the ladies have adopted the "Whirlpool" as the name for the substitute to the "Waterfall." The "Whirlpool" is worn by those who have not sufficient hair of their own hair to allow it to trail bound naturally, or hang in tresses. The "Frizzle" of all the hair on the head is denominated by sellers as the "Hurricane at sea, or the Frigate on land." The variegated colors of hair so frequently worn of late is increasing in popularity. Red, auburn, and dark brown mingle extensively.

A nice little romance in real life, with happy ends has just been made public. About fifty years ago a young gentleman and lady, supposed by friends to be on the verge of matrimonial bliss, were suddenly parted by Death's relieve. The young man subsequently married and lost three wives, the last one within the last eight or nine months. The young lady married and lived with her husband over fifty-three years, and raised a numerous family. During the last year her husband died. The lady, after remaining a widow nearly a year, accepted a proposal from her former suitor—being about seventy-five years old, and she seventy-one—and they were recently married. The parties are living in Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania.

An exchange gives the following prescription, which any one can have filled at the druggist's, and which he chooses, provided they can mix it:

CURE FOR LOVE.—Take 19 ounces of dislike, 1 pound of cowardice, 1 ounce of the last powder of experience, 1 large sprig of time, 24 drams of the guilt of dishonor, 1 quart of repentance. Mix and administer.

Set them on a gentle fire of love, sweeten it with the tears of forgiveness, skim it with the spoon of melancholy.

Put it to your heart.

Cork it with the cork of a sound conscience, and there let it remain, and it will instantly find out, and be restored to your right senses again.

Dr. Holmes, who is himself of the apothecary, at the house of Ludenthing, next door to Reason, in Prudent Street, in the city of Wisdom.

Some of the English journals criticize with severity the "outrageous magnificence of dress" exhibited at the Review of the Harlemer. The dresses were described at the last ball in a dress which is praised for its extreme simplicity! It was of white tulle pretaillée Jour, and ornamented with marine and aquatic plants. Her diadem of diamonds was surmounted by a magnificent aigrette of diamonds and turquoises. The ear-rings, waistband, and shoulder-knots were all of diamonds. Various other adornments of diamonds completed the toilet. We suppose the present style of dress might not easily be followed by all! And to help what is left out, the ball at the Tuileries the following night exhibited a diamond peacock on her head, with a tail descending to the floor. Such is the fancy said to have been in accordance with her own weapons.

The Italian ladies do not appear to be at all behind their French rivals in the matter of dress. Take the extravagant finery. At the fancy ball given at Florence recently a lady is described as appearing dressed in the most elaborate triumph of plastic beauty" by appearing in a simple skirt of white satin over a tight-fitting bodice of the same, with a long train attached. A Hungarian lady, the youthful Countess Karoly, represented the Mer de Glace. Beneath a dazzling robe of white silk, with long folds and clouds, appeared the terrific undulations of the Mer de Glace, imitated in white silk and white tulle. The bodice painted blocks of ice, bears, chamois, birds of prey, hunters—nothing characteristic was omitted. A very lovely train, formed of a glacier, depicted on the left side a mass of white and blue clouds, and on the right a resplendent sun darting rays of light. The bottom of the white silk petticoat a light silvered stuff simulated hoar-frost. The body of the dress was of white satin, in small pointed diamonds, trimmed with swan-down and glass. The Countess's frosted hair was prevented from falling quite loose by crystal chains, which passed round the head, and were fastened down. It was fortunately a particularly mild evening, or such a costume would have been fatal to the guests beaten with colds and rheumatism from simple association of ideas.

Somebody says: "There should be no question between man and wife as to property—and yet ladies make a creature of the law." Why, by marriage, a woman is legally married to an extent which is very offensive to good taste. A lady—meaning her husband—will say, "This is my bright to say "my husband;" but she should think twice before she prefaces that pronoun to any other word.

GOVERNOR PIERPONT.

FRANCIS HARRISON PIERPONT, Governor of Virginia, was born in the county of Monongalia, Virginia, and is now about fifty years of age. He graduated at Allegheny College in the fall of 1838, and immediately occupied a time in teaching school and reading law. After a while he left his native county and went to Mississippi, where he resumed school-teaching, and the study of law; but he soon returned to his own State, commenced the practice of law in the county of Marion, and rose to a prominent and leading position.

On the opening of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, Mr. Pierpont purchased some coal lands, and entered largely into mining operations and the manufacturing of fire-brick. It was in the pursuit of these callings that he became more intimately connected the wonderful manufacturing and mineral resources of the State of Virginia, which are only now—through the downfall of slavery—being fully developed. Experience—for the first time actively engaging the attention of the world, and rapidly placing her in the very foremost rank among the States of the Union.

The long and turbulent period comprised between the JOHN BROWN affair and the actual passing of the Ordinance of Secession in Virginia are too fresh in the memory of our readers, and can only be briefly alluded to in a sketch of this character. Suffice it to say that Mr. Pierpont, at that time, came to be considered a Union man was to confront all that can most deeply test the manhood of an individual—the trials of personal liberty and life itself—and all that was loved and valued in the past, the scorn and hatred of life-long friends—Governor PIERPONT shone like a beacon of light.

At last the fatal hour came; the Southern heart had been fired, the Cotton States precipitated into revolution, and the war was in the midst of struggling. Virginia gave way, and the Ordinance of Secession was passed in Richmond by a large majority, the only prominent dissenting voice of importance being so unpopular that they had to fly from the city in disguise. A public meeting was called at Clarksburg on the 22d April, at which a series of resolutions were introduced by the Hon. JOHN S. CARLILE, and approved, calling a Convention to meet on the 13th day of May, at Wheeling. This Convention having assembled, passed a resolution calling a Convention to meet on the 11th day of June at the same place, and in the mean time appointed a Committee of Safety, consisting of five, whose duty it was to see that the State did not suffer in the interim. FRANCIS H. PIERPONT was one of that Committee.

On the 11th of June the Convention assembled at Wheeling, pursuant to call, and immediately organized by electing Hon. ARTHUR J. BOREMAN President, and Hon. CHARLES SCOTTEN Secretary. A declaration of the rights of the loyal people of Virginia was immediately passed, and an ordinance adopted, providing for the appointment of a Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, and Attorney-General, to act as provisional officers for six months, or until their successors should be elected and qualified. FRANCIS HARRISON PIERPONT was elected Governor—a station which he has since filled by re-election, until he came, by Presidential authority, to preside at the State capitol.

A great deal of Governor PIERPONT's popularity is due to his personal physique and manner. He has a frank, genial, honest-hearted way about him, amounting almost to joviality, which inspires sympathy and confidence in his good intentions and integrity among all who come in contact with him. But in one of these traits of whom an instinctively feels that if he has an enemy it can not be of his choosing.

THE ALBANY RAILROAD BRIDGE.

AFTER years of vexatious delays, caused by litigation with parties representing interests farther up the river, the work on this bridge was commenced in April, 1864. The first locomotive, the "Augustus Schell," of the Hudson River Railroad, crossed the bridge February 15, 1866, and the first passenger train on February 22.

The bridge proper (omitting the approaches, which in themselves are quite formidable) consists of two abutments and twenty-seven piers, having a total length of 2929 feet. The extreme length of the bridge is nearly a mile. The main channel of the river is crossed by three spans of 150 feet between the centres of the piers, on the plan known as "Howe's," and two draw spaces of 133½ feet each. The remaining piers are placed in the shallow water on the east side, as also over the basin on the Albany side, are short spans ranging from 72 to 76 feet each, built on the usual plan known as the trestle-work approach to the bridge in the city is about 1500 feet long.

Our view (from a photograph taken by CHURCHILL and DENNISON, for W. J. GIBSON) represents the bridge from the Albany basin to the Eastern Shore, at one front the large New York Central Railroad Elevator, which stands a few rods south of the bridge.

The trawbridge, including the iron turn-table upon which it rests, is entirely novel, planned specially for the locality, and the arrangement for excavating as before, and driving the piles, the latter were sawed off, and a floating caisson, with a heavy timber floor, of the dimensions of the pier, was placed over the piles, and the masonry commenced in this caisson, which soon settled to its bearing on the heads of the piles, when the latter were removed by unscrewing some bolts, and floated away to serve elsewhere.

The piers are built of limestone masonry, with rough faces, and are 30 feet in height above low-water, and have a width at the bottom of 9 feet, and at the top of the coping (the coping being 2 inches on all sides) of 6½ feet. They are all built of heavy cut stone laid in cement.

The four spans are all strongly together by iron cramps, and, in addition, the two faces of the pier are tied together by iron bars at intervals on each course also; from, and between the piers, from pier from side to side; and, still further to insure the strength of the masonry, the head stones are all bonded together with iron dove-tail cramps to the stones both above and below.

The bridge has been constructed by "The Albany Bridge Company," constituted mainly of Directors in the different railroads centring at Albany, and it is understood that the contract was built by the New York Central Railroad, and one quarter each by the Hudson River and Albany and Boston Roads. The total cost of the bridge has been over a million of dollars.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for some months previous been using their preparation, having for its basis the inside bark of white pine, which he recommended as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it the disease alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of it. Medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough much relieved, and expectoration was effected. Before this I rent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been afflicted for some weeks with a bad cough, and was followed by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. She was relieved, and used it in her family. She took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1855, I had it introduced under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a cough or kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its wonderful cures of coughs, colds, sore throat, croup, diphtheria, whooping cough, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary complaints, entitle it to the confidence of the people. It is a specific remedy for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and female weakness it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

The great object of our Prize Concert is the manner in which it is gotten up, differing from any thing of the kind ever before offered to the public.

In all Prize Concerts are a great many worthless articles, and the purchaser has no guarantee of receiving anything more than they are supposed by none.

In the Grand Prize Concert, every ticket has its duplicate number; these are placed in a wheel and thoroughly mixed; a disinterested person selected by the ticket-holders present at the concert draws these duplicates—from the wheel; the first one drawn out receives the largest prize, and the second until all are drawn.

To enable us to give away the valuable prizes we first sell a sufficient number of tickets to insure us against loss. The prizes are then distributed in order as the duplicates are drawn—unless all other gift sales, where any two tickets are sold, should you draw a large prize the proprietor makes a DEAD LOSS of the value you draw, and consequently you would never get any thing worth what your ticket cost you.

Don't throw your money away on valueless concerts, but send on your orders for tickets once. If you would rather them at a larger price a number according to choice. Every ticket is registered before leaving the office, and number, name of party receiving it, and address—and all will be notified by mail of the result of the Concert.

FIRST PREMIUM IMPROVED
$5 SEWING $5 MACHINE.

The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity.

Originally patented May 15, 1860; improvement patented June 5, 1860. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with CHANGED attachments, is now made more than elegantly—ORNAMENTAL NOVELTY, and more EXCELLENT in USEFULNESS, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, and makes the ELASTIC LOCK-STITCH with two threads—alike on both sides—by the RUNNING-STITCH more perfectly than any, making SATINED hand, and with single or double thread, it changes up very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand-sewing.—New York Tribune.

Single machines, ALL COMPLETE, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Satisfactory guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular, containing liberal inducements, sent free. Address all orders to Brandreths's Pills.

INFLUENZA, DIPHTHERIA.

In inflammatory affections, when no bleeding is permitted, a free use of these pills soon modifies the alarming symptoms, and perseverance, according to the directions, usually quickly cures; and certainly nothing is relied in using Brandreth's Pills. For cold, influenza, diphtheria, pains of the head, dizziness, and apoplexy, no medicine can be compared to them. In erysipelas, fever and ague, small-pox, and in all the diseases of childhood, their use insures a speedy abatement of fever. They produce these results simply by taking from the blood its impurities, leaving

Steinway & Sons'
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 32 First Premiums, gold and silver medals, at the Principal Fairs held in this country within the last ten years, and in addition thereto they were awarded a First Prize Medal at the Great International Exhibition in London, 1862, in competition with 209 Pianos from all parts of the World.
That the great superiority of these instruments is now universally acknowledged is abundantly proved by the fact that Messrs. Steinway's "scales, improvements, and peculiarities of construction" have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both hemispheres (AS CLOSELY AS COULD BE DONE WITHOUT INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT RIGHTS), and that their instruments are used by the most eminent pianists of Europe and America, who prefer them for their own public and private use wherever accessible.
STEINWAY & SONS direct special attention to their Patent Agraffe Arrangement,
which, having been practically tested in all their Grand and a large number of Square Pianos, and admitted to be one of the greatest improvements of modern times, will hereafter be introduced in EVERY PIANO MANUFACTURED BY THEM, WITHOUT INCREASE OF COST to the purchaser; in order that all their patrons may reap its benefits.
STEINWAY & SONS' PIANOS are the only American instruments exported to Europe in large numbers, and have met with unbounded success.

FISK & HATCH, Bankers,
AND
DEALERS IN UNITED STATES AND OTHER DESIRABLE SECURITIES,
No. 5 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.
OFFER FOR SALE
THE NEW UNITED STATES THIRTY YEAR SIX PER CENT. BONDS,
Issued to aid the Construction of the Great Central Pacific Railroad.
They have THIRTY YEARS to run, and bear Interest at the rate of SIX PER CENT. PER ANNUM, in Lawful Money. The Interest is payable SEMI-ANNUALLY, in January and July. They are an ABSOLUTE and UNCONDITIONAL OBLIGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, and are EXEMPT FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION,
Like all other Government Bonds. They are received by the Bank Department as Security for the Circulation of National Banks, and Circulation is issued upon them at the rate of Eighty per Cent. of their Par Value.
The length of time they have to run renders them very desirable for BANKING PURPOSES or for INVESTMENT, as they can not be called in by the Government, and the Rate of Interest can not be reduced, for THIRTY YEARS. As Gold declines, their relative value to Gold-Bearing Bonds, which are liable to be paid off so much earlier, will proportionately increase, and after 1881 they will probably be
The only Six per Cent. Bond of the United States in Existence, and they can now be bought at a rate at which they will pay A BETTER RATE OF INTEREST on the amount invested, in the room rent, than any of the Gold-Bearing Bonds, at present prices, unless Gold shall average from 20 to 30 per cent. premium for the next ten or fifteen years. So high an average premium on Gold, for the length of time, is beyond all reasonable expectation, and largely in excess of the most intelligent financial estimates.
They are issued only in limited amounts, as the work on the Pacific Railroad progresses. There is but a SMALL AMOUNT NOW IN THE MARKET, and the DEMAND IS DAILY INCREASING.

ALSO FOR SALE:
THE CENTRAL PACIFIC R. R. SEVEN PER CENT. STATE AID BONDS,
PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST PAYABLE IN GOLD.
Interest Guaranteed and Paid by the State of California.
These Bonds are secured by a Mortgage on 160 Miles of Road, from Sacramento to the California State Line, forming a part of the GREAT PACIFIC RAILROAD ROUTE, adopted and aided by the UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT. They are further secured by a Sinking Fund of $50,000 PER ANNUM IN GOLD, reserved from the earnings of the Road, and Pledged for their Redemption.
About sixty miles of the road are already completed, on which the EARNINGS ARE VERY LARGE, having been in the month of October, 1865, on fifty-three miles of road then running, upward of $65,000 IN GOLD, the road having as yet penetrated to no very important points.
With thirty miles additional completed, which will probably be ready for working by the middle of June next, the earnings are expected to be not less than $50,000 PER MONTH IN GOLD, by careful estimates based upon the present amount of traffic, the same ratio without increase, from which the Central Pacific Road is destined to be one of the MOST PROFITABLE LINES OF RAILROAD IN THE WORLD.
These Bonds are a FIRST-CLASS SECURITY in every respect, and a limited amount will be offered upon terms which render them a VERY ATTRACTIVE AND DESIRABLE INVESTMENT.
Inquiries for further particulars will receive prompt attention.

We also keep on hand, and buy and sell at market rates, all classes of UNITED STATES SECURITIES, including Six per Cent. Bonds of 1881, Five-Twenty Bonds (Issues), Ten-Forty Bonds, Seven-Thirty Treasury Notes (all Issues), One Year Certificates, Compound Interest Notes;
ALSO, NEW YORK SEVEN PER CENT. BOUNTY LOAN, AND OTHER DESIRABLE SECURITIES.
Collections made throughout the United States and Canada. Gold and Coupons bought, sold, and collected.
Deposits received from Individuals and Firms subject to Check at Sight, as in a Bank.
Certificates of Deposit, available in all parts of the country, issued without charges.
Liberal arrangements will be made with Banks and Bankers throughout the country for their New York Accounts.
Orders for the purchase and sale of Miscellaneous Stocks and Bonds carefully executed at the Regular Stock Exchange.

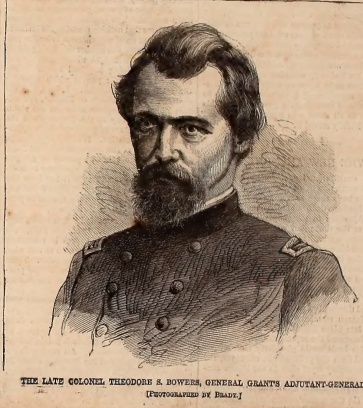
HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—No. 482.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.



THE LATE COLONEL BOWERS.

COLONEL THEODORE S. BOWERS, who, after passing safely through the perils of General GRANT'S campaigns, was killed by accident on the 7th inst., was a native of Illinois. He was a printer by trade, and at the breaking out of the war edited a Democratic paper in Southern Illinois. He entered the military service as a private in the Forty-eighth Illinois Infantry, declining a commission, and served with this regiment until the return of Gen. GRANT'S reconnoissance in January, 1862, when he was detailed as clerk at the General's head-quarters.

Colonel BOWERS was with GRANT at Fort Henry and Donelson, and until the 9th of March following, when he accepted the First-Lieutenancy of his Company, declining the Captaincy, which was tendered him. He held this position at the battle of Shiloh, during which he was again called to GRANT'S head-quarters and appointed Aid-de-camp. In November, 1862, he was made Captain and Aid-de-camp, and soon after Major and Judge-Advocate in the Army of the Tennessee. In September, 1863, he was assigned Assistant Adjutant-General, with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel—succeeding to Colonel RAWLINS, promoted. From that time till the surrender of LEE'S army he was General GRANT'S chief Assistant-Adjutant-General in the field, and at the close of the war retained the same position. In September, 1865, he was, in consideration of his eminent services, appointed Major and Assistant Adjutant-General in the regular army.

Colonel BOWERS was killed instantly by falling between the cars while attempting to get on the train as it was leaving Garrison's Station of the Hudson River Railroad. General GRANT with his son, accompanied by the Colonel, arrived at Garrison's Station, opposite West Point, at a late hour on the evening of the 7th, and was compelled to remain overnight. The next day the party went across, and the General, leaving his son at West Point, returned to the east side with Colonel BOWERS. When the train arrived by which they were to return to New York some difficulty occurred in relation to a carpet-bag belonging to the party being missed, when Colonel BOWERS followed the station agent to the office to see about it, General GRANT, in the mean time, being seated in the car next to the rear. When the agent arrived in the ticket-office he picked up a carpet-bag and presented it to the view of Colonel BOWERS, who said, "That is not the one." These were the last words spoken by the deceased. The train at that time was in motion, when Colonel BOWERS rushed out to get on board. In attempting to do so he seized hold of the railing on the platform of the car in which General GRANT was seated, and jumped upon the step, his body striking with such force against the car as to break his hold on the railing, precipitating him from the step. In the fall he swung around between the cars, his head and that part of his body above the hips falling inside of the track, the car running over him, producing death instantly. His body was dragged about one hundred yards on to a switch and over it, the head being horribly mutilated, as was also the upper part of the body. As soon as possible the train was stopped, and the body of the unfortunate man was taken from the track.

General GRANT was notified of the accident by Mr. GARRISON, the proprietor of the ferry, who said, "General, I think your Adjutant is killed." General GRANT replied, "Something told me he was killed;" and upon seeing the body he said, "That is he; a very estimable man he was. He has been with me through all my battles." Turning to Major HILL, of West Point, he ordered the body to be taken to that place and buried, there to remain until further orders.

PAYING PENSIONERS.

We give an illustration on this page of the manner in which United States pensioners are treated at the Pension Office in the basement of the Custom-house of this city. During the week, ending March 9, several hundred of the two or three thousand wounded and disabled veterans received their dues for the six months preceding. The accumudations provided for this purpose are very inadequate. The office is in a basement to which the only access is by a precipitous flight of steps.

There are so few clerks, and so wretched are the accommodations provided for them, that people attending the office, some of them maimed soldiers and many of them aged women, are compelled to stand in a long line for many hours in the wind and cold waiting their turn. The policeman at the entrance has his duty with commendable patience, but finds it hard work to sometimes resist the pressure. Spite of the many proposed remedies to the evil affairs have remained as they were, and the line which extended from the door of the office in Exchange Place around the corner of the Custom-house and thence into Wall Street at the foot of William in days by-gone still occupies the same position. As only two hundred and fifty persons are paid each day, the same hundred to such varying from twelve to three hundred dollars, the proceedings will require some days for completion.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1866.

MAKE HASTE SLOWLY.

IT is agreed by all loyal men that the mere fact of laying down arms did not entitle the late insurgent States to resume immediately their full relations in the Union. The principle of the President's policy hitherto is that those States must conform to certain conditions prescribed by the Government. That is also the principle asserted by Congress. These conditions must, of course, be reasonable and generous; but they can be wisely determined only by ample knowledge and deliberation. Some risk must be taken, some perils ventured. But after so terrible a war we can surely afford to be careful in establishing peace. We must build upon things together that upon words, and the action of the Government must be determined not by theories but by the actual state of affairs.

The important point to ascertain is whether those whose honest hostility to the Government led them to attempt its overthrow are still inimical to it; and if so, whether they should at once be intrusted with an equal share in its administration. That the rebellion was the fruit of an original and traditional difference of interpretation of the Constitution is undeniable. That the section in which the war was waged had a very hearty hatred of the other section is known. In every part of the country this is the subject; and that the citizens lately insurgent are conquered and not converted is not only a recognized fact, but the supposition of any other feeling on their part is scorned and derided as showing profound ignorance of history and human nature.

This being admitted, it is not fair to assume, and is not the assumption so far honorable and not dishonorable to the citizens in question, that being men of strong convictions, of earnest purpose, and of skill and patience, they will endeavor to use their new opportunities for the same result to which they turned their arms? That if they are admitted to Congress they will unite with those who defended and excused their rebellion, will not be denied. That the combination would attempt to repudiate the national debt, and to allow compensation for emancipated slaves and for property destroyed by war; that it would abolish the national defense of the freedmen and approve the black codes of the late slave States; that it would attack the validity of the Emancipation Amendment as having been adopted by some States under coercion, and by every means at hand seek to plunge this country into foreign war in order to effect that secession which the civil war failed to achieve, must be believed by those who hold that it is foolish to suppose that the defeated party are converted because they are overpowered.

Certainly no man can wish to take such a view. No man can wish to feel that the dominant feeling of the population in the lately disturbed section is hostile to the Government; but he must deny that the inference from a flight of evidence shows it. The action of the conventions and of the legislatures; the elections of State officers and of Representatives and Senators; the black codes; the vagrant laws; the tone of the press and of private conversation; the testimony before the Committee of Congress and special correspondence in the newspapers; the tales of commercial and other travelers—all prove that the sentiment of the lately insurgent States is unfriendly to the Government and Union. There is testimony also upon the other side. There are private letters from agents and immigrants of various kinds; but the cardinal evidence is obtained by other individual evidence, and the prevailing state of feeling must be inferred from the sources we have indicated. Now is there any reason to suppose that in proportion as these States again acquire power of any kind it will not be used inimically to the country?

We shall, of course, be asked whether we would therefore govern them as colonies; whether we shall probably increase their love by constant humiliation; whether they will become more friendly by being held at arm's-length; whether we expect them to love the name of Yankee, or to confess that they were wrong as well as worsted; and whether we should respect them as much if they were not angry enough to stand by their cause? Such questions are natural, and we have no difficulty in answering them. Neither by the Free-Soil dent does, except the Copperhead party, asks for indiscriminate admission or for indefinite exclusion. But there is a middle point between these two, and firm, while it must be taken and will be, but also some securities may be demanded which are more than words.

It is plain that the calm spirit in which the Union should have been restored has been lost by the misunderstanding between the President and Congress. But one preliminary measure is clearly essential, and that is one upon which President and Congress can agree.

If the President was not opposed to making assent to the emancipation amendment a condition precedent to the resumption of the relations of the disturbed States with the Union, he can not fairly object to adding to it an amendment providing for equal representation which emancipation has made necessary. If it were proper to propose and pass one amendment while certain States were not represented, it can not be improper to pass the other. Surely we are bound to take care that the insurgent States have not gained a formidable advantage within the Union by rebelling against it. Let us at least secure the principle of representation by apportioning it to voters, and so as much toward intrusting the government of this country to all those who honestly love it and have faithfully served it.

THE NEW AMENDMENT.

This constitutional amendment apportioning representation to population and excluding from the basis those to whom the franchise is denied has been defeated in the Senate. There were objections to the proposition which we stated at the time; but we should, under all the circumstances, have regretted its defeat as a serious blow to the prospects of speedy organization if we were not very sure that the amendment would be carried through in the session which is sure to be remedied. The emancipation amendment, upon the assumption of four millions freedmen and a basis of a hundred thousand persons for a representative, adds sixteen members to the representation of the late Slave States. Yet the population which increased the representation of that which originally the basis would give forty members, is excluded from the polls, and is, moreover, the only thoroughly loyal class in the States concerned.

This is an absurdity which must be adjusted; and as the Committee's amendment has failed, Senator DOOLITTLE has introduced a substitute, as follows:

"After the census to be taken in the year 1870 and each succeeding census representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be entitled to them under this Union according to the number in each State of male electors over twenty-one years of age, qualified by the laws thereof to choose members of the most numerous branch of its legislature; and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the value of the real and personal taxable property situated in each State, not belonging to the State or the United States."

This is virtually the amendment which the President has long since proposed, which he suggested in the conversation with Senator DIXON. Its spirit is the same as that of the defeated proposition; but it is more moderate in language, and it offers a strong inducement for its enlargement. It appeals to the love of political power, and expects to effect that enfranchisement of the colored population which is the key of the situation.

Senator WILSON, whose political sagacity and fidelity to freedom are proverbial, is of opinion that the rejected amendment would have produced equal suffrage in the late slave States within five years. Doubtless he and all his friends are, as Senator FESSENDEN says, in favor of abolishing all caste distinctions immediately. But they are very sure that the result can be better accomplished indirectly and by degrees. The failure of the Senate, as shown by the fate of Senator HENDERSON'S proposed amendment, which forbade any State to discriminate against any citizen on account of color or race. A radical Senate gave ten yeas for the proposition and thirty-seven nays. Senators YATES, SUMNER, and CLARK made the same effort with a still worse result. The Senate has plainly pronounced for leaving the regulation of the suffrage to the States.

It becomes therefore the duty of every man who knows that there can be, and ought to be, no cessation of agitation until the colored citizen has exactly the same defenses of his rights that every other citizen has, to urge the adoption of the new amendment. There are doubtless difficulties and objections. But now that the effort to secure a direct adjustment of the suffrage in the States by the Senate has failed, Mr. SUMNER and his friends, who defeated the Committee's amendment, assume a very grave responsibility if they also defeat Mr. DOOLITTLE'S.

STATE POWER OVER THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

THE idea is entertained by many citizens that acts of the Legislature subjecting the city of New York to the control of State officers in whole or in part is an infringement of the corporate rights of the city; but this opinion must immediately be dispelled when it is understood that the city has no public powers except those derived, directly or indirectly, from the Constitution of the State, and that, like all other cities, it is part of its political machinery for carrying into effect the public power of government. It is true that the charter of the city was derived originally from other sources, but on the establishment of the Revolution the State of New York succeeded to the rights over the charter which the Parliament of Great Britain might previously have exercised. Those rights were partially modified by the Constitution of the United States, which declared that no State should impair the obligation of contracts. So far, therefore, as the franchises of the city possessed such pecuniary value as to take the shape of property they may be free of State control. The Constitution of the State also declares that whatever contained in it should be deemed to annul any charters to bodies politic or corporate; but neither this saving clause nor the one protecting such documents any clearance from being impaired affects in any manner those public powers which relate to the matter of government. Indeed, the old charters of cities, towns, or English, are so seldom looked at, except to ascertain the rights residing in the city to the property and the rights in the nature of property which appertain to the municipality. It would be a strange anomaly if one of the instruments of the State for carrying into effect its powers of government should become an independent authority in this respect, and hence it has been the custom of the Legislature ever since it had existence to amend and alter the charter in public matters almost at its pleasure.

A volume of laws entitled "Acts of the Legislature relating to the City of New York," has been printed, which will be a convenient book for those who are interested to find what powers and rights the city may exercise. These acts cover the whole ground of municipal power. Every amendment made to the charter have been submitted to the vote of the commonalty of the city, but it is perfectly well known that such vote is wholly unnecessary to the validity of the alterations. The power of the Legislature over the subject, so far, we repeat, as the measure is public, is limited only by the Constitution. All society in relation to the legality of the Health bill may be dismissed, and with respect to its expediency, there are strong grounds for believing that the bill will meet with approval, except on the part of those functionaries who were displaced by it, whose alarms are expressed because their position as tax-eaters has been suddenly terminated.

The hopes of good government with respect to all matters of health so generally inspired by the passage of the bill is unbounded, and the judicious appointments under it made by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, will be found in the same direction for relief against the abuses and corruptions from which the community suffers. We weigh well our words when we declare that the health of the city under the bill, and what exists of the old system are, with few exceptions, the portion of the community most obnoxious to its provisions. Instead of being the protectors of the community they are engaged in the distribution of its property among the great body of tax-consumers. Instead of being employed in maintaining the just authority of government, they strive to break it down and reduce all to their degraded level.

The question arises, to what lengths the Legislature should go in remedying such defects in an important portion of its public machinery. We answer, very clear, that inasmuch as misgovernment widely prevails, to the great damage of the city and State, and to an extent likely to bring the system into contempt, and as the class responsible for the good working of every part of its machinery, the process of change should go forward until the object of government shall be accomplished—that is to say, the safety, security, and happiness of its citizens. The police system, established by State authority and maintained by a decision of the court of last resort, gives unqualified satisfaction. The fire law, created also by the Legislature, is growing rapidly in public estimation, and needs experience of it to put us secret. We trust that other changes may be made with equal prudence and wisdom, in which case all those who do not profit by misgovernment will be gratified.

What is most wanted in our city government is a Board created in the interest of tax-payers, which shall be empowered to approve or disapprove of every measure which involves the expenditure of money so that a concurrence of tax-eaters and of tax-payers shall be expressed as a condition of its adoption. If some measure of this character be not adopted, and the city remains in the hands of tax-consumers with their present powers, it is difficult to perceive what will become of the property which can so easily be squandered.

A SIGN.

AN instructive illustration of the present feeling at the South is found in the following clauses from the Tax-bill lately passed by the Alabama Legislature:

"12. Be it enacted, &c., for sale, for one year, at any one place, any pictorial or illustrated weekly, or any monthly paper, periodical, or magazine, published outside the limits of the State, and not in a foreign country, and to vend the same on the streets, or on boats or railroad cars, fifty dollars.

"13. To keep a news depôt for one year, in any city, town, or village, for the sale of any pictorial periodical, magazine, not including pictorials, provided for in the preceding paragraph, ten dollars."

In the last many months since Provisional Governor PARSONS of Alabama came among us to solicit pecuniary aid, and, according to Mr. BECCHER, he met no unwilling response. Indeed Northern capital and energy and skill are all ready and waiting to reinforce those of the Southern States the moment there is any indication of a fair security of person and property in the lately disturbed section.

But such laws as those we quote are merely steps backward toward barbarism. Do not the intelligent men of Alabama see that the education alone lies the sole hope of a return of peace and prosperity to the State? No civilized people was ever benefited by ignorance, and people was ever benefited by ignorance, and people was ever more serious to a community than ignorance enforced by law.

The clauses of the bill which we quote are directed, it will be observed, against the illustrated weekly and monthly papers and magazines published in this country. English or French or German literature of the kind, so far as which is inquired, as we have seen during the war, by hatred and contempt of American institutions, may be freely introduced. The clauses we quote are intended to prohibit the sale of the periodical literature published at the North. It is an effort to silence the expression of sentiments which the Government of the State does not like. It is a direct and despotic assault upon free discussion; and like all despotism of the kind is a confession of utter weakness. It is a heavy and gratuitous libel upon knowledge. It is an attempt to perpetuate that tyranny based upon ignorance which enabled a few men to bookwhip and bully despotic the people of the South until they maddened them into revolution.

Now the sentiments of this paper and of many other papers are no more agreeable to the corrupt opinions of the South than those opinions are to us. But we ask any sensible man in Alabama, however he may differ from our views, whether he is unwilling to trust the fundamental principle of a free government? If he fought during the war for a simple despotism, of course the nearer he approaches it the more the Union the more satisfied he will be. But if he fought for what he believed to be a free popular government, he knows that such a government is impossible unless all shares as the corporate functions of the State than those opinions are to us. But we ask any sensible man in Alabama, however he may differ from our views, whether he is unwilling to trust the fundamental principle of a free government? If he fought during the war for a simple despotism, of course the nearer he approaches it the more the Union the more satisfied he will be. Patrick's day. The Catholic Bishop of Toronto has issued a letter advising all good Catholics to pray that England may do justice to Ireland, and that divine mercy may change the hearts of those who pretend to remedy the evils of Ireland by invading Canada. Certain newspapers in this country magnify every thing said and done upon the subject; but the genius of blarney plays so large a part in the performance that it is not easy to know a single fact of the matter.

It is observable, however, that the Church of Ireland opposes the agitation, and that no conspicuous Irish leader either at home or in this country is identified with it. The leaders pass for as they have been reported, are earnest appeals for contributions on the one hand, and the maddest practice on the other. Meanwhile in Ireland, where the habeas corpus is suspended and the Government is fully aroused and active, no horrible denomination has been made, and no plan of action is any where apparent. Even after the week following the news of the suspension the orators in this country adjured their hearers to pour out money to aid those at home who were "in the gap," and who were doubtless even then fighting, but the subsequent steamer brought tidings of nothing but continued excitement and arrests.

The only serious apprehension seems to lie in the fact that leaders who excite the passions of such a people as those who attend Irish mass meetings in this country and give their money will demand their money's worth. If the leaders pass round the hat to pay for a scrimmage, the scrimmage of course will come, must be or their own heads are in danger. The peril has probably passed in Ireland. The Government is in the field first, and every day strengthens it and deprives any insurrection of the advantage of panic, which is incalculable. It is, therefore, quite time for sensible Irishmen in this country to consider what is likely to become of the money which they may have subscribed toward the Republic of Ireland. That republic can not be established in Canada nor in Jones's Wood. Every day the present chances of its establishment upon the green isle? Rash men may cause infinite suffering in innocent persons in this country and elsewhere. But there is no other possible result of Fenianism.

THE TUMBLE IN GOLD.

GOLD has fallen again—below 130. The event has sent a thrill through commercial, agricultural, and industrial society. A fall in gold implies a fall in produce, which reduces the profits of farmers, forwarders, and shipping merchants; in dry goods and general merchandise, which sends merchants home with a heartache, thinking of stocks on hand; in domestic goods, which sets manufacturers a-thinking whether it were not better at once to shut up mills and discharge hands instead of giving wages. Again, it is bad news, Signor Blitz tells us on Chili, the President makes war on the Radicals, the Fenian talk war against England, history is being made daily on every side, but nothing in all this comes so straight home to every man as the fall in gold.

The readers of this journal have been fully forewarned of the decline. Ever since January a fall in gold has been imminent. The unexpectedly large supply of cotton, and the steadily increasing foreign demand for United States bonds, long since insured low rates of exchange, and consequently a reduced inquiry for gold. No man now buys gold for investment; foreign exchange, which is the same as gold, can be bought at 1 per cent. less. Few buy gold for speculation; for the Treasury Department holds a specie reserve which it is prepared to put on the market at any time in irresistible amounts. The only supporters of the gold market are operators who have sold for the fall, and who are obliged to buy from time to time to fulfill their contracts. It would not indeed be strange, in view of the dullness of exchange, of the reduced demand for imported goods, of the increased steadiness of inquiry for Five-Twenty bonds, of the prospect of currency contraction, and of the steadily increasing supply of gold from California and from private hoards, if the price fell to 125 or even lower before midsummer.

To producers, manufacturers, and holders of goods this is of the deadliest omen prospect. It means a steady shrinkage of prices, and a constant drain upon the capital of holders or makers of goods and merchandise. But it is but natural. For nobody wants to produce more and holders of goods, produce and merchandise, made money so easily that they seemed to possess the royal key to wealth. A merchant only needed to fill his store with goods, and in thirty or sixty days jobbers eagerly depleted it on a substantial advance. A farmer only required to plant double the usual breadth, and his profits were in the square of previous years. Manufacturers only needed to keep every loom at work, and dividends of 50 per cent. per annum came without endeavor. The currency was constantly expanding in volume and declining in value, prices were constantly rising, and the producer and the holder were just as steadily realizing profits. That was flood-tide: we are now on the ebb. The currency has ceased to increase. Without any legislative action the interest-bearing legal tender—of which security for $180,000,000 are afloat—have practically passed out of circulation, being clogged by the interest due upon them. Of the remainder of the currency, viz., the National Bankers and the National bank notes, the South is beginning to consume a large quantity—more, we judge, than the Controller of the Currency is issuing to new banks. Thus the actual currency volume per-money is diminishing daily without Congressional action. In the course of a few weeks, if not days, some bill or other will pass Congress which will look to a still more direct curtailment of the paper circulating medium. Under these circumstances, it is plain that prices must move in exactly the direction opposite to that which they pursued when the currency was ever on the increase.

To illustrate the point by a familiar example. A horse-owner bought his oats of a dealer in his neighborhood, taking them in small lots of 50 bushels at a time to suit the size of his bin. In 1863, 1864, and 1865, the dealer supplied the oats at the price of the day. He bought probably once a month. A fortnight after his purchase his customer required supply. They were put in at the price of the day, which naturally proved to be from 5 to 10 cents a bushel higher than the dealer had paid for them. When the turn in prices came in 1865, the dealer attempted to charge for his oats the price he had paid for them. "No, no," said his customer, "when I was buying rising you charged me the price of the day, whatever it was, without regard to the price you had previously paid for the oats; and now you shall stick to your rule. I will pay the price of the day of delivery." So the dealer throughout this winter has been supplying his customer at a loss. He must buy to supply his customers; but every fortnight his stock declines in value. So it is with coal, dry goods, hardware, and every article which is bought and sold for gold.

There is no room to question whether we shall have a panic. Sound reasons can be given pro and con. On the one hand, holders, on the general rule, are showing good sense by marking down prices. No harm can come in the future; while capitalists are so shy of business paper of the second and third grades that in the event of a heavy crash the losses on the wrecks would be fewer than otherwise. On the other hand, it is notorious that large quantities of produce, cotton, coal, dry goods, hardware, and other merchandise are lying held on sea-board, at the West, and even abroad on margins. All this would necessarily be sacrificed in the event of a panic. Speculation in gold, and in the absence of a demand for consumption the result of forced sales would be uncertain. Perhaps the police rule may apply. The guardians of the public peace say that a riot which is predicted never breaks out. So, possibly, a panic upon which people speculate and against which they insure.

It is not a little amusing to note the attitude of Wall Street in view of these ominous prospects. Speculation in that meridian is lively. Not to say any thing of Mr. Vanderbilt, the leading director of the Erie Railway, is buying up the stock of that insolvent corporation, and has run it to per cent. higher than it was when gold was 137. Another leading Wall Street buying director of the Rock Island Railroad, is buying up the stock of that concern, and it is 12 per cent. higher than it was when gold was 137. Another clique, led by the leading director of the Michigan Southern, is buying up the stock of that unproductive enterprise, and it is 11 per cent. higher than it was when gold was 137. What the calculation of these various cliques may be, it were vain to conjecture. Published reports inform us that the earnings of all these roads have been falling off steadily for three months; and common sense adds that, with a steady decline in produce, and in the Western consumption of merchandise, the decline must continue throughout the year. Still, money being easy, there is nothing to prevent a progressive advance in the stocks over which a clique undertakes to buy up; the interesting question is, how shall these cliques sell, and to whom, when they propose to reap the harvest they have sown and manured and bargained for?

HUMAN LIABILITY TO DISEASE.

WE once heard a lecturer on Health say: "If the laws of health were strictly obeyed all might live to a good old age. I have no sympathy with the religious consolation which is often offered to the bereaved, as, for example, to a mother when her child dies. I do not believe that it is right to say to her that the Lord has taken away her child. She has thrown it away by disregarding in its care the laws of health." This, it is plain, is a strong statement; but does it go so very far beyond the truth as it at first thought seems to do? Let us see.

There is a marked contrast between man and other animals as to the frequency and variety of disease. Of the comparative few that are subject to those which come under the control of man, and are therefore exposed to somewhat similar influences—horse, cattle, etc. They are by no means as subject to disease as men are. The difference is greatest when we look at the period of infancy. The young of these animals seldom sicken and die, while a large proportion of the human race die in infancy.

Why this contrast? Is it owing to a difference in original constitution—in the organization and its functions? There is no evidence of this, for the functions of digestion, respiration, circulation, nutrition, growth, etc., are performed in these animals very much in the same way as in the human system, and therefore we naturally suppose that they would be equally liable to derangement if they were performed under the same circumstances.

The question then arises, is there any difference in the circumstances adequate to account for the difference of results? If there be such a difference it must come obviously from the mind of man, for it is here that the most marked difference between him and other animals lies. And yet, so superior is he in this respect to them that one would think him less liable to disease, from the intelligent control that he can exercise over external circumstances. This would be a legitimate inference if he were a pure being, and had the wisdom which would necessarily come from purity. But sin rules in this degenerate race of man, and moves to sinful indulgence, which in all its various forms mars the physical organization and renders it liable to disease. A signal example of the effects of such indulgence we have in the use of alcohol. No true animal drinks this poison, but its use as a beverage is a familiar custom of civilized man.

Then, besides the wrong use of external circumstances, we have the effects of sinful passion in all its varied forms. Every one sees a wide influence in the production of disease there is no doubt, though its working is to a great extent secret.

There is also a hereditary curse which involves the mental powers. The use may be either excessive or wrong in character. This may be seen in all the departments of the mental manifestations, in the intellect, but especially during education, while mind and brain are growing to maturity. The brute animal has no hereditary curse resulting from immental sources, which so commonly in man give rise to congestions and other changes of the brain, to a great variety of nervous maladies, and to diseases of organs in various quarters from their sympathy with the brain. It may be properly remarked in this place, that to the laws of health the mind has a mind so different in some of its qualities from that of the brute increases the liability to physical derangement. Even the influence of family peculiarities or of the unwise use of the mental powers, or the addition of such high mental endowments creates a wider exposure than ordinary to the system of brute animals, and complication always adds to the risk of disease.

In estimating the influences of which we have spoken we must remember that they do not end with the individual. They extend to his child, and may accumulate through successive generations. Sometimes diseases themselves are transmitted, but more often it is a predisposition to disease or some characteristics which become hereditary. It is the accumulation of these tendencies in the course of generations that gives rise to a large proportion of the greater readiness with which sickness is generated in man than in other animals, when both are exposed to similar physical influences. What occurs in the individual is not alone adequate to account for it.

Perhaps it will be said that there are maladies peculiar to mankind which may account for the difference in the aggregate of disease. But may not these not be in part due to sin in the ancestor which are peculiar to animals? It is true these appear to be less than those which are peculiar to man; but this may be owing in part to other causes than that which is predicted never breaks out. So, possibly, a panic upon which people speculate and against which they insure.

It is not a little amusing to note the attitude of Wall Street in view of these ominous prospects. Speculation in that meridian is lively. Not to say any thing of Mr. Vanderbilt, the leading director of the Erie Railway, is buying up the stock of that insolvent corporation, and has run it to per cent. higher than it was when gold was 137. Another leading Wall Street buying director of the Rock Island Railroad, is buying up the stock of that concern, and it is 12 per cent. higher than it was when gold was 137. Another clique, led by the leading director of the Michigan Southern, is buying up the stock of that unproductive enterprise, and it is 11 per cent. higher than it was when gold was 137. What the calculation of these various cliques may be, it were vain to conjecture. Published reports inform us that the earnings of all these roads have been falling off steadily for three months; and common sense adds that, with a steady decline in produce, and in the Western consumption of merchandise, the decline must continue throughout the year. CHRISTIAN CHARITY.

THE funeral of the late Rev. DR. EDWARD B. HALL, of Providence, Rhode Island, was a singular and beautiful tribute to the Christian charity of that city and to the saintly character of DR. HALL. He had been for thirty-three years settled over the First Congregational Unitarian Society, and during all that time he led a still good and generous works; his fidelity to the suffering and the poor; his constant sympathy with the pastoral duty; his ability in the pulpit; and the modesty of his spotless life, had made him perhaps the best beloved citizen in Providence. A great concourse of every sect, and from many places, came sorrowing to his funeral. The Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the State; the Baptist President of Brown University; a fellow-clergyman of the Presbyterian church, a Quaker preacher, and a Universalist were among the pall-bearers. March 6:

In the Senate, the bill to reimburse Missouri for her expenses in calling out militia was passed.—A very lengthy message from the President, in response to Mr. Sumner's resolution of inquiry, in regard to the organization of governments in the lately rebellious States, was received and ordered to be printed; also the report of operations in the Freedmen's Bureau, both of which were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

In the House, the Military Academy bill was reconsidered, and, on motion of Mr. Schenck, an amendment was passed—50 to 49—striking out of the money appropriated by this or any other act shall be applied to the pay or subsistence of any officer or soldier who has been in the rebellion against the Government of the United States appointed after the 1st day of January, 1866, unless such duties shall have been returned to the original relations to the Union, under any system of its own or joint resolution of Congress for that case made and provided.—The Reconstruction Committee's bills were up for consideration. Mr. Morrill addressed the House in support of the bill. It had been a most unusual day in the history of the organization of the Reciprocity Treaty on the 11th of the present month. A vast treaty had been in force and operation for five years. It had been first extended from or by the armed mid made during our Revolution. In 1826, by the united Governments of the Provinces, let on by the Imperial Government, and also by the Crown. Now by the Provinces, and by the united legislature. We were too old to be again deluded, and let the lights shine in the darkness. Such a bill, however, if to a great, Henceforth we should treat the Provinces as States, and abolish their privileges as we do those of favorites or a sensitive. By the present bill certain principles were proposed, provided a scope of operation was established; but in the mean time the object was increased fourfold. To show that the Reciprocity Treaty was an advantageous to us, it was testified to by the fishermen, by Mates, by the farmers of New York, of Connecticut, Michigan, and Maine, the wool-growers of Ohio, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, and Vermont, farmers of all the Western States, and the manufacturers whose business with the Eastern Provinces had greatly increased; but when the Provincial officers had tardily consented to the propositions made by the Secretary of the tender of terms was come to, if not less favorable to them than before. The treaty, they felt sure, could not be afford to treat us better in regard to the fishing interests involved. It was remarked that it was not to be given up whenever the comfort came, whatever the alleged grievances. It was not to be given up whenever the Provincial knew that the Provinces would be gone forever, body and soul, hot and water. But the treaty of 1854 left it in relation to the fisheries did not invite a repulse. On the contrary, it was believed, emerged from the dusk and friendly exchange of views between the Commissioners of Great Britain and the United States, appointed by the Provinces, that the terms would be readily accepted by most, if not all the Provinces, excepting by those who were interested in the trade. The rates of duty proposed in the Reciprocity Treaty, and even if not in any case prove prohibitory. In other words, be expected to be an effective stimulant. The money of them was collected; but before the sale could be allowed alongside of American fishermen, and to the Provinces, there was a price equal at least to our taxes, and often much greater. The Reciprocity Treaty would, however, prove the best that could disclose no other market so valuable. That part of the bill which went up the fishing bounties was to be taken up upon with more distrust than any thing else. The fishermen refused to sell their fish, except at such prices as would pay them on the salt used in curing their fish, and yet the Government took in some cases more than half of the bounty. The question, and not a national one, had existed even before the Revolution. It had existed ever since, and had been brought under the influence and control of man, instead of being left entirely to their natural inclinations.

Mr. Morrill's remarks have proceeded at intervals.—If the difference between man and brute animals in regard to the prevalence of disease be not sufficiently explained by the above mentioned—are there not to the conclusion that there is implanted by the Creator in the very constitution of man a tendency to disease, which tendency must be made to counteract the influence and control of man, instead of being left entirely to their natural inclinations.

Such a tendency we have presented as necessarily connected with the fact that man is a responsible creation a morbid, and not a healthy one—a proposition of which there is not the slightest proof, and which is directly opposed to many facts. The alternative is one from which we can not escape.

As the view which we have presented must then be correct, it follows that true hygiene can not accomplish a vastly greater work than is generally supposed. It has the power of preventing a very large proportion of the sickness and pain which the human family—all or nearly all that there is more than that which exists in the animal creation around us. Of course it does not do this till it had first removed all the morbid tendencies that have accumulated from the past, a work of renovation which it would require many ages to perform.

Whatever may be our estimate of the range of hygiene, it is evident that many of the causes of disease are preventable, and the distinction between these and those of an opposite character we will consider at another time.

THE funeral of the late Rev. DR. EDWARD B. HALL, of Providence, Rhode Island, was a singular and beautiful tribute to the Christian charity of that city and to the saintly character of DR. HALL. He had been for thirty-three years settled over the First Congregational Unitarian Society, and during all that time he led a still good and generous works; his fidelity to the suffering and the poor; his constant sympathy with the pastoral duty; his ability in the pulpit; and the modesty of his spotless life, had made him perhaps the best beloved citizen in Providence. CHARLES SUMNER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BLACK & CASE, BOSTON, MASS.]

CHARLES SUMNER.

CHARLES SUMNER is a name that will always remain among the most conspicuous of the present epoch of our history. No American statesman ever stood more steadfastly for the plain American principle of equal rights, and none has ever excited more exasperation or been more bitterly denounced. The reason of this is to be found in his temperament and a certain ideal cast of mind, which compels him unconsciously to disregard the conditions of practicability, and to treat public measures purely from the view of abstract justice. A man who does this must expect to encounter the impatience of friends as well as the hostility of foes. Consequently, from Mr. SUMNER'S first notable public appearance, when he delivered his famous Fourth of July oration in Boston upon "The True Grandeur of Nations," in 1845, to his last elaborate speech in the Senate upon "The Equal Rights of All: the Great Guarantee and the Present Necessity," his course has compelled moral approval rather than kindled popular enthusiasm.

Mr. SUMNER was thirty-four years old at the time of the delivery of the oration. Born in Boston in 1811, he graduated at Harvard College in 1830, and after a year of private study he entered the Law School at Cambridge, where he became the fast friend of his great teacher, Judge STORY. In 1834 he began to practice in Boston, and was at once eminent in his profession, publishing, as reporter, three volumes of Judge STORY'S Circuit Decisions, editing the American Jurist, and lecturing at the Law School in Cambridge. In 1835 he declined a chair, both in the Law School and the College, and the next year went to Europe, where he remained for three years.

The best introductions opened to him the finest social opportunities in Europe, which a mind richly stored, a trained and tenacious memory, and the various sympathies of an accomplished scholar enabled him to improve to the utmost advantage. Few Americans have better seen what was best worth seeing in Europe. His habits of ceaseless industry, his remarkable faculties of acquirement, were in constant play, and he made the personal acquaintance, which in many cases ripened into friendly intimacy, of the most distinguished Europeans. In 1840 he returned and resumed the practice of his profession, publishing, in 1844–6, an elaborate edition of "Vesey's Reports." In politics he was a Whig, although he had taken no prominent political part until the oration of which we have spoken, which was a learned and powerful plea for peaceful arbitration in all international differences. In November, 1845, he spoke in Faneuil Hall against the annexation of TEXAS as a measure intended to subdue the National Government to the control of the slavery interest. The next year, at the Whig State Convention, he defined in a forcible speech the anti-slavery duties of the Whig party, and, with an intrepidity which in a Boston Whig of that time was remarkable, he published a letter to Mr. ROBERT C. WINTHROP, then the Boston Representative in Congress, sharply rebuking him for his vote in favor of the Mexican war. This led to a rupture with Mr. WINTHROP which has never been healed, and that gentleman records his view of the matter in his volume of speeches and addresses.

The dissolution of the Whig party had already begun. The "Conscience Whigs," as they were called in Massachusetts, of whom CHARLES SEARGES, HORACE MANN, JOHN G. PALFREY, SAMUEL G. HOWE, and RICHARD H. DANA, JUN., were conspicuous leaders, withdrew from the political companionship of WEBSTER, EVERETT, CROATE, and WHITEHOUSE, and supported, in 1848, the Buffalo Free-soil candidates, MARTIN VAN BUREN and CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS. The schism was final, and from that moment the Boston Whig leadership declined. The breeders seemed to take with them the moral force of their party, and when, in 1850, MR. WEBSTER became Secretary of State under MR. FILLMORE and resigned his seat in the Senate, to which MR. WHITEHOUSE by the party traditions had been considered the natural successor, a coalition of Free-soilers and Democrats, after a long and fierce struggle, succeeded in electing CHARLES SUMNER to Mr. Webster's seat, and he accepted the office, as he had the nomination, without a single pledge to any party or person.

Mr. SUMNER came to the Senate of the United States a young man, perfectly familiar with international law and with the history and literature of all countries; with a thorough knowledge of the details of the anti-slavery movement, and a profound conviction that the insolent and dangerous determination of the Slave Power was the great peril of the nation. His fame had preceded him, and he was not welcome in a body which the spirit of CALHOUN controlled. Senators like JOHNSON of Georgia, who prevailed by audacity, or like DOUGLAS, who despised the moral sentiment, affected to sneer at what were called the dainty fogeyism and sophomoric rhetoric of the young Senator. But his speech upholding the constitutionality of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, and the opening thunders of his direct assault upon the Slave Power in the debates upon the Missouri Compromise, apprised those who and the country that there was one Senator at least who, standing upon the broad ground of moral right, was equally at home upon every inch of the discussion and of law with the most learned and the oldest of his associates. Personally of the kindest heart and most polished manners, he disliked social conciliation of his political adversaries; and his opposition was so inflexible and unsparing toward those whom he believed to be conspiring against the country that he was regarded as the personification of the unbending spirit of Liberty, which the Slave leaders knew to be their most dangerous foe. On the 19th and 20th of May, 1856, MR. SUMNER delivered a speech upon "The Crime against Kansas," which was unanswerable. In the course of it he spoke satirically of Senator BUTLER, of South Carolina, and of Representative of the Old, which MR. SUMNER was writing at his desk, he was assaulted by PRESTON S. BROOKS, a Representative from South Carolina, who beaten upon the head with a heavy gutta percha cane until he fell senseless.

It was four years before Mr. SUMNER returned to the Senate. During that time he was subject to constant, often to the severest, medical treatment at home and in Europe. While still disabled the Massachusetts Legislature re-elected him to the seat by a unanimous vote in the Senate and by a vote of several hundreds to seven in the House. Massachusetts felt while her Senator remained the sacred seat, and his first important speech struck the keynote of his Congressional life and exposed "The Barbarism of Slavery." In the caucuses for President, in 1860, he was an active worker; and at the beginning of the war he declared its "main-spring" to be slavery, and that there could be no peace until that was broken by emancipation. This policy he steadily urged until it was adopted by the Government. During the war his speeches upon the "Trent" question and our foreign relations were comprehensive and statesmanlike, and had great official weight from his position as Chairman of the Senate Committee upon Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER'S political career has been identified with the debate and the war springing from Slavery. Believing slavery to be the source of all our woes he has steadily advocated Emancipation as the radical means of national regeneration; and as the war has abolished slavery, his efforts are now turned to secure the overthrow of the spirit of caste in the organization of peace. His will is as strong as his convictions; and it is perhaps his misfortune and that of his cause that, in the constructive period which we have now reached, and in which political considerations are so essential and powerful, political differences are apt to appear to him as moral delinquencies. Immutably fixed in his own clear perception of the necessary development and ultimate achievements of the great American principle of Equal Rights, he seems anxious to secure at once, by acts of Congress, results which can be better attained by other and higher laws. But in his uncompromising desire that the faith of the United States shall be kept with the Freedmen, and that those who are still panting with the effort to destroy the Government shall not be allowed to share in its administration without satisfactory assurances, he has the hearty sympathy of all who love the Union and the national honor.

Among all American statesmen there have been few so variously and profoundly accomplished as MR. SUMNER. His literary style is stately and scholastic. Each of his speeches is an extensive treatise upon its subject. His oratory is declamatory rather than colloquial or rhetorical. A certain dogmatism of style both in writing and speaking may be easily traced to his intense personal consciousness, and to the sober times and events amidst which he has moved. But his chief fame will be that of a man who, during the maturing of a terrible conspiracy against human rights, stood as firm and clear for justice as a light-house in the fury of a storm. Without one faltering tone of compromise or fear or witless conciliation his lips proclaimed the everlasting truth that justice is right, and is therefore the best policy. The concluding words of his late speech are the true motto of his life. "And now, declaring my belief in Liberty and Equality as the God-given birth-right of all men, let me say in the same spirit, if this be an error, it is an error which I love; if this be a fault, it is a fault which I shall be slow to renounce; if this be an illusion, it is an illusion which I pray may wrap the world in its angelic forms."

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

VICTORY AND YET.

CHAPTER XI.

As the days and weeks creep by, it is very slowly but very certainly ascertained in Somerville that the great and glorious victory near Corinth was not, at last, quite so complete and final a rout of the Yankees as was at first believed. Somehow they have not fled utterly away—the miserable remnant left of them—but are still lingering, in a singular manner, near or upon the very battle-field. And it is so strange of Beauregard, that he has not long ago descended upon them again from Corinth like a thunder-bolt. Why does he not make a finish of it? What is he staying there at Corinth for? people are beginning impatiently to ask.

Like many another military idol of the time, before him and after him, Beauregard is slowly waning in public estimation. Good Mr. Ellis thanks God for it. "The career of any one General, like Napoleon, in our cause," he avows, "would be fatal to the cause." We wish victory to be won for us in such a way that to no one man, but to the whole people, and to God above all, the glory may redound. Certain it is, though there were ever so many just on the point of becoming the Marions, the Washingtons, the Napoleons of the war, in some way or other each just missed it as by a hair's-breadth, but just missed it altogether.

But the Yankees are even approaching Corinth. Lamum fills the Somerville Star with ample assurance why. Beauregard's most important event within his intrenchments at Corinth, and people say they hope so, and that he will be able to abide it; but there is misgiving hearts in every bosom in Somerville. However, there is Island No. 10. It has been made a perfect Gibraltar. It is fully demonstrated that the passage of that Island in the Mississippi River by the Federal fleet is an absolute impossibility. Every Number of the Somerville Star exults in "Island Ten," and in the laughable notion of the Yankees that it can be passed. And so for weeks; slow as the first approach of an epidemic the rumor gets afloat that Island Ten has been evacuated.

It was not Lamum's fault! To do him strict justice, never from the first had any item, or any particle of an item, appeared in his columns save of good news for the Confederacy. Many a prophecy did he make of great and glorious events; many a statement did he cautiously prepare, on the best authority, of something or other highly favorable to the Confederacy. Steadily as the days rolled by each of those prophecies fulfilled and his statements disproved, yet you would never gather a syllable to that effect from his paper. And no reader could find away each Number of the Star for future reference as carefully, or with such deep satisfaction, as did MR. FERGUSON.

Lamum had remarked: "If our gallant heroes should evacuate Columbus, it will be only to make a more impregnable stand at Island Ten." Long after Island Ten was evacuated Lamum casually remarks in his columns: "If our able and experienced leaders should evacuate Island Ten it is only to make a stand at Fort Pillow, but a short distance below;" and thereupon follows several columns of the most inscription of Fort Pillow—its natural advantages and its armament—that even a child could understand that of its capture no one need entertain the least fear. "Deluded by their frenzied leaders they dream even"—Lamum was frequently observing in his paper—"of capturing New Orleans!" If Colonel Juggins read Lamum's full and enthusiastic description of Fort Jackson and Fort St. Philip, and the other Gibraltars by which New Orleans was secured from the possibility of being taken, once, he read it a dozen times. The boom costing millions of dollars stretching across the river below the forts seems to him a waste of money. And then, the gigantic steamships building at New Orleans to dash to atoms the Federal vessels, to the Colonel they had assumed a grandeur of size and armament under the hand of energetic Lamum from which even a Brunel would have shrunk aghast.

"From what I learn of that splendid ship of war," good Mr. Ellis had said to his pastor, "even if the Federals should pass the forts below, of which I have no fear, their vessel alone moored as it is in front of the city, could drive them back."

"But the papers speak of it as not yet completed," ventured Mr. Arthur.

"One side is, one side is," urged Mr. Ellis, warmly, "the side toward the river: the guns on that side are enough, amply enough."

And to this his friend had no reply.

Stealthily and awfully as the deadly blast of which the Spaniards say, "It kills a man but does not part a taper," comes the news that New Orleans, too, is captured! A painful thing it is to state, but imperceptibly to themselves men begin to distrust Lamum and all his herd. Undefined, unacknowledged even to themselves, men begin to reason that, if the editors had so often declared them upon such points as Bowling Green, Columbus, Fort Donelson, Island Ten, Fort Pillow, Roanoke, Pulaski, New Orleans, Corinth, might they not have been equally guides on all other points also relating to Secession and its consequences? Slowly, slowly.

"I think I am beginning clearly to see the hand of Providence in lengthening out this matter," Guy Brooks remarked one night to his pastor as they sat together in the study of the latter. "You know my brother, Paul Brooks; he has been down lately from his solitude among the Pines. He was always fond of solitude and reflection—old bachelor that he is. He has been giving me the benefit of his months of thought up there. We are, he thinks, passing through a revolution indeed, not only a political, but a social, moral, religious revolution. Were it only a political revolution, the establishment of the Confederacy, or the putting down of Secession say, it might have been a thing begun and over in a few months. But it is to be, he thinks, a total revolution in our deepest and dearest convictions on many subjects of vastly greater importance than the mere question of Secession and Union. Such revolutions of thought, belief, opinion, feeling can not be effected all at once. To be sincere and permanent, people must have time to think; yes, time, plenty of it, to think."

"For the divisions of Reuben there were great thoughts of heart," said the minister. "I have been much struck with that passage of Scripture myself of late. Yes, the political leaders have had space, for instance, in which to show themselves—

MR. FERGUSON AND HIS RECORD.

"From the tips of their horns to the points of their cloven feet," interrupted the lawyer. "And the people are slowly but steadily finding them out: it is a lesson being very slowly learned, but once learned it will never be forgotten on this continent forever."

"Unless I greatly mistake the South is learning other lessons also," said the minister, after a thoughtful pause. "God is causing us to read over again, beneath the blazing torch of his providence, other matters in which I for one was as thoroughly settled and satisfied as any man could be. We will not speak upon that matter just now—let us wait and see."

"We will see one day," the lawyer remarked, "the wonderful dealing of the Almighty with us in permitting this war to linger so long. Suppose Manassas had resulted the other way, the Confederacy been crushed in the bud, it would have been a mere victory of force—nothing else. There would have been nothing of a radical cure of the evil, nothing safe and permanent afterward. I tell you, Sir," continued he, rising to his feet, and leaning his burly form against the mantle as if the idea was too large and free to be expressed save upon his feet, "especially we here, at the South, are slowly, steadily coming toward convictions, conclusions that shall be those of our own minds and hearts. The bayonets are holding the question open only till we have had time to think the whole matter to the end. As firmly as I believe in my own existence, I do believe that this whole continent is steadily coming to such a oneness of sentiment as will make us such a Union—such a nation as—"

"The old Union was but an emblem of a scaffolding toward," the minister added for him. "I tell you, Mr. Brooks, Southerners as we both are, we can not disguise from ourselves the fact that, on some points, we of the South lag in the march, are a century or so behind the sentiment, the conviction, the Christianity of the times. I have had an uneasy conviction of the sin for years, but quicken myself with the knowledge of its being the providence of God, his peculiar dispensation in our case. And it is only God's providence in present events which I am now waiting to understand. For one I have no notion of fighting against God. Nor have I any intention of being upon the obsolete side, the waning side of a great question. If you glance your eye over the history of the world you will notice that there are certain periods of time when you can run, as it were, a pencil line between where one era ends and a new and better era begins. And there always is a party for the old era fighting blindly and desperately for it! God helping me, I belong not to the old, worn-out era which the world is sloughing off, but to that era which is better, which is still to succeed, which is that much nearer the Christ that is to come. My happening to be born in the Southern Islands would have been poor excuse for me, therefore, to have fought against civilization and Christianity when they had actually come from God on its shores!"

And it was well for Edward Arthur, and for the many like him scattered throughout the South, that he and they had a belief in those days clear enough, strong enough, inspiring enough, to bear them up through poverty, and the alienation of their dearest friends, and the hatred and insult of innumerable enemies, and death always imminent; in some cases actually inflicted; a belief, thank God, which grew clearer, stronger, more inspiring, as the darkness and the peril around them grew dense. Easy enough it was for you, Sir, living outside the South during those days, to possess convictions clear and right upon the subject of slavery. You heard nothing else all day among your friends. You read nothing else in your papers, pamphlets, books. You had the whole profession poured upon you from the platform with all force of argument and eloquence. You had it urged upon you in every speaking that met your eye, backed upon you in every transparency, waved before you in every flag, thundered upon you in cartoons of telling color, vivid, and in the infinite hurrahs of the people! Little merit in your going with the right—how easy it was to you!—when you were in the centre of a great torrent pouring irresistibly onward.

But look at this man, Edward Arthur, one case in multitudes at the South during those long and dark months. From the first hour of that sinful call he could be received as one of correspondence from any one outside the South, nor any during the first two years of the war, at least, from a correspondent within the South, save in enthusiastic support of Secession. Such of his correspondents as shared his convictions were prudently silent, well aware that the seal of a letter was no bond whatever against the reading of the letter by dozens before it could reach its owner's; at the utmost an insurance, do a carefully-veiled sarcasm, a word here and a phrase there, capable of being understood only by the one to whom the letter was addressed. From that hour, during the same length of time, no Northern or European paper, pamphlet, or book met his eye that was not printed that did not meet his gaze being in furious advocacy of Secession. Except as their arms proved it, there was a faint glimmering through the darkness of opinion and sentiment outside the blockade. By himself, even his correspondents shared similar views, mistaking those views mainly to their own bosoms, often speaking and acting in direct opposition to them, a real originality, standing alone and unaided, by himself and for himself, he arrived at those opinions to which he held as to his life, and by no other than his own light grasp upon the opinion being for him to relax his hold even upon life.

And it was so it was. Only, never wonder at the clearness and energy with which Southern men hold to views which they have then adopted, to values in action as much as the man who has earned them with sweat and toil; the belle of the ball-room holds not to her values with the concentrated force of the diver who has brought them up from the depths and darkness of roaring waters.

"Lamunn says, in his last Star, that I am a traitor to my native soil," the lawyer said, after a long pause. "I really wonder if am," he continued gravely, weighing the proposition in his mind with his finger behind his ear. "What is my pay for being a traitor? I am post officer, Morris says. And Bat Roberts told me that any thing I would have he would see that I did have if I said so. It is a singular fact, Sir, that one, and a number of the leaders in Secession in or around Somerville but urge this hour in receipt of letters from Senator Roberts or Confederate States Senator; Lamunn has the printing of the Confederate laws; Tim Lamunn, Lamunn's nephew, is a conductor; Colonel Goodlett has a contract for corn; Dr. Peel is making thousands by his contract for beef; even Captain Simmons is getting, when sober, of the Confederate Court; and Bob Withers is a Tax Collector; Joe Staples is Receiver of Confiscated Property—every one of them but has a full office, or, if in the army, but is a Colonel or a Quartermaster. Bribe? On account of my opinions my business is ruined and nothing will be left to; my best friends will hardly speak to me. I held to my original opinions upon Secession against every one with cash. As to the bribing them—the fact is," added the lawyer, "as Paul, that brother of mine, says, either I am entirely and hopelessly deranged or the Secessionists are."

It is weeks ago now since it had occurred to Mrs. Sorel, knitting, spinning, weaving, making starch, soap, candles, hats, caps, shoes, and every thing else in her place near Somerville, that it would be a great favor to her if Mr. Arthur could occupy the vacant front-room on the left-hand side of the hall in her house. Nobody, now Frank is gone, but herself and Bobby. It was a delicate matter to bring about under all the circumstances. But remember the best diplomats in the world. Talleyrands are they by sex; and Mrs. Sorel had her purpose announced and Mr. Arthur established at home in her front-room almost before he knew it was a thing in view. The truth is, he himself and Mrs. Sorel were still the progeny of the same as well as Mrs. Sorel, and only Mrs. Sorel could have managed it so quietly and pleasantly. Bobby Sorel is a sober little fellow, fond of his home and his book and his quiet sports, the very image of his mother; it will be a pleasure to Mr. Arthur to direct his studies, another reason for the arrangement.

The propriety of the step! Only you would read those lines, after painful experience of your own, can understand all the bitterness of meaning herein implied. Not a day but Edward Arthur was made to feel and see it. The strong Secessionists outside of his church had long since removed all doubt from his mind in regard to their opinion of his position. Colonel Bat Roberts had never entered his church in his life. That, however, of course. Gentlemen of his stamp never go to church. People who come to hear a preacher, such he, as a general rule, much desire to attend church—now they have none at all. If some preacher who is also Register of a regiment is to preach, or if Brother Barker is to give clear Scripture proof of God's cordial approval of Secession, if there is to be some startling variation of the one strain of glory to the South in the highest, on earth war to the knife, and eternal ill-will to the Yankees, then to go to church to be that much more encouraged in a cause in which they are beginning to feel more and more bold, and of courageous action, is the way to have the old Gospel? To be told over again the old old story of their being sinners and of Christ being their Saviour? No, Sir; heaven hates the ineffectual glories and hell its fires in contrast with the lurid flames of the war.

Where could Christians have become so apathetic in regard to religion Mr. Arthur expects nothing of the rest of Somerville. He touched him, however, this Sabbath morning when Mrs. Roberts made such a point of meeting him, when he visited her class in turn, and shook hands with some special cordiality. And Mrs. Roberts well knew what her eyes worn with weeping meant, and now filling again with tears, when she turned from him and stooped as if to tie again the scarf around the throat of her little boy, looking up with bold brave eyes while she was doing it for her father. When immediately after Sabbath-school she left with her children, not waiting until service, for a visit of a week or so, she had told him of the letters from her husband at Richmond requiring her never again to hear her pastor preach. If he had not understood, he could not have misunderstood him with which Colonel Bat Roberts sustained his own spotless reputation as a patriotic, political visitation, in leaving even the church. At first she resisted so far as the Sabbath-school was concerned; but it was too painful, her letter said, to remain there. How painful to her pastor was that vacant seat henceforth only you who occupied a like situation, and there are many of you, in those days can tell!

And with Mrs. Roberts there fell away one by one, even of the communicants, all save an old, "Mr. Arthur was a good man; they had known him too many years to doubt that; but now that he was a traitor to his land, he was not to rely upon them in their homes? Only political discussion, warm, perhaps heated. And so, what was left him but to pursue the even tenor of his way?

"Resign? No, Sir. The great body of the church are content that you should continue preaching to them the Gospel as of old," said Guy Brooks, whenever he consulted him upon the question. "You can be conscience do only what you are doing. Let us be as quiet as possible; let us wait and hope." And Guy Brooks, really and truly faithfully did. Mr. Brooks, and Mr. Ferguson, and the many like them, attend at service, listening to the same Gospel preached, greeting him on every meeting with triple cordiality.

"You can hardly imagine how painful it is to me," said Mr. Arthur to his friend the lawyer, one gloomy evening as they sat together in the study. "You can hardly imagine how painful it is to me, and how sacredness do only what you are doing. Let us be as quiet as possible; let us wait and hope." And Guy Brooks really and truly faithfully did. Mr. Brooks, and Mr. Ferguson, and the many like them, attend at service, listening to the same Gospel preached, greeting him on every meeting with triple cordiality.

"You can hardly imagine how painful it is to me," said Mr. Arthur to his friend the lawyer, one gloomy evening as they sat together in the study. "You can hardly imagine how painful it is to me, and how sacred my feelings are. I hoped I had secured forever pass me without speaking. Even many who do deign to greet me do it in a manner that is a mockery. I do know do fully agree with me in my opinions, and who would not enter the church if I pursued the course I personally could be sent speaking with me on the street."

"And have not a syllable to say in your defence when you are called a traitor to your native soil?" the lawyer, over Somerville," added the lawyer, who, in his own despondency, would have given a friend any thing with those around Job as he sat on his dunghill.

And it was well it was so. Too dependent on others for his happiness, Edward Arthur was not learning to stand firm in the consciousness of his own integrity—to dispense with all friendship besides in approval of himself. He was never before conceived of doing, the presence of Him who sticketh closer than a brother. Pale and thin he looked, and his wife's eyes told that was to last him his life—the lesson itself was not to last forever, but its results.

"Lamunn is a traitor, minister, after a pause, "the opinion that I am a traitor to my soil seems to be so universal as compared to be unanswerably supressed, that I have at times almost a sense of shame as for actual guilt. However, that only because I am not conversant with the action of my original views. And, alas for me!" he added, with a sigh, "these views are only deepening and strengthening with time."

"If you were only fixed as a minister my brother Paul lately heard of it would suit exactly. Paul was preaching in a town not far down from the Pikes. It is a minister as conscientiously opposed to Secession," continued Guy Brooks, "as I am to it, and strong in his views, strong, cast iron on that point. But he is an Episcopal minister, you see. His bishop has written out the principles, and among them are for Secession as language can make them, for the blessing of God upon the Confederate arms, for the speedy and total defeat of the Federals, and all that. Twice every Sunday that Union minister stands solemnly up and offers those prayers. Worse than that, the bishop has lately appointed a special prayer-meeting, with prayers to match, to be held two or three times during the week, for the success of the Confederate armies."

"And, true to the cannon obligations, he prays them?" asked Mr. Arthur. "Singular position for a worshiper of God to fill—deliberately, continually, kneeling before the Almighty, the set of petitions on his lips, exactly the reverse set of supplication in his— Never mind!" said the minister, interrupting himself, "it is none of my business."

"But it keeps all so straight and pleasant," resumed the lawyer. "Every now and then Paul has to call the pulpit in his regular visitation; and he always preaches a sermon full and most decided for the Confederacy—Brother Barker or ever will be, in his own and with manuscript. But no wonder; the Bishop's negroes have been running away dreadfully of late. His expenses for dogs alone are enormous."

"My dear Mr. Brooks," interrupted the minister, "do let us speak of something else. A man, I believe, more sincere man than this bishop before these troubles neither you nor I have known. The times have changed him, as they have changed so many of us. There was a time when there lived not a minister at the South who dreamed of alluding in the pulpit to political matters. And now!" Would Paul, would Peter, would Heber, Simeon of Oxford, Wesley, Whitfield, Newton, Daniel Baker do it were they now alive? Would the Saviour do it did he to-day—if such a thing can be imagined—walk the hills of North or South? Is not his side the minister happens to be on is a mere nothing in comparison; it is his abandoning the true side—the side, whether he preach from Secession or preach the Federal Union. "I feel to-day as if I had somehow become suddenly shunted—as if the whole world had passed by and left me in the rear—as if I was far behind the times."

"Well and you are," said the Kentuckian, "behind the times? Yes, Sir, eighteen hundred years! But Paul says it is the richest thing in the world—that Christian minister standing in the pulpit, as he has to do once every two or three months, reading long pastoral letters from the bishop in which, political visitation-general of the South, you know, the poor fellow reading it with the necessary emphasis and inflection—how positive he must be to occur?"

Mrs. Warner did not think so, however, when Mr. Arthur called there next. It was the first actual visit Mrs. Warner—until, at least, the minister took a lesson from Mrs. Warner, and at last deigned to call. Of late any one could tell, just by seeing Dr. Warner on the streets, that the gusts at home these days were not exactly light ones. The Doctor's neckerchief was always to one side now, the long curls hanging out, and dreadfully frayed. His general appearance was that of one in a linen; a strip or so of the lining of his coat hanging loose to the breeze from wrists and skirts; pantaloons that bid fair to resemble in wear and pantaloons; a wild and disordered state of his hair, too, a good deal of it gone altogether—the whole man altogether to resemble in number just out of a terrible tempest. And, stormtossed and weather-beaten as the Doctor was, he was only the more to be pitied. In fact, looked upon as the Doctor was by the eternal gusts, he had got into the habit of retiring completely from himself—from all that his body had excanded itself to make room for him:

"What I regret, who Dr. Warner regrets, if he would only say so—and he is one of those men who never will speak out as he ought—is, that you do not pray for the Confederacy as you should, Mr. Arthur," said Mrs. Warner to the gentleman, sitting in her parlor this last time. "If you do not feel prepared to preach sermons for the Confederacy, in denouncement of the Yankees, like Brother Barker and ever so many ministers more, well, you needn't do it—that is, if you are afraid to your conscience to do so; though I am sure our revolutionary forefathers took their swords and muskets even into the pulpit with them. But why don't you pray for the Confederacy—pray for it warm and strong? There's Brother Barker—and he a Northern man by birth—every Sunday, as Tim told by Mrs. Staples, that the Almighty will defeat, destroy, annihilate the Federals; that he will overturn, overthrow, destroy them in policy, decimate them with measles, small-pox, and yellow-fever; not leave enough of them for a corporal's guard to survives to bury the rest! Pray? yes, and for their eternal damnation too. They are fiends, they are devils, they are worse than devils, worse than Satan himself, worse than any savages; they richly deserve the agonies of the pit! Why, look at Dr. Peel—I mean Brother Arthur! Why, he's invading Pennsylvania, they are burning our cities and homes, they are slaughtering our men, women, and children, and he refuses to set our enemies free; they are hiring them all the time to rise and cut our throats, and wash their black feet in our blood! Why, these Yankee wretches—they make us their slaves, to hew wood for them —yes, drawers of wood and hewers of water to bring negro and Irish blood, peddling, pandering Yankees! I'd die first—die a thousand and a thousand times over! I've learned how to hate from another source, Sir, than you seem to! I would a snake. A snake?—yes, a genuine, Southern-born rattlesnake is more respectable to me than a Yankee! I'd cut our carving knife sharpened to a point for a dagger: if they come here I'll stab the first Yankee that comes near me in the heart! I tell you, Doctor—Mr. Arthur—I'll burn down my house with my own hands before they should have it. I'd make Doctor Warner shoot down every Hand he's got—and they all came to him through me —before he should let the Yankees get them. That's what Brother Barker says, Dr. Peel too, Lamunn, and all. Did you read Colonel Bat Roberts's last speech? Only his wife is such a poor, downcast creature of a woman! But you must pray for the Confederacy stronger, Mr. Arthur. Every body in Somerville is saying you are an Abolitionist. And just suppose they was to hang you some day; you may not know it, but people have, threatened long ago to hang you. Ain't you afraid? You know they have hung ever so many." And oh, how much, much more!

And Mr. Arthur sat, holding, instinctively, hard to the arms of the large parlor rocking-chair in which he sat—as while the unsteady gusts of the canal locks poured their tide upon him—sat waiting till the gush would flow itself out.

And so Mrs. Warner went on, taking snuff with her stick energetically all the time.

But the snuff which she so copiously dipped is not Mrs. Warner's only cause. Last night another of those wretched letters, written to some one in Somerville—somebody known—from somebody near Corinth,—has announced that Beauregard has actually evacuated Corinth, and is retreating South in consequence of the news just before there had been a well-authenticated report in Somerville that Beauregard had ordered an army to prepare for an immediate move upon the enemy. Lamunn had filled the last Star with it; the thrilling address of Beauregard to his soldiers before the great victory that was to be; the enthusiasm of his army; the utter demoralization of the Federals; the whole regiments that had already been shot in the Union intrenchments for mutiny; the almost unanimous unwillingness of the troops, Yankees though they were, to fire another shot upon the Confederates.

Hopeful as we have always been in regard to matters at Corinth," said Lamunn, "we are now positively confident of a great and glorious victory, full particulars of which we hope to give in our next. Only but steadily has Beauregard been maturing his brilliant plans. All information from Corinth agrees that the enemy has so long in Corinth has doubtless been launched long ere this. We congratulate all true Southern men in advance upon the coming fall of the wicked traitors among us, let them know their day of doom is at hand!"—and vastly more to the same effect.

But one of those miserable letters has arrived, saying that all Beauregard's preparations were not for the rout of the Yankees, but of a tremendous march either on St. Louis or Chicago, as Lamunn and all others had so confidently predicted, but for a hasty retreat—Corinth looked into before it could be decided whether their owners are to have them or not. Faithfully did Mr. Smithers, the postmaster, obey these instructions, but with a painful sense all the time of deserving the Penitentiary therefor. Yet almost every week somebody or other in Somerville was receiving and spreading abroad the astounding contents of some letter which should never have been written; or, if written, should never have been read except by an official; or, if read, should never have been whispered to a living soul—except. These letters, Mr. Smithers from the various seats of the war by people who had reference in writing only to the facts, and not at all to the influence of those facts unknown, unofficial people—in short, unsalaried people, who, in tenderly sustaining the Confederacy against every shock, lay down their unusual income to nurse and protract thereby. The constrast, the steadily running contrast, between the cramped information from the seats of the war and the undercurrent of private information from the same sources was amazing. Between the cross-streams of public and of private intelligence the air was always filled with all sorts of rumors as with the flying froth of conflicting waters.

Here is a bright summer morning upon which Mr. Warner would fly from his house to Brooks in his office. "I would not have my name mentioned in it, you understand," Dr. Warner says, in a low, private tone to Guy Brooks, "but there is a rumor afloat this morning that Richmond has been taken. Of course I do not vouch for the truth of the report; nobody knows this morning—let it go for what it is worth—that he overheard Lamunn and Captain Simmons speaking mysteriously about Colonel Goodlett's; tracing the route to it on a map open on Lamunn's table. Of course we attach no importance to what we hear, but it really looks as if the leading Secessionists were contemplating a speedy flight, taken in connection with the other rumors from similar sources. Observe it" and the mild Doctor wipes his perspiring forehead, from which the hair is being blown away as in the winds at home; quite bald the Doctor is becoming.

"I pay no attention to such things," says Guy Brooks, with a contemptuous wave of his hand, somewhat of a coincidence; the Secessionists—the leaders I mean—have had a remarkably depressed look about them of late. Pshaw! it's all nonsense; but I suppose you have heard about some lady or other suddenly coming in upon Mrs. Colonel Bat Roberts and finding her bathed in tears with her children around her. She had just heard, the interpretation is, from Roberts of the capture of Richmond, or some event of the sort." But the lawyer is ashamed of himself as he says it.

"We are kept so completely in the dark—faking all these things together. Ah, well, we shall know sooner or later," says Dr. Warner, shaking his head as he considers it all over.

"And so Dr. Ginnis is running off with some of your patients?" inquires the lawyer at last.

"Such a loud Secessionist, you know. I can not help it. It is impossible for a man to think and feel except as he does think and feel; and I make such a poor hypocrite do the best at it I can," says poor Dr. Warner.

That very day the Scotchman was telling his pastor of this same rumor. "It is all over Somerville; people really believe it," said Mr. Ferguson. And he was right. Only wish to believe any thing, it is the easiest thing to do so. "It may be true, you know," said the Scotchman, before he had done referring to it; always scoffing at all news he did not wish to believe, too.

"Do you see this port-folio?" asked the Scotchman of a ponderous scrap-book lying open upon his table, with covers of blue pasteboard a yard square; half a foot thick the volume is. And he turned lovingly over the irregular leaves—pamphlets, speeches, sermons, placards, hand-bills, written notices of all shapes and sizes, newspapers, too, from a yard across down, toward the later dates, to sheets of eight inches, and of all the colors of the rainbow, according as wrapping paper was being resorted to under stress of the Blockade. "Now, here is a complete set of the news and the rumors since the beginning of this awful delusion," continued Mr. Ferguson, turning over his collection with the pride of a virtuoso. "You see, I own lands in the State. My business used to be selling those lands. I have none to sell now, not a rood, for paper-money, you understand. So I have a good deal of leisure to spend on this collection. When a rumor is about unprinted, I write it out myself and paste it in;" and he turned in succession to several pages of his own writing carefully interleaved with the rest of the pasteboard sheets of his best hand it was in, and with date in full to each rumor, and plenty of capitals and marks of exclamation.

"And each one of those items was in its turn as a dose of rescue to those who did not want to believe it, you see—"

"A glass of usquebaugh to those who did," said Mr. Ferguson, completing the sentence for his pastor. "Now I have every thing under these items for a regular index, here in this blank book, to the volume," continued the Scotchman, laying his hand upon it. "I have almost the thing else to do; and I have become interested in it as a systematic study of this war, and of human nature in it. Would you like to hear my classification?"

The Scotchman had a grizzled beard, carrying all his weight with a dry, didactic way of speaking, with his chin fixed steadily between his shirt collar, and in crisp sentences. He walked with a stiff, military step, never turning his head right or left, favoring his most intimate friends with the slightest possible motion of his head, strictly up and down on its vertebral hinge, his shade to one side or the other, when he met them. It had often occurred to Mr. Arthur Bond, Mr. Ferguson, if himself classified, would have been labeled of the Linnæus species—a botanist caring for classes for analysis, without the slightest reference to their hue or fragrance.

"From the beginning of this delusion," continued he, with the dry precision of an alienist's, "all of the innumerable rumors I have classified as follows:

"First—The Confederacy is on the verge of recognition by Europe. I have put this first, as being the most frequently repeated and the most steadily believed.

"Second—The North is bankrupt, and can not carry on the war beyond the fifteenth of next month at the earliest. This was the next frequent rumor at first that it has been of late.

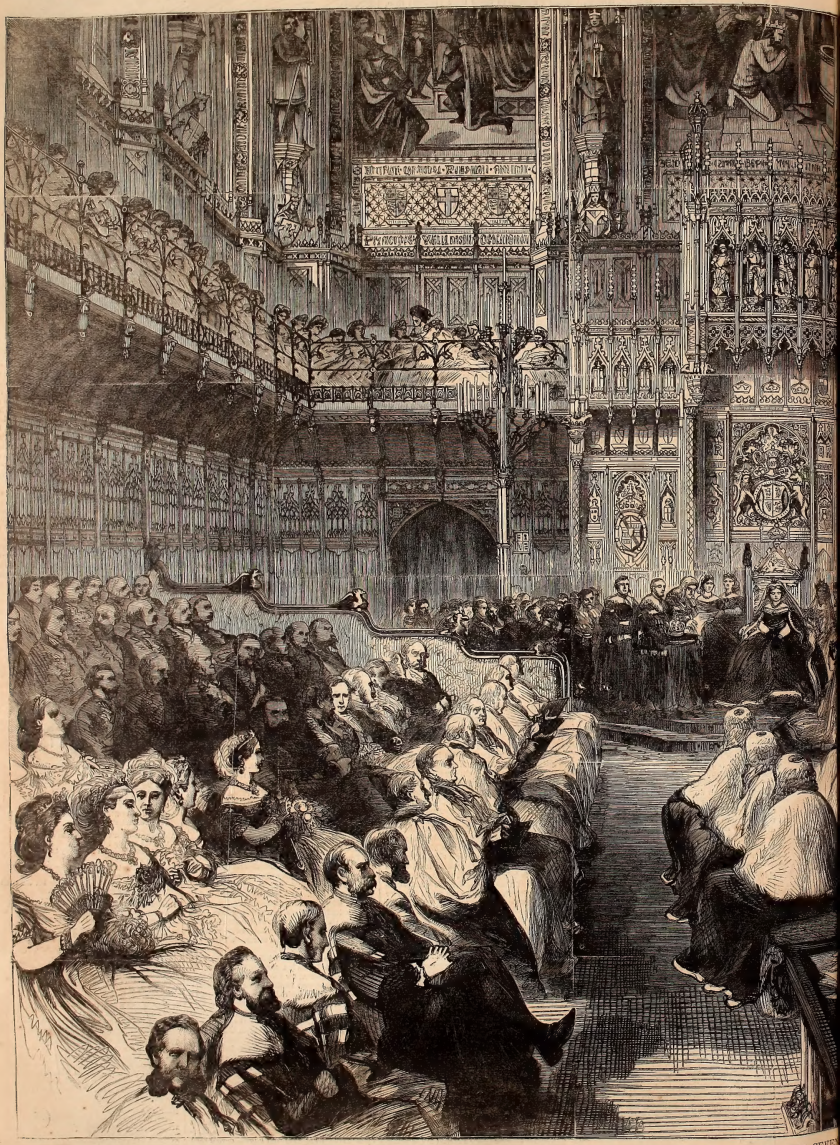
"Third—A great revolution favorable to the South is impending at the North.

"Fourth—France, England, and Spain have determined upon an instant armed intervention unless their claims are agreed upon by the first of this month; and the papers all contain these terms, drawn fully out, article by article, in diplomatic style.

"Fifth—An impending 'mutiny of the entire Federal army against the accursed scheme into which their leaders have bounded.'

"Sixth—Great and glorious victories, with the slaughter of half of the Federal army and the capture of their half, stores, arms, and munitions beyond calculation. To the same head belongs the repeated capture of Washington city.

"Lastly—General, 'at last,' of the Confederate fleet, iron-plated, fully armed, from Europe, and the impending destruction of the Federal navy. These are the classes of rumors, two or more of which are continually afloat. It matters not how often a rumor has been refuted and disproved finally, like the balls of the juggler, one or more of them is continually in the air none the less.



"I mean no such small matter as the death —now by pneumonia, now by wounds, now by the hand of some brave Southerner penetrated into his camp for the purpose—of, in turn, every leading officer of the Federal army. Perpetually are they being killed and buried, and then perpetually rising again from the dead it makes no difference. If they are proved to be alive today they are certain to die of disease, or to be killed again in the papers to-morrow. There is not a single one of their deaths that I have not down here," said the Scotchman with pride.

"It is amazing how readily the report of yesterday is dropped," said Mr. Arthur. "It was eagerly hailed as believed yesterday; yet its disproval to-day hardly excites a remark. It puzzles me."

"Not at all," said the countryman of Reid and Brown, in his sententious manner. "There is a reason for every operation of the human mind. Yesterday's news is forgotten because to-day's news is so much more glorious; then, yesterday's rumor was false, it seems, but that of to-day is certainly true. Besides, the hearty want it may be true is so satisfying. One thing that interests me in this continual stream of news is my studying therein the working of the leaden cells of this most disastrous delusion. Like the paid pyrotechnist of a Fourth of July night, they love to fix, out of sight themselves, that some rocket is always in the air to keep the gaping populace amused. They have such a supply to select from," said Mr. Ferguson, laying his broad and hairy palm on his foolscap classification. "It is bit to dash off the lie best suited to the hour in a few rapid lines, send it to the next paper, and in a few days it is read and believed over the whole South. If you had studied this collection as I have, you would find that just when all the appearances are at their darkest for Secession, then, and exactly then, the largest and most splendid lie is whizzing overhead. It comes down a stick, to be sure; but it answers the purpose of the moment, and, on the next occasion, up goes another."

Mr. Arthur did not care to say so to his friend —he was too weary of strife for that; but he knew it was all only a matter of notions after Mr. Ferguson. Like multitudes of other men, the Scotchman ascribed to the politicians far more than was at all due them; for far more than they ever even dreamed of doing they had all the curse or all the credit, as the case was, brought the minister. They had the placid ocean into tempest, he said to himself, as he rode slowly home to Mrs. Sorel's. What longcontinued and superhuman exertion it required! But now that they have fairly wrought it into commotion, the waves howl and leave and sparkle with all phosphorescent fires by the force of their own fury.

Arrived at home and gone to bed, Mars, not Morpheus, presided over his slumbers. Slumber? During the first hour or so after lying down he tossed as on the billows of Horror; and the bottom of ocean miles beneath his struggling feet. The waters around him are thick with men and women and children, all buried off from each other, the drowning and the drowned. How red they are, too, the waters deep and clinging as the sea of blood in which struggle in them. How many upturned faces rise and sink there! Can that bold brow with the largest eyes be that of Robert E. Lee? Is the thin face of the postage stamps jostled cheek by jowl with Bob Withers's ruby countenance and the pale cheek of Governor Morton? There floats by him a fair form, every lock of whose streaming hair is dearer to him than life, thrust aside by the sudden contraction of a closed jaw, gives, giving place to that of Mrs. Juggins; and amidst all the gurgling, gasping terror the dreamer hears as from far off the voice of Mrs. Juggins

LIAMENT, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1866.

REST.

TOLL on, ye bells! amid midnight through the air;
Tick out more lives, now growing under care;
Wear out great Time with clashes every where—
I wait, yea long, for rest.

Stride on, step not, ye finger-marks of woe;
Haste on, ye shades! Oil let the sunlight go;
Wing past, ye hours, life is too sad and slow—
I wait, yea long, for rest.

Rot forth, ye flowers, let Spring and Summer die;
Bend down, ye sheaves, let Autumn toe go by;
Cold blow, ye winds, another Winter's nigh—
I wait, yea long, for rest.

Rest cometh not, rest is not for the young;
Rest liveth not, it lies the graves among;
Rest comes to age, so yonder death-bells sung—
I wait, yea long, for rest.

Rest cometh not with worldly joy and mirth;
Rest cometh not until the soul's new-birth!
Rest cometh not until we die to earth—
Then cometh rest indeed.

Death clasps our lives, steadeth them carefully;
Rest grasps them now lying peacefully;
Cloeth our lips, which murmur thankfully—
"Now have we rest indeed."

SETH HATHRON'S FOURTH.

I KNEW him as a black-browed, broad-shouldered, brute of a fellow, always from a boy. At school (not that I had much of that sort of thing), but at school old Miss Peggy found out our capacities, and she laid it to my scores because of my looks, when often and often, while I was holding out my hand to be relieved, the pretticst boy in the school was grinning over his good luck in getting off so safely. She had her preconceived notions of a villain, I presume, and answered the description.

For the matter of that, of all the books and stories I've read since, especially those written by ladies, I've noticed that he isn't one whom they laugher, or forger, or pirate, or what not, who does all the wickedness of the book, as though he's taken it on contract, wouldn't do for or as a gentleman, while their pets, who do the grand and noble things, are generally slender, and fair, and pretty. Now the worst really I ever saw—one who was afterward hung, and who deserved hanging richly, even on his own showing—had blue eyes, and white lashes, and a pink complexion like a girl's. I've over and over again; but it's my opinion that if women were put on the police for the year round as over every ballroom, a redward, bilious fellow whose eyebrows met would be locked up in the State Prison on suspicion.

I never was a favorite with any woman but my mother, and she died when I was eight years old. So instead of growing up with the love of good men have, that every girl they meet is ready to fall in love with them, I never had the slightest hope that any one would ever like me well enough to let me fall in love with her even. And I liked girls so. It was odd for a fellow like me, but how I did like girls!

I never could bear to see one cry, or to hear of their being imposed upon or hurt. I couldn't pass one with a heavy basket or bundle without at least wanting to offer to carry it for her. I could never bring myself to sit in stages or cars when one was standing. I don't think I could if there was a crutch or lame instead of the giant I was. Yet I've seen gentlemen lounge with their hands in their pockets while poor old ladies, who might have been their grandmothers, stood up before them! And their manners were good and mine those of a bear, and I myself only a working-man, who learned all he ever knew at old Miss Peggy's school.

Something of this might have felt just in sight of the angels, who were too much above him to be spoken to or touched, I felt about all girls. That is, good, pure girls. When a woman was not pretty, or in any way debased she never seemed a woman to me, but a dreadful sort of creature, all the worse for having something of the pretty womanly look about her.

I was a maker of fire-works, as my father had been before me. I don't know that I liked the business particularly, but there I was, and there I staid. I made good wages, and saved them; for I didn't think enough about my looks to dress much, or to get drunk. "Sulky," the other men called me. What of that? It was better to be sulky than raving mad, as most of them were so early on Saturday night came round. Men with nice, good-looking wives too, whose children wanted for bread and shoes while they spent in drink. I was never known to have a wife and children, but I knew how they ought to be much better than they did.

I suppose I had come to be twenty-eight or so, and no girl had ever looked at me, except as she might at a tumble taller bear, when, one day, old Mr. Williams, the proprietor of the place, came to me as I was going home to dinner, and said, in his own quick way:

"Hathron, can you drive?"

"Yes, Sir," said I.

"I want you to take the wagon and go over to the railroad depôt at Baldwin, and bring down a new hand and her traps," he said. "She'll be there at half past twelve, so you'll have plenty time to snatch a bite and go; and you can have the rest of the day to yourself, if you like, as it's Saturday. Her name is Annie May."

Before you can understand what he meant I must tell you that our place (they called it the "No plus ultra Pyrotechnic Establishment," those years) employed some five-and-twenty girls, and that they generally came from a distance, and boarded while they staid with an old woman close by, all in one place, to keep them out of harm's way.

Mr. Williams insisted on that, and had a lot of rules about the hours they were to keep and the way they were to behave; good rules, and not so rigid but that there was plenty of innocent courting and more than one wedding in a season. As for we men, we went where we chose. Some put up at the tavern, some with people who had taken a few boarders, and those who lived in the place with their families. There were very few girls who had homes there to go to; for the village was an uppish kind of place, full of country seats and villas, and the factory stood all by itself, quite a distance away, and the tavern and the few common houses were grouped close about it, as if others were too genteel to join with them. So Mrs. Munson's place was always full. When a new girl came there somebody always had to be sent over to Baldwin to bring her to the factory. It had never been before, and why I was chosen this time it was hard to tell. However, I was willing enough, and so, when I had taken a bite, I put on my best coat and drove over.

It was a day to tempt a man out—a beautiful spring day, with tender green grass on the earth and tender pink buds on the branches, and in the sky their were only two or three white, fluffy clouds, like carded wool, amidst the blueness. It took only half an hour to get to Baldwin. I'd have been willing it should be whole ours.

The train had got in, and there were people waiting in the little house at the depôt—a couple of men and three girls, but they made her look like a lady. I walked up and down and waited. The fat women were away in a wagon; I knew Brannan had a pair sent for him; and there the girl sat beside her trunk, looking now and then out of the window and beginning to seem anxious. And I was afraid she'd do or harm to speak; so I took off my hat and stepped up, with a bow.

"I beg your pardon, Miss," said I, "but has there been any body here asking about being taken to Mr. Williams's place?"

"I was to go there myself," she answered; "that is, if you mean the fire-work factory. I'm Annie May."

"I do mean the fire-work factory," I said. "Mr. Williams sent me down to fetch you. I'm Seth Hathron, one of the hands. The wagon is outside; will you get in?—What a bit; I'll put them in first."

"Shall I help you?" she said, and she put her little hand to the handle nearest her. It looked so small I burst out laughing.

"I don't need any help," said I—how I thought I could carry both the trunk and its owner together! I chose, and she'd let me. She was the smallest creature, to be a full-grown woman, that I ever saw. A piece of the blue sky that I'd been looking at, and golden sunshine for her hair, and some of those wild roses that would climb with the barberries over the snow fences seen for her cheeks, and you know how to paint her.

After I had helped her in and had taken the reins in my hands, I kept stealing looks at her and thinking how beautiful she was; and I tried to talk about things that would please her, and pointed out the places on the road, and the villas, as the day had had been before, it was somehow a great deal brighter now with her beside me.

We stopped at Mrs. Munson's and said good-by. I carried her trunk into the hall and called the old lady, and drove the horse back to the stable. I was having a holiday, I got a newspaper and went out into the wood—Baldwin's Woods they called them —and I think I knew every tree in them.

I sat down by chance under a great oak, where Jack Xarnes, one of the hands, had carved J. Y. for his name, and A. G. for his sweet-heart's, and I'm a ring around them both; and as I looked at the work fell to wondering why Jack Varnes should have a sweet-heart and I not, and whether I was the only his pretty face or something in our ways that made all girls like him and none me. And somehow I felt lonesome and disheartened, and tried to read my paper, and sat down with my head on my hands, sulkier than ever, I suppose, to look at. Maybe it was an hour, maybe it was more, that went before I heard a step coming over the grass, and looking up, saw the girl I had driven over from Baldwin—Annie May. I remembered her name, but did not see me at first; but when she did she started and stopped, and smiled at me just as I'd seen those girls smile down at their lovers, and it went over at me before that moment. I never thought what I was doing, but held out my great brown paw and shook hands with her as if we had been friends for years.

"I found there was nothing for me to do in the factory until Monday, Mr. Hathron, so I came out to see what these woods were like. It's a pretty place."

"Prettier in summer," I said, "and prettiest of all in autumn, when the leaves are burned gold and scarlet."

"I like spring best," she said; "every thing is new and fresh, and just begun. In autumn every thing is nearly over—and I hate that."

I don't mind it," I said; "I haven't a gay disposition, I suppose," I said. "But look here—if you like fresh woods and flowers, and running brooks[illegible] and I took her to where, behind a fallen log, the first spring violets always grew. There were a dozen there now, and I gathered them for her knees to smell them. She would only pick one, though; it seemed wrong, she said.

That one, after we had walked for an hour or so, somehow dropped out of her hair. She did not know it, but I did; and when she had gone home I went back and found it lying on the path and put it in my bosom. It was so sweet and fresh and beautiful that I could but think it was like her. I liked to think so. Oh, what a day that was for me! What a night when I dreamed it over!

Next day was the Sabbath, and I did what I never done before. I went to church, angry with myself for not looking handsomer all the while. I stood before the glass, I went over to Mrs. Munson's and asked for Miss May.

She came down in a muslin dress and a pretty bonnet with pale blue ribbons; and I remember stammering out something about thinking she might like to go to church and would not know the way. That was all nonsense, of course, for there was the steeple in full sight, but it gave me what I wanted, leave to be with her again.

I'm afraid I couldn't have remembered the text to save my life, and that the sermon was thrown away on me. But I was very happy—happier than I had ever been before; for this sweet young thing seemed to like me, to walk and play games with me, and found, I was so glad to think, a sort of protection that she liked in my great arm when we had rested, going over the fields, like a fallen snow-flake. It almost seemed to me that I must be crazy to believe that she had taken a notion to me; but it was true. So true that when four of those Sabbaths had passed I made her walk with me again in Baldwin's Woods, and sat down beside her on the hollow log, behind which a great patch of violets were in bloom by that time, and told her how I loved her, and asked her to be my wife.

Only a month since she came there—only one month since I drove her over in the little wagon; and if the moon had been any thing else than what it was I should have prayed to die. It may not be such a mighty matter to other men to have one woman's love, but I had no one else on earth to care for. So when she said, "Yes," and let me kiss her, it was only shame that kept me from crying outright for joy.

She was mine now, and how proud I was of her! How glad to know that she was so near me when I was at work! To see her at the door as I came, and meet among the other girls, who were most of them slovenly when they were not fine! and how full of dreams of the future I was!

She had promised to marry me in the autumn, and after that she should work no more in the factory. I was going to buy a little Baldwin cottage in the village, and to furnish it—humbly, of course, but so that it should be a home for her; and when she came in Baldwin I should meet her any king his palace. Meanwhile we saw as much of each other as we could, both working so industriously.

One week we had been more than usually busy, for it was near the end of June, and we were making fire-works for the Fourth of July, and Saturday I had seen of Annie that day I saw in the great saleroom where we always gathered to receive our wages. The men on one side, the girls on the other, stepping up to the great desk one by one as old Mr. Williams called their names. I looked across the line of girls' faces, and saw her smiling at me, but I could not get near her. Besides, at that moment, my name was called—"Hathron!" and I stepped up to the desk. Then, for the first time, I noticed that old Griffin was not there. A nephew of Mr. Williams's, whose name I remember as Richard Janes, was paying the hands instead. He was a handsome young fellow, and very gentlemanly—one of the few I've ever remember thinking so he laid my wages before me that his hair was just the color of Annie's.

He had a sort of amateur way with him very different from the business-like manner of old Griffin, and when it came to the girls he had something pleasant to say to them instead of the old man's snapping—"Sixpence deducted from yours, Jane!" or, "You were late three days last week, Martha!" What he said to Annie I did not know, but she blushed like a wild rose from brow to chin.

Walking home together she asked me who he was.

"Mr. Janes," I answered; "did you never see him before?"

"No," she said. "How very handsome he is!—don't you think so?"

I gave a grudging "Yes." I couldn't bear to hear her praise him. She might, for all I knew, be contrasting him with me. That was the first pain I had had since she had promised herself to me; but there was more to come of it.

Besides her daily work Annie had got into the way of doing some fine sewing and embroidery of evenings for a lady who lived in a beautiful villa, who lived in the prettiest house in the village, and once a week she carried it home. Generally I went with her; I was very proud of her errand, and I could do one night, and I could not get off. I fretted and fumed about it, but it was useless, and I couldn't for the life of me help slipping away to a starhead window to try and catch a glimpse of her. Sure enough, I did see her once or twice, walking with her little basket on her arm, but there was some one with her. It was too far to see faces, but I knew that Annie's face was turned up to that Richard Janes. He was bending over her as though talking very earnestly; and when some one inside called "Richard!" he could see that they stood, they were still going on close together—her face turned up and his bent down, both earnest and eager in whatever they were talking of.

I went back to my work, but I kept that picture before my eyes all the while. I thought of it until it seemed to burn itself into my heart in fiery outlines. After all, it was only what might easily have happened if Mr. Janes had walked the same way by chance; but I could not look at it that way—or perhaps I would not.

It was like my sulky, brooding nature, too, never to say one word to Annie, but to go on my own thinking and watching in silence. I found out more than I wanted to in that way; for one day when I had come to the end of my work-room after Mr. Janes had gone there, I plainly saw him slip a little note slyly into Annie's pocket. The note was addressed for her to observe it. Miss Redford's with her work; but that evening, instead of going with her, I watched her—biking like a thief behind trees and buildings on the road. She went alone and came alone, and I saw nothing for my pains. I did at church next Sabbath, though. When the service was over Mr. Janes came out, big in the handsome family pew, seeing Annie in doubt as to the number—for the old clergyman didn't always speak distinctly—reached over and took her book to find the place (she sat but a few behind him). When he gave it back I saw that there was something between the leaves, and some what might would have snatched it, but at that moment Miss Redford, who sat in the side aisle, whispered to Annie to show her the number, and I lost the chance, for in passing the books it was hidden. That it was a note I knew by the white glimmer of the edge as well as if I had seen the whole of it, and surely as I live I saw Annie give Mr. Janes a meaning smile as he passed us on the church path going home.

Miss Redford looked at Annie as if she knew something of it, as she stepped into her father and mother into the carriage. They were carriage people—the Redfords—and the old folks looked down on every thing below them. There was a feud between them and the proprietors of the factory, and they never spoke to either the Williamses or Mr. Janes; so there was a social chatting on the porch, and the Williams people smiled sarcastically, and the old Redfords scowled and looked haughty, until they were all fairly shut in and driven away. Not Mr. Janes—he was too gentlemanly; nor Miss Redford—she was too sweet. The feud was among the old folks. The younger families stepped up for their ill-temper though, and half the genteel people from the villas were smirking and bowing to each other.

The factory hands who were at church—a dozen in all, I suppose—hurried home pell-mell by short cuts, and by the time Mr. Janes, and of Miss Redford, and Annie and I were left. She was waiting for me to join her—a thing I didn't mean to do.

I heard a sound like the rolling of the churchyard, wishing I was sound asleep under one of the green mounds, but only looking darker and sulkier, no doubt, than usual, until I was close toward me. Then, I leaped the railing and went away, never looking back. I did not go home, but spent the day in Baldwin's Woods alone.

On Monday I was at work as usual. It was the third of July, and the Fourth, of course, was to be a holiday. There was a great deal of excitement in Baldwin, and the show-pieces for the evening were being finished at our place, under the superintendence of Mr. Richard Janes. We all liked to keep the younger hands at their work. They were half crazy about the Fourth, and I suppose every one of them had a rocket, I never could see the sense at nothing, and would not have had one even if I had felt differently. The young fellow had had a bad day to sell me his: like a goose he had bought two, and was sorry for it.

About dusk I went to get my supper, and was coming back when, among the shadows, I saw two figures standing whispering together. I felt in a moment who they must be, and got close enough to hear their voices. It was all I thought. "Annie, my Annie May, the other Richard Janes. They were parting, but I heard enough in the few last words:

"Eleven will be the best time; the moon will be up by then. I'll have the carriage waiting under the two plane trees at the end of the lane. Be there about the hour, for the down-train starts a quarter to twelve. Good-by—God bless you!"

Not another word—but I knew the whole. She was going off with Richard Janes. She whom I loved so. The one of all the world who had seemed to love me. She was going off with a man who I heard her light footstep rustle over the grass, and went back myself to the work-room, for we were to work until midnight that night, and I determined to up to the young fellow who had been trying all day to sell me his superfluous pistol.

"Sculk," said I, "if I think it'll suit me I'll trade you after all."

"Good for you," said he. "The Fourth ain't no Fourth without a pistol. Here's the coin's goin' cheap. A good look in it too, so be careful."

I counted down the money and took the weapon my way with me. What was it you want to do with it? to do with it? Shoot myself through the heart. The idea of murder had not crept into my mind then. I'd swear that—but I'm dying before the end.

I only wanted to get rid of my tiresome life. There was nothing left to live for—so it seemed to me.

At half past ten I got the chance I wanted, and slipped out. I was going to kill myself in Baldwin's Woods, or the dead log there by the first spring violets grew, and where we had sat so often since together. The moon was just rising round and yellow behind the thick trees, and the lights in the villas were all ablaze. As I slunk by the office I saw Mr. Richard Janes there alone. He was standing by the open window with a swinging lamp in his hand for any but a very handsome face, but his was not hurt by it. Great Heavens! how handsome he looked and how happy. My heart burned with rage, and jealousy, and grief. I was as mad for the moment as any lunatic could be. I went on and on, and caught at the pistol hidden there. The next instant I had fired, taking aim at the lamp-bearer.

But it was not good aim. The ball passed over its mark and struck the swinging lamp. I saw it fall and heard the crash as the glass sprang to pieces, and knew that the fire-work factory was on fire. That factory filled to the roof with explosive substances, and with walls and buildings dry as tinder, and pretty, innocent girls shut up within its walls. I do not know whether Satan ever feels remorse, but I am sure that he must be as I felt—hopeless, maddening, scorching.

The next instant there was a horrible report, and I was thrown into the air.

Not hurt, though. I picked myself up from the grass and stood looking at my work. The windows were burning with flame up in the air, amidst the smoke. Hundreds of rockets, and blue-lights, and Catharine wheels were tossing and flaming—scarlet, and yellow, and purple, and pink, and green, and blue. Hundreds of cannons seemed to be roaring; and over it all you could hear creams—screams of agony—and I, I went down on my knees and prayed—

"Oh, save her, save her—let no fire write, to hate me—only save her!"

People were flocking in from the village. Workmen, singed and scorched, forsook their way through the flames; and in the midst of the wildest tumults some one caught my arm. I turned—it was Annie, and beside her, white and trembling, stood Miss Redford.

"Oh, Seth—thank God for this!" cried Annie; "you are safe. Oh, dear young lady, try to hope—he may be too."

And then that beautiful Miss Redford sank on her knees before me, and clasped her hands, and prayed me in words like Richard's!

"I should have been his wife in an hour," she said. "Oh, save my husband—save my husband—my love, my life, my darling!"

The truth rushed into my mind then. I saw all my blind folly. I remembered the feud between the Redfords and the Williams family, and knew that my Annie had only been helping Miss Redford to meet and correspond with her lover; that it was to her the message I had heard that evening had been sent, and that it would have been better for me to be dead.

"Go out of danger!" I panted. "I'll bring him to you or die with him!" and, with Annie's scream of terror in my ear, dashed away. They were playing on the burning building with the one engine they had at hand by this time, and I could see that most of the workmen were alive.

I clutched one by the arm as I went past.

"Are the women in there yet?" I yelled.

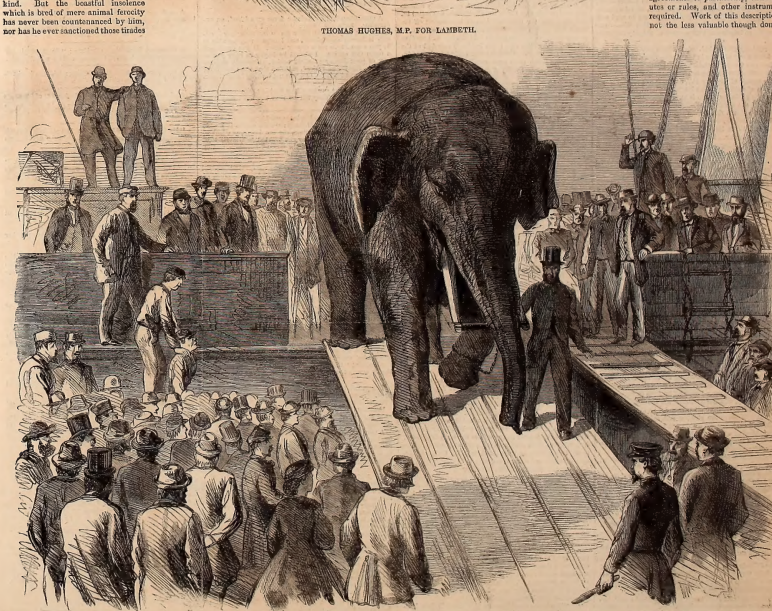
"No, that's Harry," he answered. "Didn't you know the women were dismissed five minutes before the explosion took place. There wasn't one there. All the men are out too. I guess, but then that were setting the last show-piece in the room next the office, you know. The rest stopped out o' window. There's a broken limb or two, I guess. But that's better than the poor fellows inside roasting among the candles. Except Mr. Janes is there, too. His uncle is offering any thing to have him got out. Life's worth more than money, though you can't do it."

He was right. For hours we worked at the fire before it was out; and then a great heap of lumber was piled over the ashes of the thirteen men who must be inside—dead we supposed—and I heard none one say that Miss Redford was going from one person into another

UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK, ON A WINDY DAY IN MARCH.

MR. T. HUGHES, M.P.

OUR readers will remember that, in our paper for January 27, we published an article by THOMAS HUGHES, the new Member of Parliament for Lambeth, entitled "Peace on Earth." No vindication of the cause for which our armies have fought has been bolder than this generous effort of Mr. HUGHES, and nowhere have the enemies of the United States met a refutation more complete and unanswerable. We give our readers on this page a photograph of this eminent statesman.



The new member for Lambeth is claimed by a large part of the English people as one of their familiar friends. Mr. THOMAS HUGHES—the author of "Tom Brown's School-days," and of one or two more books which have found their way, perhaps, to a less number of readers, but are scarcely less characteristic of the man from whom they came—has made himself pretty well known to a good many of his countrymen, high and low, not only as a novelist and magazine writer, but in various departments of practical work; and, though he is neither a peripatetic platform speaker nor a bustling patron of temporary exhibitions, he has long been reckoned a man of mark in the world of public life.

We need not here pass any criticism on those pleasant, wholesome, and instructive stories, or rather sketches, of English domestic and scholastic manners which commend themselves to the young as well as to the old by their frank cheerfulness of spirit, their hearty appreciation of all harmless pleasures, combined with a shrewd worldly wisdom, and what seems not incompatible with these moral elements—a noble enthusiasm for duty and virtue, with a manly sentiment of true religion. It is possible that these books may have caused him to be regarded as the literary champion of two great principles which have grown more fashionable than ever in the last twelve or fourteen years—the one being called "Muscular Christianity," and the other definable as an absolute conviction of the superiority of the English race in the fighting and working qualities—in toughness, pluck, and bottom—to every other race of mankind. But the boastful insolence which is bred of mere animal ferocity has never been countenanced by him, nor has he ever sanctioned those tirades of ignorant bigotry against all that is foreign to England in which Englishmen are too apt to indulge. He has shown that the stanchest English patriotism is consistent with an enlightened interest in the prospects of freedom on the Continent of Europe, and with a cordial affection for the citizens of the great American Republic, whose mighty struggle he watched in a sympathizing spirit, and one of whose best representatives—Mr. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL—has been introduced by him to a high literary rank among his countrymen.

The claims, however, of Mr. HUGHES more especially to the confidence and good-will of the working-classes are quite independent of any popularity which he may have gained as an agreeable writer. While he has always disliked and eschewed the ways of the demagogue, and held aloof from the vain turmoil of common political agitation, it has been his steady endeavor to make the most of those agencies of social reform which bid fair to open a road for the poorest and humblest of his fellow-countrymen to the safe and salutary possession of a share of power in the state. Mr. HUGHES does not endeavor to set class against class, or appeal to the narrow prejudices and interests of one portion of the community to disparage and contemn the others. His chief aim, on the contrary, is to foster those sentiments of mutual respect and kindness among them all, without which the freest political institutions are but means of mischief. It was, we believe, through the unwearied zeal and industry of Mr. HUGHES, and of those with whom he worked, that the necessary alterations in the law of partnership were obtained from Parliament in order to legalize the formation of the working-men's stores for the supply of retail wares at wholesale price, and of the limited-liability companies for manufacturing and trading enterprises, which have been formed on the co-operative principle. Mr. HUGHES has continued to bestow his assistance on all these self-supporting industrial associations of the working men, both in the metropolis and in the north of England; he has been accustomed to act as their legal adviser, and to prepare the title-deeds or conveyances of their property, their agreements of partnership, their statutes or rules, and other instruments required. Work of this description is not the less valuable though done in the privacy of his Lincoln's Inn chambers; and the men for whom it is done have shown that they are grateful by exalting Mr. HUGHES to the position of a triumphant candidate on the hustings, at the Lambeth election, last July.

THOMAS HUGHES, M.P. FOR LAMBETH.

Mr. HUGHES was born at Uffington, Berkshire, in 1823, being the second son of JOHN HUGHES, Esq., of Davenington Priory, Newbury, in that county. He was educated at Rugby School, and at Oriel College, Oxford. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple, in 1848, and is a rapidly rising barrister in the equity courts. He has married a daughter of the Rev. JAMES FORD, Prebendary of Exeter, and has several children.

LANDING AN ELEPHANT.

From on board the ship Cornelius Grinnell, Captain SPENCER, one of the London packets, was landed, on the 8th of March, a large elephant, said to weigh about four tons. "His Excellency" had passed the voyage in the reclusion of the cook-house—antidisplus—which was considerably heightened by the accommodation. To enable him to reach the wharf a stout platform was arranged of oak plank, sloping from the side of the vessel; but it required a great deal of coaxing to induce him to risk his weight upon it, as he seemed to have a preference for the gang-plank, which not only was provided with cleats, but sloped much less. The gangway cracked ominously upon the pressure of one foot, and therefore the elephant took courage and "walked the plank" in perfect safety, and was through the streets by an admiring crowd of men and boys, who sympathized in his evident relief at getting terra firma once more.

The name of this elephant is Abracum. He was brought from London. He stands 9 feet 6 inches high, measures 5 from a hundred-weight of hay, and drinks ten gallons of water.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

READER, did you ever sit up to watch for burglars? Well! Then you have an experience yet in store for you.

"Mercy on us!" exclaimed our good spouse, when either night as, distressing the servants' calm she went herself to fasten the back door for the night: "they'll be here by guns! They have taken it! Those burglars have stolen it!" And the worthy lady crumbled the key-fork and searched the floor in a state of intense excitement. Now the simple loss of the key—though a mysterious circumstance—could not have produced such consternation in Mrs. W——'s mind had she not been previously disturbed by our reading of dark deeds by our imaginative friend. And this strange loss was good positive—to her mind—that the attempt to enter her house was to be made—perhaps that very night.

Sympathetic consolation was offered to Mrs. W——, the police were notified—the bolder door was secured in the manner that would put locks and keys to shame—and, finally, in a fit of comfortable benevolence we volunteered to sit up and watch. "What a grand time to read and write!" we thought, though Mrs. W—— soon discovered to impress us with a sense of weighty responsibility.

Every body goes to bed. And with a new novel in one hand and a cup of coffee in the other—with a three-shaded gasolene at our elbow—well—we commenced to read, when, we settle down in the comfortable easy-chair—to read. In the middle of Chapter IV., as the "we small" hours come on, the silence grows intense. Hark! what's that? and every sectional nerve is tort. Nonsense that is nothing but the distant rumbling of the kitchen fire. We read half a dozen lines—then jump up and strain the ear at the palpable—say, more, we lean over the stairs—down stairs and listen intently. Ha! that peculiar scraping noise grows nearer. Pick-pocket our heart and down we rush into the dining-room, useless to demolish the burglar. The gas stream is as we open the door and behold—a thinked mouse is gnawing hard in his hand! Poor little thief of the kind! We see Mrs. W——'s pet Tabby, standing in the corner of the room with erect head, tremulous tail and great eyes, staring wildly at the results of her untimely scratchings.

Rather cruel-fellow we return to the parlor resolving that the cat shall be put out at night, or given away. The pen is better than a book, but only a huge book is better, when a stealthy—we fancy—step on the sidewalk arrests our ear. We peer through the blind. What could have those two perambulators to be prowling around the time of night? We watch them suspiciously as they come and recross the house. What o'clock? Only two! We fail to waiting again. Hark! A noise in the key-hole, and the wind whistles down the chimney. Rain! Yes, only the rain. Guess the cat is worth keeping on the whole. Why was the mouse, pretending to be hungry, so interested. Half past two! hold the watch to the ear, to make sure that it has not stopped. A peculiar, regular sound; we listen and investigate. Nothing but the water dripping from a loose faucet. A heavy regular tread announces the approach of the watch-dog to see if all is right, but it is three o'clock, and the house might have been sacked three times, and they never have been the wiser. The silence deepens. We wonder if there is such an earthly stillness and such peculiar noises every night when we are in dreamland! And we fall into a reverie disturbed by the occasional creaking up of our ears) which lasts until papa and Mr. W.—— come downstairs.

We might well have a larger police force in some quarters of the city, where the "beats" are occasionally long. Burglars, however, have other enemies as well as the police. New Yorkers are sharper and more curious than Londoners, we judge, for we do not believe such a case as the following would ever even have been told of them. This is the story, though, of course, we make no claim to truth of it:

A gentleman, residing in London, shut up his house, and went into the country for the summer vacation. After a few weeks' absence he returned, with his key in his pocket, to open his house. Judge his astonishment when he found nothing but the bit of land upon which his house had stood! On inquiry he was ascertained that a few days after he left the city the neighbors and others noticed that the building was gone, and that men were carrying away the furniture in broad daylight.

Supposing the owner had given such orders, asked no questions. Pretty soon the men began to take down the bricks, and openly carried off all the building materials, because nobody had curiosity enough to investigate!

The following paragraph from a recent article in one of our daily papers, on city nuisances, gives indication that our new Health Board mean to open the way for receiving suggestions and information:

"The Complaint Book is not yet ready, but complaints are steadily coming in to head-quarters. It has been proposed to set apart a day for hearing the complaints entered, one of which will be left at each of the police stations in the district, and one at police head-quarters.

The Senate has passed the joint resolution to pay Miss DOROTHEA DIX $25,000 for expenses in searching for and publishing lists of missing soldiers, and for the further prosecution of that work. The vote was unanimous. Miss BARTON'S own means are exhausted—we believe she has spent about $3000—and Congress does the merest justice to repay her and to supply funds for continuing her noble work.

Match came in "like a lion," and has been roaring like an infuriated wild beast a good part of the time ever since. Walking is any thing but a pleasurable occupation. The Senator's accumulation of filth is the result. Dust in the wind, taken to itself wings and dies into eyes, nose, and mouth, half mingling the unregenerate pronounce. Ladies endeavor to protect themselves with veils; but nothing short of the thickest double veils—which in reality are but blinding—keep out the decently clean. We retreat in the old saying that March will go out "like a lamb."

An exchange tells of a war-worn veteran who is now wearing his third nose. He lost the original article in battle, was also provided with a rubber one, which was also shot away, and is now wearing a wooden one in which he made of an amputated toe! It is to be presumed that the count of gunpowder is still grateful to his nativity; at all events he must see what is in.

A writer in the London Medical Gazette gives the following lucid explanation of the phenomenon of a lady's hands:

"The mind communicates with the central ganglion; the latter, by fuller action through the brain and facial nerve, with the muscular nerves in face, with which its branches inosculate."

Queen VICTORIA is reported as shocked at discovering that the Prince and Princess of Wales smoked cigarettes together in a little blue satin sanctum called their smoking-room. This sanctum sanctorum of connubial bliss was taught her Royal Highness by her scape-grace husband; and, horrible to say, she likes it.

Not so very long ago, in one of the Western States, there was a certain Baptist church, whose members were not exactly a unit on the subject of immersion. A sensible clergyman of charms, on one occasion, a certain person, who abundantly lacked the virtue of life, took to preach for admission into their fold. One of the committee—a rather rough man—on hearing the name of the individual, exclaimed: "That man? Well, if that man is to be admitted to the church he ought to soak overnight!"

A pair of Artesian wells, on exhibition in Raleigh (North Carolina), consists of a gentleman and a mule. It has the celebrated Siamese twins. The connection between these twins is closer than in the Siamese case, extending below the neck and terminating at the extremity of the spine. The mule can walk and kick with both legs, the connection sends a sensation to the brain of each; while a touch of either above the connection is felt by that one only. The mule can walk and kick with either leg, and receive entirely different subjects; and one can engage in a game of whist while the other is kicking.

A singular story is told of a blacksmith, living in Hunterstar, England, who has performed a feat which rivals that performed by William Tell. A child, aged two years, while playing with his brother, aged twelve months, placed the latter upon the iron bed-rail and pushed him into the eye of cart wheels. The child's neck began to swell, and when the parents discovered it they were horrified to find that the head could not be returned to its proper position without immediate death. Coles, the blacksmith, was called in, and he, with a sledge, and he successfully completed his dangerous task. With one powerful blow he struck the head of the little one, Coles fastened the legs and another ring and severed it. A false blow of half an inch, and instantaneous death would have been the result. It is impossible to describe the joy of the parents at the success of the bold blacksmith.

Fanny Ballie have been very brilliant and amusing in Paris this season—although, of course, Lent has brought the end of the season. The Parisian ladies would have been so very unjust that we can not forbear giving one or two of their pretty sayings to our readers. It is said that at a recent fancy ball the Marchioness de Gallifet declined more than her usual share of admiration and delight in the costume she wore. Her costume was a complete suit of white cashmere richly embroidered in gold; the bodice and skirt were trimmed with gold fringe, and the head-dress wings at each side made of white feathers; these arched high in the air, and then descended below the knee in her back hair. Her costume had fastened over the bosom, and her back in long curious ringlets. A diamond star glittered on her forehead, and in changing she brandished a small steel sword in her beautifully-formed unarmed hand.

Another great attraction was the cortège of a very beautiful woman, attired as a Japanese, who was carried in a palanquin, borne on the shoulders of four tall Nubian youths, represented by the attachés from the Embassy. The Princess Metternich, Princess Clotilde's cousin, was attired as the Queen of the Amazons, in a scarlet satin petticoat, covered with symbolical animals; the bodice was a tiger skin, and the head-dress a mass of black hair. The beautiful Mrs. Miles was Amphitrite, in a sea-green dress, with appropriate jewelry—a crown of silver, a silver tunic decorated with shells, coral, and feathery seaweed. Her shoulders were covered with a mantle of her hair studded with precious stones and crystal drops. Mrs. Miles' ensemble represented a shower of gold, in a dress of gold brocade, trimmed with gold lace, with a gold girdle round to the waist, and over that a white tulle tunic studded with gold and brilliants, and a gold crown. Her hair was arranged with similar gold balls, and the hair was of the golden hue.

But to turn to those fashions which may be of rather more practical interest to the majority of American ladies. It is now quite the rage to wear artificially disappearing in evening toilets, although it is still seen occasionally in morning costumes. The new and most fashionable bonnets are now adopted instead of steel ones. The crowns are made quite plain round the head, and have several flounces of lace round the crown. About four of these petticoats are worn at one time. The material is satin, and the starch is stiff. Only very accurate ladies, and those who desire to be conspicuous, are to be seen in the strict orthodox set of dress.

Yet the same journal which gives this as the Parisian fashion, tends to let readers a peep pattern which "will enable them to cut out a dress which will be in the first effective at home." And, moreover, states that the real fact is that "distinguished ladies" are now wearing the crinoline diminishing in size. They are still clung to with a pertinacity which is the more surprising, because it has been evinced for any article of ladies' costume. They have been ridiculed, jested at, attacked, in opposition by ten years or more. Punch has leveled endless critical shafts against them apparently offending garments; but all to no avail. The crinoline is here, and here it remains, and here it seems likely to remain for some time to come.

Jerome Bonaparte is reported as shocked at discovering that the Prince and Princess of Wales smoked cigarettes together in a little blue satin sanctum called their smoking-room. This sanctum sanctorum of connubial bliss was taught her Royal Highness by her scape-grace husband; and, horrible to say, she likes it.

SIMILES.

To what shall I liken my love for thee?
To the measureless sky, the boundless sea?
Verily no,
It is not so!
The sky is not ever so clear and bright,
But oftentimes clouded and dark and black,
As if the bright sunshine would never come back
Such is not my love for thee!

My love never changes, 'tis always the
From the cloud of fear or uncertainty.
Never more,
Nor ripple there;
To dim its skies,
Which are ever bathed in hope's deep blue;
And happiest fancies like sunbeams play
On its shadowless bosom night and day.
And such is my love for thee!

I would not compare my love to the sea,
That emblem of sinful inconstancy.
Nor raging love,
Nor ripple there;
It can not be broken for long, I trow.
Besides you can fathom it, know its breadth,
And take the hid treasures out of its depth.
Such is not my love for thee!

But the ocean of love within my breast,
Is a raging storm which is never at rest,
Boundless, endless,
And fathomless.
Nothing can calm it or lay it away.
The waves dash high, but the tide of Time
Can never affect this sea of mine.
And such is my love for thee!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SEASONABLE TRANSLATION.
LENTEN FARE.—Under a tent umbrella.

AMUSEMENT FOR YOUNG LADIES ON A WET AFTERNOON.—Knitting their Eyebrows.

TO A CORRESPONDENT.—A gentleman troubled with a short memory having acquired the bad habit of turning down a leaf of a book so as to remember where he left off, writes to say that he never can recollect a street that he's been in or a house that he's called to remember his duties? Very simply: let him do as he does with his books, turn down a corner.

QUESTION TO A WORKING GARDENER.
"Of all our trees which yields most fruit?" Says he,
"Sir, this has been come from my Indus-tree."

A COMPOSING COMPOSITOR.—When this is a greyhound not a greyhound?—When it turns a hare.

SCRAGGY.—Miss Martineau is supposed to have cancelled the ballot to prudence in her excellent work, Mind your own Business.

A gentleman had conferred a favor on a friend, an undertaker. Says the latter: "Brown, I am under great obligations to you for this favor, and as my line of business is nearly supervitated, and I hope I may be able to do you a good turn in the way of trade." If you ever want a coffin call on me. I should be happy to bury you or any of your family at the lowest rates, at greatly reduced rates." His friend retired, satisfied that the undertaker had his best interests at heart, and he was not disappointed.

Gentlemen who smoke allege that it makes them calm and complacent. They tell us that the more they fume the less they fret.

EPITAPH.—The following is the world-renowned epitaph of the Lady Elizabeth O'Leachey: "First cousin to Burke, and intimately related to Erskine, she was kind, passionate, and deeply religious. Also she painted in water-colors, and sent many pictures to the Great Exhibition, and of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Slight changes make great differences. "Dinner notice!" is very good fun, but you can't say as much of "nothing for dinner."

At what hour did the devil make his appearance in the Garden of Eden?—Some time during the night. He certainly came about it.

If you have a cough, don't go to church to disturb the rest of the congregation.

The editor who "did not mind his steps" introduced himself to a ball-room. "The poem published this week was composed by an esteemed contributor who has lain in his grave many years for his own amusement."

BEWARE! LANGUAGE—He-brew.

A CURIOUS EPITAPH.—The following epitaph may now be found in a Scotch grave-yard: "Here lie the remains of John Hall, grocer. The world is not worth a fig, and I don't regret leaving it in saying so."

"PRAY, Sir," said a judge angrily, to a blunt old Quaker, who was on trial for contempt of court, "don't you know what we sit here for?" "Yes, verily, I do," said the Quaker, "we sit here for you for dollars each day, and the fat one in the middle for four thousand a year."

The pawnbroker's favorite time of year—the season of loans.

HOUSEHOLD NOTE.—(By a Cockney.) What to do with Cold Mutton.—Heat it.

A man in Cincinnati adopted an original way of redeeming his promissory notes. One morning, when he knew his wife would see him, he kissed the servant girl. The bank officers happened to be absent, and actually rejoiced twelve dollars per month.

Mr. Jenkins was dining at a very hospitable table, but a piece of bacon stuck in his throat, and he said that the lady of the house reminded to him of a "bacon." "Oh, no, Mr. Jenkins, baby trowsers to the bacon. Don't be afraid of it!"

"Sir, I assure you, I would not be. I've seen a piece twice as large and it didn't hurt me a bit."

"Guilty or not guilty?" sharply said the City Judge the other day to an intoxicative female prisoner in the dock. "Just as your Honor pleases. It's not for the likes o' me to dictate to your Honor's worship," was the reply.

Spain is at red-hot heat with Chili having captured one of her vessels. What a fizzing there will be, for perhaps Spain will find herself in hot water even by dabbling in Chilly affairs.

WE CALLED THIS ONE THE SYLPHIDE, AND SERAPHINE'S DOG WAS A FLIGHTY ONE TOO.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.—Shortly will appear by the author of Prometheus Bound, Prometheus Half-bound, to be followed by Prometheus in Cloth with gilt edges.

A certain landlady, it is said, makes her pies so light that her lodgers can see to go to bed without a candle after eating a moderate-sized piece.

Somebody describing the absurd appearance of a man dancing the polka, says, "He looks as though he had a hole in his pocket, and was trying to shake a shilling down the leg of his trowsers."

Snooks says the prettiest sewing-machine he ever saw was about seventeen years old, with short sleeves, low dress, and quiet tastes.

TRUTH SS. FALSEHOOD.

There is a saying, strange to tell,
Though men in books have often stuck it—
It is, that Truth lies in a well.
If so, then Truth has kicked the bucket.

Why are books the best friends?—Because when they bore you, you can always shut them up without offense.

A noted itinerant preacher, once said of a grasping, avaricious farmer, that if he had the whole world inclosed in a single field he would not be content without a patch of ground outside for potatoes.

Why does the eye resemble a schoolmaster in the act of flogging?—It has a pupil under the lash.

An Emeralder, on admiring a beautiful cemetery, observed that he considered it a healthy place to be buried in.

The only pain that we can make light of—A window pane.

The ! dy whose peace of mind was broken intends to have it squared.

Why is swearing like a rugged coat?—It is a bad habit.

A man may curse,
And still be sane,
If his wife aught;
A man may spend,
And still not spend
If his wife be aught.

A clerical gentleman, who appeared before the gipsy covering, Queen Esther, with his third wife, was apostrophized thus by her: "Ah, Mr. Blank, ye've an awful waster o' money!"

They are fools who persist in being quite miserable because they can not be polite sages.

"Who's there?" screamed old Squire B——, roused from his first nap one bitter cold midnight. "Who's there?" "Hallos, Squire!" was the reply. "We want to get married."

"You're one. And now be off with you," said the Squire, with emphasis.

SIR EDWIN LANDSEER'S MOTTO—Give a dog a good name and hang him.

Why are ladies like churches?—Because there is no living without them.

A punster says: "My name is Somerset. I am a miserable bachelor. I long to marry; for how could I hope to prevail on a young lady, possessed of the slightest notion of delicacy, to turn a Somerset."

A Chemical Joker thus alkalizes: "Some people say intrusion will not burn the stomach, but it will."

A newspaper contains the following: "Truth is created out of our columns this week."

An honest Irishman, observing the bearers of his wife's coffin bumping against the stairs, fumed them by calling out: "Arry, say, ye thieves of the world; what for be ye making a hell of pleasure?"

"My 'pinion is," said a philosophical old lady of much experience and observation, "that any man as dies upon a rainbo' day does it out of pure spite."

"What are you about with my microscope, George?" "I've been looking at the mites, and I want to see if there are any bairs in the leather as yet."

Can a man keep his feet dry when he has a crook in his boots?

The young gentleman who flew into a passion has had his wings clipped.

A COCKNEY'S EPITAPH ON HIS COOK.—"Peace to her hashes!"

UNDERSTANDING THE TEST.—A clergyman, when the contribution-box returned with little silver in it, said he would have understood the text, "Alexander, the coppersmith, did me much evil."

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Why is a man who squints like a needle that can not be threaded?
Because his eye is defective.

Why is it time for men to be pitied than silent?
Because bankrupts are broken, while deaf men are only cracked.

Why was the first day of Adam's life the longest ever known?
Because it had no Eve.

Why are women the greatest thieves?
Because they arch their children, bone their stays, and steel their petticoats and buttons.

Why do little birds feel depressed early in a November morning?
Because their bills are overdue (dew).

Why is the letter B important?
Because it is found both in earth and water.

Who do children hate the most?
The teachers that beat them.

FISK & HATCH, Bankers,
AND
DEALERS IN UNITED STATES AND OTHER DESIRABLE SECURITIES,
No. 5 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK,
OFFER FOR SALE
THE NEW UNITED STATES THIRTY YEAR SIX PER CENT. BONDS,
Issued to aid the Construction of the Great Central Pacific Railroad.

They have THIRTY YEARS to run, and bear Interest at the rate of SIX PER CENT. PER ANNUM, in Lawful Money. The Interest is payable SEMI-ANNUALLY, in January and July. They are an ABSOLUTE and UNCONDITIONAL OBLIGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, and are

EXEMPT FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION,

Like all other Government Bonds. They are received by the Bank Department as Security for the Circulation of National Banks, and Circulation is issued upon them at the rate of Eighty per Cent. of their Par Value.

The length of time they have to run renders them very desirable for BANKING PURPOSES or for INVESTMENT, as they can not be called in by the Government, and the Rate of Interest can not be reduced, for THIRTY YEARS. As Gold declines, their relative value to Gold-Bearing Bonds are liable to be paid off so much earlier, will proportionately increase, and after 1881 they will probably be

The only Six per Cent. Bond of the United States in Existence,

And they can now be bought at a rate at which they will pay A BETTER RATE OF INTEREST on the amount invested, in the mean time, than any of the Gold-Bearing Bonds, at present prices, unless Gold shall average from 50 to 59 per cent. premium for the next ten or fifteen years. So high an average premium on Gold, for this length of time, is beyond all reasonable expectation, and largely in excess of the most intelligent financial estimates.

They are issued only in limited amounts, as the work on the Pacific Railroad progresses. There is but a SMALL AMOUNT NOW IN THE MARKET, and the DEMAND IS DAILY INCREASING.

ALSO FOR SALE:
THE CENTRAL PACIFIC R. R. SEVEN PER CENT. STATE AID BONDS,
PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST PAYABLE IN GOLD.
Interest Guaranteed and Paid by the State of California.

These Bonds are secured by a Mortgage on 160 Miles of Road, from Sacramento to the California State Line, forming a part of the GREAT PACIFIC RAILROAD ROUTE, adopted and aided by the UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT. They are further secured by a Sinking Fund of $600,000 PER ANNUM IN GOLD, reserved from the earnings of the Road, and Pledged for their Redemption.

About sixty miles of the road are already completed, on which the EARNINGS ARE VERY LARGE, having been in the month of October, 1865, on fifty-three miles of road then running, upward of $95,000 IN GOLD, the road having as yet penetrated to no very important points.

With thirty miles additional completed, which will probably be ready for working by the middle of June next, the earnings are expected to be not less than $700,000 PER MONTH IN GOLD, by several estimates based upon the present amount of traffic over the same region without railroad facilities. This part of the Great Pacific Route is destined to be one of the MOST PROFITABLE PORTIONS OF ANY RAILROAD IN THE WORLD.

These Bonds are a FIRST-CLASS SECURITY in every respect, and a limited amount will be offered upon terms which render them a VERY ATTRACTIVE AND DESIRABLE INVESTMENT.

Inquiries for further particulars will receive prompt attention.

We also keep on hand, and buy and sell at market rates, all classes of UNITED STATES SECURITIES, including

Six per Cent. Bonds of 1881, Five-Twenty Bonds (all Issues), Ten-Forty Bonds, Seven-Thirty Treasury Notes (all Issues), One Year Certificates, Compound Interest Notes;

ALSO, NEW YORK SEVEN PER CENT. BOUNTY LOAN, AND OTHER DESIRABLE SECURITIES.

Collection made throughout the United States and Canada. Gold and Coupons bought, sold, and collected.

Deposits received from Individuals and Firms subject to Check at Sight, as in a Bank.

Certificates of Deposit, available in all parts of the country, issued without charge.

Liberal arrangements will be made with Banks and Bankers throughout the country for their New York Accounts.

Orders for the purchase and sale of Miscellaneous Stocks and Bonds carefully executed at the Regular Stock Exchange.

PIERRE CARME.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY KIMBERLY BROTHERS, NORFOLK, VA.]

THE GAME OF BILLIARDS.

BY the official record it is found that in Paris, during the year 1865, taxes were paid on 37,473 billiard-tables in public use. The renown of the pastime is not confined to the country of its supposed inception, although almost every nation has its peculiar way of manipulating the game. For example, in France the game is played on a table without pockets, the surface of the bed measuring 5 by 10 feet. Three balls are used, one for each of the players, and a red object ball. A count is only effected by the carom, and such carom scores one only, and as all foul or push shots are prohibited, undoubtedly this game calls forth the highest skill of the player. In England the tables have six pockets, one in each corner, and at the centre of the side rails; the bed surface is 6 by 12 feet. Three balls are also used there, and the counts are made by the winning and losing hazards as well as by carons; thus, while a carom scores two, should the player or his opponent's ball go into the pocket the score is four, and if both are pocketed the score is six; should all three balls go in, beside the carom, the score is nine. In this country different sizes of tables are used, varying all the way from the French to the English standards. Some are made without pockets, while others have four or six each. The full game includes caroms and the winning hazard, and a stroke can possibly be made to score thirteen.

The game generally played by experts in this country is the four-ball carom game, on a four-pocket table, 6 by 12 feet surface. This, with the exception of push shot omitted, is beyond comparison the most brilliant and interesting of all the games; for while it calls for all the scientific ability of the French game, it presents a tenfold increase of the beauties and intricacies of triangulation, power of force, and startling effects.

During the last twenty years billiards, which had fallen into disrepute, has made rapid advances in this country, and an apartment for its accommodation is now considered a necessary feature in first-class residences. Next to its generally attractive features and superior sanitary advantages, this increased popularity is mainly due to the unceasing exertions of MICHAEL PHELAN, Esq., of this city, who has devoted an active lifetime to the elevation of the pastime and the perfection of its machinery. Mr. PHELAN, who is now in the fiftieth year of his age, is the senior partner of the well-known manufacturing firm of PHELAN & COLLENDER. He has long been celebrated as one of the best players living. Still he never had much inclination for match games, though his great encounter with SCHAEFER, of Detroit, for $7500 a side, which came off in that city in April, 1859, and which was won by PHELAN, has ever been rated as the greatest billiard contest on record. Soon after this occurrence Mr. PHELAN determined to permanently retire from the billiard arena, unless he should at some time have the opportunity of measuring cues with Mr. BENNER, of Paris, or Mr. ROBERTS, of London, who at that period were the reigning stars of their particular spheres. The last time PHELAN played for a stake was with KAVANAGH, at Irving Hall, in April, 1864. The game was 1000 points up-carons, push prohibited. The consideration was, the loser to give $100 for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission, while the receipts for admission were donated to the Working Women's Society. PHELAN won.

In June, 1865, through the persuasive powers of Mr. PHELAN, still by valuable prizes presented by his firm, almost all the prominent players in the United States assembled in this city, and after forming a Billiard Congress, which still exists, a code of rules was adopted, and a tournament participated in, which established a championship. DUDLEY KAVANAGH, of this city, one of the most successful and effective players in any country, succeeded in securing possession of the Golden Cue, the emblem of the Championship, which he afterward maintained his right to in five succeeding encounters with the most skillful antagonists that could be brought against him. Finally, in May, 1865, under the plea of illness, KAVANAGH forfeited the Champion Cue to LOUIS FOX, of Rochester; who in turn lost in a contest with JOHN DERBY, of Washington, who now has possession—and is by right Champion of America. The next contestant with DERBY was JOHN MCDEVITT, of this city, and the game was played in the Hall of the Cooper Institute, on the evening of Tuesday, March 13. DERBY retained the cue.

DUDLEY KAVANAGH, who is now exactly twenty-eight years of age, has played more match games than any other man in America, and, of some twenty on record, he was winner in about two-thirds of them. His last encounters were with M. CARME, each player winning a game, and the latter forfeiting a third game, which he refused to practice for, as it allowed the odious "push," which CARME styles "baby billiards." Some of KAVANAGH'S over-zealous friends still claim the title of Champion for him, but of course this point can not be maintained. KAVANAGH not only forfeited the cue, but he refuses to respond to the challenges of M'DEVITT, of JOSEPH DION, of Montreal, and PIERRE CARME, of New York.

About one year since a real excitement was created in billiard circles by the arrival of a most skillful French Professor of Billiards, M. PIERRE CARME, of Versailles. Placing himself under the direction of Mr. PHELAN, M. CARME gave a series of public exhibitions, and his wonderful prowess in the masse, force, follow, fly, and other difficult and seemingly impossible shots, have produced profound astonishment, and been received with the most rapturous applause. M. CARME has only engaged in two match games (those above-mentioned) during his sojourn in this country, which we understand he has determined to make his permanent residence, and that he will probably shortly open in this city a fine establishment for practice and instruction. He is a native of Bordeaux, now in the thirty-first year of his age, and, like KAVANAGH, is a bachelor. M. CARME probably has no superior in his specialties, and is willing to engage any person, for a heavy consideration, at the three-ball French, or the four-ball American games; push barred.—The latest billiard sensation was the arrival, a few weeks since, of Mr. JOHN ROBERTS, the distinguished English billiardist. This gentleman has long maintained his supremacy in the winning and losing hazard game; and as he has beaten DEFTON, HOLDEN, CHESTERMAN, BENNETT, and other experts—most of them at an odds of 200 in 1000—he, without doubt, has no equal at the game. He spent the most of the two years just passed in Australia, and on his return to England made an engagement with DUDLEY KAVANAGH to visit this country, under whose management he is now traveling in the West, they lately having taken part in a tournament at Memphis, Tennessee. The friends of Mr. ROBERTS say that on his return to New York

DUDLEY KAVANAGH.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. H. WILLIAMSON, BROOKLYN, L. I.]

JOHN ROBERTS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY C. H. WILLIAMSON, BROOKLYN, L. I.]

he intends to give our best players the opportunity to measure cues with him, and that the contests will probably be at the English, French, and American games. From this it may be inferred that MR. ROBERTS intends to accept the challenges of MR. JOSEPH DION, of Montreal, who some time since defied any man living to play him a game in each of the above specialties, each to be for $2000 in gold a side. MR. ROBERTS is now in the forty-first year of his age, and is not a bachelor.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1866.

SOUTHERN SENTIMENT.

MR. JOHN T. MONROE, of New Orleans, was Mayor of that city when it was occupied by the Union forces, and his conduct was such that he was imprisoned by military authority. At the late election for Mayor he was the successful candidate, and with him three gentlemen who were of the same sympathy were elected for three of the four Recorders. The city. Governor WELLS, of Louisiana, whose Unionism has been hitherto of a strictly "Southern" character, is yet unwilling to authorize MR. MONROE to assume office. MR. KENNEDY, the retiring Mayor, is so unfriendly of the loyalty of MR. MONROE that he also is reluctant to leave the city in his hands, and has telegraphed to the President for instructions. The President is reported to have replied that the facts were unknown to him, and he has declined to interfere. Application was then made to General CANBY, and, as we write, his decision is unknown.

Meanwhile a gentleman perfectly familiar with New Orleans since its capture by the Union army tells us that the life of no Unionman would be safe in that city should the United States forces be withdrawn. Another observer reports the same condition of affairs in Savannah; and a gentleman resident of Mobile, faithful through the war, informs us that he should feel it necessary for him to leave the State should the military hold of the Government be relaxed. And these are not exceptional witnesses. Now the men whose conduct is such as to occasion these apprehensions are those who have elected MR. MONROE Mayor. They are those whose sympathizers elsewhere elected MR. HUMPHREYS, an unpardoned rebel general, Governor of Mississippi, and MR. STEPHENS, the second chief of the rebellion, Senator from Georgia. They are those who, in TEXAS, sitting upon Grand Juries, refuse to act upon five hundred indictments against murderers of Union men during the war, and who, as members of the Convention, are hesitating, at this time of writing, to annul the Ordinance of Secession null and void.

Of course so long as this feeling continues dominant in the late insurgent States, so long as fervent fidelity to the rebellion is the sole passport to popular favor, and the universal tone of opinion is bitter hostility to the Government and Union, it is the plainest duty of the Government to maintain a strict military hold of such States. Intelligent men at the South will see that such hold and conduct only mean "acquiescence." Nobody indeed expects defeated men to confess that they were wrong, or to feel a profound affection for a power against which they have ineffectually struggled. But when they declare that they have submitted and acquiesce in the decision of the war, they will not be content to add that they have no right to be indignant, that the country looks to their acts and not to their words. What kind of acquiescence is it which endangers the personal security of Union men? What kind of submission is it which elects as civil officers and representatives and senators men who are notoriously and confessedly incapable of cooperating with the Government? A man who carries up his suit to the highest court, and loses it, does not think he was wrong in bringing the suit, but he pays the damages and yields to the law.

That is all that is asked of the late insurgents. But if they continue to act as if judgment had been pronounced for them, instead of against them, they put themselves much further in the wrong, and indefinitely postpone the day of peace and reunion. If it be natural for them to be disappointed and bitter, it is no less natural for the country to be wary of admitting them to an unchecked exercise of power. If they say, as some of them do, "But what further proof can we give? Have we not accepted every thing which has been imposed upon us?" the reply is, that so long as the stanchest Union men among them feel insecure, so long as capital and enterprise and labor hesitate to flow toward them, so long as their Legislatures and popular elections reveal a sullen hostility to the measures and men which, whether they individually like them or not, are yet inseparably identified with the Government in whose supremacy they declare their acquiescence, so long the country has a right to say that they have not acquiesced; that they must be distrusted and closely watched; and so long we have no right to believe that they will by whatever power they may acquire to neutralize and destroy the very acts to which they point us as proofs of acquiescence.

The people of the Southern States ought to understand that the war was just as earnest to us as it was to them; that there is not the least vindictiveness of feeling upon the part of the loyal people of the country, but, on the contrary, a very large desire of sincere union and enduring peace; that there are no foolish expectations of an affected love of the National Government among those who were lately in arms against it; that there is no intention to be unjust or ungenerous toward our Southern fellow-citizens, whatever the press and politicians who deluded them through the war may say; but that there is a very inflexible determination that the war shall not have been fought in vain; that emancipation shall be made, not called, a fact; and that the permanence and authority of the Government shall not be imperiled by any rash policy springing from ignorance or impatience. There will be no effort to reap more than we have sowed, but the harvest will surely be gathered.

The quality and dominant will of the American people were shown during the war, and they are equally shown to those who can see, in establishing peace. The imbecility of the Confederate and anti-rebel sentiment should be fully known by this time even to the late insurgents of the South. It could not divide loyalty during the war, and it will not divide the same loyalty now that the war is over. No new party will be formed until the Union party has done its work, and that work is to establish and maintain and reconstruct the organization. If any Southerner doubts, if he listens to the sirens who have steadily deceived him for five years past, he will be deceived again, and more bitterly. The elections of last autumn, the opening elections of the spring, show that the Union line is not broken; and if the leaders of opinion in the late insurgent States are of the views, if they wish the country to believe in their acquiescence, they will abandon their dog-in-the-manger policy, and show that they were honest in the war by honestly accepting the judgment to which they appealed.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

THE freedom of a large number of the inhabitants of the United States, formerly held as slaves, was recognized and confirmed by the Emancipation Amendment. But mere emancipation left the whole class in an anomalous condition, the consequences of which it was plainly the duty of the United States to remove. It became necessary to secure to them the relation of the freed people to the rest of the population; and Congress has therefore declared that all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power (excluding Indians not taxed, are citizens of the United States; and such citizens, of every race and color, and without regard to any previous condition of slavery, shall have entire equality of civil rights. Any person who shall deprive any inhabitant of any State or Territory of any right thus secured is declared to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and is punishable by a fine of not more than a thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than one year. The district attorneys, officers of the United States, with the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, and other officers who may be authorized by the President, are charged with the duty of proceeding against all violators of the law.

This Bill of Rights is necessary, simple, and precise. It declares the citizens, it defines their privileges, and provides for their defense. It pledges the whole power of the country to protect the civil rights of every citizen every where. It does not leave the matter to whims of local communities nor to the prejudices of caste. It recognizes the right of the supreme sovereignty to declare who are its citizens, and acknowledges the duty of that sovereignty to defend them; nor can any faithful citizen object that his fundamental rights are precisely defined and maintained by the supreme instead of a subordinate authority. The constitutionality of the law can not be questioned except upon the ground of a controlling sovereignty in the States over the nation, and that is a claim which is no longer valid.

This bill—which is truly a Magna Charta—overthrows all black codes in the United States against equality of civil rights. The Black Codes, which seek to retain as many of the disabilities of slavery as possible, disappear before this just and beneficent decree. It announces distinctly to those who would still cling to feudalism in America that feudalism is henceforth impossible. It tends to speedy pacification by showing to those who still doubted the national purpose that all the consequences of emancipation have been well weighed and fully accepted by the country. It destroys false hopes. It clears away misunderstandings. It proclaims that when the United States abolished slavery they meant what they said, and knew what they did.

The bill passed both Houses of Congress by enormous majorities. In the House of Representatives the vote was 111 to 38; in the Senate 33 to 12; and we see no reason to suppose that the President will dissent. We hope indeed that by the time this paper is issued the bill may have been approved by him and have become a law. We shall hear of that result with sincere satisfaction; for when once the President and Congress agree upon a vital and fundamental measure like this, a better understanding and further agreement will be much more probable and practicable.

Senator JOHNSON of Tennessee and his disaffected States will also be glad that a vexatious question is thus put in the way of settlement. Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, in his late speech before the Legislature of that State, spoke very unwisely of the duty of giving the freedmen fair play. We have the right to expect his earnest support of this bill. Governor ORR, of South Carolina, and Governor WALKER, of Florida, have shown great good sense in their action respecting the education of the freedmen; and they, too, will undoubtedly see and acknowledge the wisdom of a measure which secures rights that they do not deny. And all citizens of the United States who understand that the country must and ought to be constantly agitated until the equal rights of every American citizen before the law are secured by the highest possible sanction, will hail the bill as a measure of the wisest statesmanship, and an earnest of the national resolution that nothing which was really gained by the war shall be lost.

A REPORT UPON THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

We have received many letters discussing the eight-hours' labor movement, some of them very foolishly charging us with hostility to the laborer because we have pointed out the impracticability of remedying the evil of overwork by legislation. But the truth is, that the subject is controlled by other laws than that of a Legislature, and can only be studied in the light of such laws. A regulation of the State making it penal to work for more than eight hours would be absurd; and a declaration that eight hours should constitute a working-day would be useless. If such a declaration could not be enforced it would leave the matter exactly where it is now.

We observe that Mr. JULIAN, of Indiana, has suggested in Congress that eight hours shall be a working-day in the Government shops and yards; and that a Committee of Congress has been considering a general proposition in favor of the eight-hours' system. In Massachusetts a Commission was appointed last year to investigate the whole subject, and, after careful inquiry and consideration, the Commission have presented a Report which we heartily commend to every reader. It is the result of a most careful, comprehensive, and sagacious treatment of the subject. The Commission was composed of gentlemen peculiarly fitted for the task by sympathy, intelligence, and experience. They have examined the question with the utmost sincerity of purpose to remedy existing evils, and have finally rejected applause as the wisdom, justice, and practicability of an eight-hours' law.

The Commission sent into every town of the State to make the necessary inquiries and to solicit co-operation and advice. It also held public hearings in Boston. But neither the response to the inquiries nor the attendance upon the hearings indicated so vital and general an interest as had been supposed. It appears that in the chief branches of industry the "ten-hour system" prevails in practice, except in cotton factories, where eleven hours is the general rule. The shortest time established by custom in seven hours and twenty minutes for shipwrights upon "old work" or repairs: the longest time is seventeen and a half hours in a few bakeries. The Commission found that the employees were generally in favor of a reduction of time, and the employers opposed to it. Yet those who favor a reduction are not agreed upon the form of the necessary law. Some wished it to be prohibitory; but a law forbidding a man to use his power of labor at his discretion is a law destroying the capital of the working-man. So, finally, the mass agreed that the law should merely declare eight hours a legal working-day. But such a law is useless. Endless.

The Commission are of opinion that the radical objection to making eight hours, or any other number of hours, a legal day's work is, that, by giving one measure of time for all branches of labor, such a law must be unequal in its action. It would not be an impartial law, and that is a fatal difficulty. Moreover, it would be absolutely impossible to apply it to some of the most common and necessary branches of labor. Thus the fundamental industry of farming and planting could not conform to such a law; and the extent of this industry may be inferred from the fact that the present cash value of farms in the United States is about ten billions of dollars. The Commission sum up their objections to the law as follows:

"Because they deem it unsound in principle to apply one measure of time to all kinds of labor.

"Because, if adopted as a general law in the way proposed, it would be evaded in part by special contracts, and so add another to the dead laws that cumber the statutes.

"Because a very large proportion of the industrial interests of the country could not observe it.

"Because, if restricted, as some propose, to the employees of Railroads, it would be manifestly partial, and therefore unjust."

The Commission then proceed to a concise, able, and temperate consideration of various points involved in the question: the relation of capital to labor; the province of law; the law of usury; and the employment of capital. They think that capital and labor are not natural enemies, but real friends; and while for the reasons stated they are opposed to an eight-hours' law they think that in many departments of labor there is serious injury from over-work, and that in such there is need of reform. This reform, in their judgment, is to be accomplished by intelligent discussion and mutual understanding between employers and employed. They cite instances of such agreement. Thus the workmen representing at the hearings in the Commission, the delegate cooperatives of Lawrence advocated the ten-hour rule for factories, on the ground that the change from eleven hours to eight would be injurious both for the employed and the employer. The introduction of the eight-hours' system in Australia was not the result of legislation, but of the tranquil deliberation of all interests. The great co-operative movement in England, illustrated by that at Rochdale—the constituency of the Rochdale Corporation is unmanned and not legislative. In Germany and France, according to the Commission, the same movement is proceeding without convulsions and with the best results.

We know of no better service which could be done to Congress and to the Legislature of New York, and of every State which is now considering this subject, than to present every member with a copy of this thoughtful, humane, and truly valuable report.

THE DOWNWARD COURSE.

THE debates on the Loan Bill in Congress on 16th and 19th inst. foreshadow the struggle that must be maintained before specie payments can be resumed in this country. All the manufacturers, all the coal-fitters, all the producers of grain, all the holders of wheat, corn, pork, and cotton—every one, in a word, who owns property which is liable to decline with gold, is opposed to any and all measures that are calculated to diminish the volume of paper or the purchasing power of the currency. It is the old story; the contest of property holders against the debtor class. It is for the interest of all these—including those who now chance to own property and merchandise—that we should as soon as possible get back to a stable standard of value. That is the very basis of justice. Such a 25 per cent. bill as Mr. SHERMAN'S for example is slow to be persuaded that present loss will be future gain.

Partisans of continued inflation may for a few years or months sway Congress in a wrong direction. They may even prevent the passage of any measure of contraction during the present session. But they will gain little by the postponement. The logic and policy of the action in this matter are so clear that no delay will convince the public that they are going to the bottomless pit. Every loan bill like that introduced by Mr. MORRILL is objectionable on many grounds. Its defeat on 16th instant was not an unmixed misfortune. But those who infer from the defeat that Congress is going to adhere to the property holders who—under the lead of JOHN SHERMAN and THADDEUS STEVENS—declare in favor of indefinitely increasing the redeemable and depreciated paper-money, will presently discover that they have mistaken the temper of the nation. Honest men may fairly differ on this question. One man may favor this sort of contraction, another another sort. One man may look for resumption much earlier than his neighbor. But they who oppose even the contraction already developed in Congress to the MORRILL bill that gold is not going to decline, and that prices are not going to fall with it, will soon find out their error to their cost.

We showed last week that contraction was already in active progress. Over $175,000,000 of compound-interest notes, which six and seven months ago were in active circulation, have now practically ceased to be currency by reason of the interest which has accumulated upon them. Over $80,000,000 of National Bank currency—say an amount equal to the issues of the National Currency Bureau—have within the past ten months gone South for the transaction of business in that section of the country. And, finally, the Secretary has managed within the past six months to retire about $30,000,000 of the legal-tender notes outstanding. Thus, without any new legislation, contraction is going on at a fair rate.

Even if Congress should, on reconsideration, refuse to accede to the demand of Mr. M'CULLOCH, his present powers will enable him to continue to contract the currency at quite an active rate. It is now clear that by mid-summer Five-Twenty bonds will be selling at 75, if not at 80, in London. At these prices the outstanding currency can be exchanged for bonds, and Five-Thirty notes can be converted into bonds quite as fast as the interests of the coun-ity require and the safety of commerce will justify.

It is not at all desirable that the Secretary should be misled by the present plethoric condition of the Treasury into premature attempts to resume specie payments. Over twelve hundred millions of short-date securities are to be funded or paid off within two years. A policy which should precipitate a commercial crisis would greatly defeat the objects of the means of paying off these securities and of the credit essential for funding them. But no one connected with the Government has thus far developed precipitate views on this subject, but the partisans of continued inflation exhibit a disregard of the facts when they charge the Secretary with declaring for ruin forward in specie payments in disregard of the permanent interests of the country. Mr. M'CULLOCH's views have thus far been eminently conservative—as the continuance of the temporary loan at 5 and 6 per cent. sufficiently proves.

The great lesson which the public of producers, consumers, manufacturers, middlemen, merchants, farmers, etc., ought to engrave upon their memory at this time is that we are on the high road to contraction, to lower prices, to specie payments. They should never for a day being misled by the defeat of this or that bill, by the temporary success of this or that advocate of continued financial disgrace. Let them lay it to their hearts that the American people are bent on rehabilitating their national currency and making it as good as the currency of other nations. Let them whatever delays may occur, and however temporarily the paper-money men may seem to triumph, the restoration of a hard-money currency within a given number of years, if not months, is mathematically certain. Let them rely upon it that from this time to the day on which the banks resume specie payments there will be steadily a fall in decline, with such reactions as are usual in speculative markets. From quarter-day to quarter-day every thing produced or consumed in this country will show a diminution in market value. Men who hold goods, merchandise, and other property will grow steadily poorer, just as the holders of gold steadily richer in the days when the currency was being expanded. Labor will fall steadily in value, until wages decline to a point never before reached in our history. It is folly to see common laborers working for half a dollar a day by the time that gold falls to or near par. This will be thrice the average paid in Great Britain.

Let the public bear in mind, further, that "the bottom" has been reached before specie payments have been restored. In the downward course of prices, as many reactions as will often appear that prices are bent upward, and that a general recovery is about to take place. Such symptoms will prove deceptive. There can be no real recovery in prices while the national currency is made worth 100 per cent in gold. When that point is reached, it will be safe to buy any thing, for prices will naturally react sharply from the antecedent depression. But till then, seeming reactions will prove pitfalls of destruction.

Already the process has gone times point to the end. A month ago an active speculation in real estate was in full blast. It seems to have been shut down. Recent sales at auction and on a general decline in prices, and handsome country seats are for sale at rates very much lower than were current in 1856-7. Longheaded men are buying. Let them read the figures. In 1835-6, and again in 1856-7, this class of men refused to buy any thing, and were set down as simpletons by younger class of operators who claimed to understand the times, and bought right and left whatever was offered at "the going prices." In the course of a few months the young operators were ruined, and their more prudent seniors stepped in and secured their property at almost nominal rates. It will be so again. The men who keep their money, and have nothing to lose by 1866-7-8, will probably purchase in 1868 or 1869 all descriptions of property at prices as far below as the rates of 1853-4 were above their real value.

MORE LIGHT!

THE most important philanthropic association in the United States is the American Freedmen's and Union Commission. Its object proposes the education of all the unenlightened population in the late slave States. It is not an impertinent philanthropy, for the welfare of this country depends upon the best intelligence of the people, and ignorance any where is danger every where. The ignorance of Maine or of Florida imperils Pennsylvania and Iowa, and he is the true patriot and peacemaker who by every fair and honorable means aims at the education of all the people. The danger to the country is quite as much in the ignorance which puts the mass of the people at the South in the power of certain leaders as it is in the ambition of the leaders. The schoolmaster might have saved us the war. Education will certainly keep the peace.

The policy of Slavery has always been to keep the poor ignorant. Emancipation abolishes the chief reason of so barbarous a policy, but its traditions will long remain. The Charleston Mercury once said that the working-people had no more right to education than the slaves; and General HOWARD now says that he believes "the majority of the white people to be utterly opposed to educating the negro. The opposition is so great that the teachers, though they may be the purest of Christian people, are nevertheless visited publicly and privately with undisguised marks of odium." Yet, on the other hand, these are gratifying facts which show the awakening of some of the more intelligent minds in the late insurgent States to the necessities of the case, and which indicate something of that "acquiescence" of which we hear so much and see so little. Thus the Roman Catholic Bishop of Savannah has written to the Freedmen's Aid Union, saying that he learns (what is true) that it has no sectarian character, and asking help in founding schools for the colored part of his flock. The Legislature of Florida has passed laws establishing a common school system for colored children in that State, and the Governor seconds the request of the agent of the Freedmen's Bureau to the Aid Union, that it will assist in erecting a normal school for the education of colored teachers. Governor ORR, also, of South Carolina, and Mr. TRENHOLM, the Secretary of the Confederate Treasury, having visited the colored schools of Charleston, were so impressed by them that, their consciousness of the need of well-educated teachers, they propose a common school system for the colored population of the whole State. These are significant facts, and show that some men are beginning to see and how the cruel ravages of war are to be effectively repaired.

The Census of 1850, which was prepared under the auspices of DE BOW, who stated every thing as softly as possible for the slave States, said which, although the losses of war may be nearer the truth of 600,000, the later Census, gives 568,182 free adults in the slave States who could neither read nor write. The number of free colored people who could not readily reduce these figures. Assuming that there are 1,000,000 of freedmen, and even 500,000 poor whites to be educated, at least 80,000 teachers would be needed. The cost of education would be scarcely less than $15,000,000. The daily expense of the war was about $3,000,000. Thus to educate the whole mass the ignorance of the South from which the war grew would cost no more than ten days of war. If the States would undertake the whites, the expense would be reduced one-third. But this is an extra charge against expense? Would it be a waste of money? No; for as men are educated their demands increase, and the increasing wants demand start all the vast machinery of trade. Education in Alabama or Georgia quickens the spindles of Lowell, the looms of Lyons, the fields of the West. It is not charity, but trade. Education is the best police, abolishing armies, destroying penitentiaries, and recognizing the resistless force of the State in a single constable. Every dollar spent for this regenerating influence would be sowing a seed which would be harvested a thousandfold.

The work will be voluntary as that of the Sanitary Commission was; and such the Aid Commission proposes that it should be. Moreover, it should be cordially welcomed in the destitute States whose population is prepared to reach as it should be sustained by those which are able. Truth is not sectional. Ideas are not local. There is no sectional science or knowledge. Jealousy of so humane and lofty a work is impossible except among the foolish or the malevolent. It is worthy of the time and of the country. It would be the seal of reconciliation and peace.

COLORADO.

THE bill for the admission of Colorado has failed, and we are not sorry. The smallness of the population and the character of the Constitution were the chief objections to the passage of the bill, and the Enabling act was the main argument for it. But the terms of the original Enabling act are not complied with; and although that of itself is not a fatal objection, yet the facts as reported justify a doubt whether there was a fair expression of the population upon the Constitution. The vote upon the Territority was suspiciously small; and the Constitution disables an intelligent and industrious class of the population from having their ballot. The general principle was advanced which seems to us very reasonable, that it is not desirable to erect any Territory into a State until it has at least the population necessary to send one representative to Congress. If Colorado wishes to be the equal of New York in the United States Senate, it will be no unfair to delay her gratification until she is entitled to one member of the House.

A POOR JOKE.

ONE of the amusing spring jokes is the painful effort of the "Democratic" papers and orators to call the men who sustained the war against the Conspiracy of Richmond and the Chicago Convention disunionists. The gentlemen who with more or less frankness applauded JEFFERSON DAVIS and thwarted the United States Government in the agony of its struggle are very anxious to be considered the especial friends of the Union. As their political allies, the late enemy, could not overthrow the Government they are very clamorous that they should now control it. Next to the dissolution of the Union these worthy citizens would like to see a dissolution of the Union party; and as they have learned that loyal men are able to maintain the Union against combined Copperheads and rebels, they would dearly like to steal that name and brand their conquerors as disunionists. When they can persuade the American people that BENEDICT ARNOLD was a patriot and PATRICK HENRY a Tory, they may convince them that they that VALLANDIGHAM and the "friends" of HENRY SEYMOUR are true Union men, and the glorious multitude which saved the Union in war and intend to secure it in peace disunionists.

AVOIDABLE AND UNAVOIDABLE CAUSES OF DISEASE.

PHYSICIANS, in making out certificates of death sometimes in the case of old persons, when they find no evidences of the presence of some one positive disease, write down "Age" as the cause of the result. Let us see whether this is strictly correct. What, let us inquire, is necessary to the absolute preservation of life? Why, that death may come entirely from old age without the agency of any disease? Food must be taken every day of the right quantity and quality, in the right intervals, and adapted to the different periods of life; the influence of all external agencies—as air, heat, light, etc.—must be perfectly regulated, and mind and body must be exercised in the right amount and manner in all the stages of progress—all this requiring, as you see, vastly more skill of knowledge and judgment and power than are within the compass of man. But we will not call it so. There is requisite also entire freedom from unholy passion and desires, which are fruitful sources of disease in their irritating and disorganizing influence upon the nervous system, aside from the results of the wrong practices to which they lead. But even more than this is required. There must be the power to neutralize all those occult causes which operate so widely, producing specific forms of disease, such as scarlatina, malignant cholera, typhus, etc.

You see, then, that death absolutely from old age alone is an impossibility. Even if the occult causes alluded to did not exist, there is no obvious reason why aggregate which is to produce death at length in those who to all appearance die of old age. Even though there be no such cause, no obvious disease leaving residue, there always are in such cases slight morbid conditions engendered here and there —weak spots, as we may say—which have much to do with the final result, sometimes obviously, and sometimes secretly. It is only when some one of these becomes especially prominent at the last that some malady is set down as the cause of death; and when a concurrence of several such exists, it is not the cause, though death comes really from a compound disease, it is attributed to old age.

Have you ever read HOLMES's story of Dean Swift's "One-hoss Shay?"—how it all gave out at once at every point, making a pile of dust, instead of looking decayed, as it had been made, but in perfect of sheer old age? An amusing description this of an impossibility akin to that of a strictly general wearing out of every part of the human body.

"A chaise breaks down, but doesn't wear out," so we may say of man even when he dies at a good old age, in the sense that the physician can discern that he died of any particular disease. Even in such cases there is undoubtedly often "somewhere a weakest spot," though not discovered; and as though there may not be, it is clear that many small weaknesses may produce the result as surely as a single great one.

In what we have said the reader can not fail to observe that the causes of disease may be divided into two classes—the avoidable and the unavoidable; the former, all those common causes which come from such agencies as food, heat, air, light, etc., and the exercise of the powers of our bodies and minds; and the latter, the occult and specific causes of which we have before said.

Again, the two classes of causes very commonly are mingled in their operations. Take, for instance, cholera. The specific cause of this is unavoidable; that is, no one can escape from its influence who is where it is operating. But many of the avoidable causes of disease—that is, the common transgressions of the laws of health—are absolutely necessary in a very large proportion of cases, perhaps even the majority, to make the specific cause effectual in the production of the malady. And yet little head do most people give to these avoidable causes, while they run after vaunted prophylactics, and demand for impossible and ineffectual quarantine regulations. So in the case of typhus there is a specific cause, which sometimes develops the disease in those who observe carefully the laws of health unconsciously well, but it is peculiarly apt to do so in those who live in decided and continuous transgression of them, as it seen in the crowded and filthy habitations in some quarters of cities in contrast with the model lodging-houses.

The avoidable causes of disease operate with some unavoidable causes much more readily than with others. They, for example, have a great influence, as you have seen, in the diffusion of typhus fever and the cholera, but they seem to have little or none in the diffusion of small-pox, scarlatina, measles, etc. These latter diseases do not, like the former, have their special habitats among the crowded and filthy and vicious.

Take now, in contrast with such diseases as typhus and cholera, consumption, that great and constant scourge, which becomes constant and not occasional attracting but little attention; that ceases in many quarters even one-sixth of all the deaths. The causes of this malady are all avoidable, of course with the limitations before noted. There is no specific cause—no poison acting in connection with other causes; but the disease is the result of tendencies in the system generated by transgressions of the laws of health, and there is no case in which a true hygiene can not secure a perfect victory. Even those tendencies which are inherited may be very generally removed by proper modes of living.

CONSUL GENERAL MURPHY.

MR. W. W. MURPHY, Consul General of the United States at Frankfort-on-Main, in Germany, has just arrived from Europe, upon a short leave of absence. Mr. MURPHY will be most warmly welcomed by those who know how inestimable his services were in maintaining the honor and dignity of his country during the war. That the bonds of the United States were in good repute among German capitalists is greatly owing to the diligence, ability, and courtesy of Consul General MURPHY.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 19:

In the Senate, Mr. SHERMAN introduced a joint resolution that the aggregate outstanding United States notes, not bearing interest, and including fractional currency, shall not be diminished below four hundred and twenty millions; that all surplus in the Treasury exceeding forty millions in coin and forty millions in currency shall be applied monthly to the reduction of the outstanding indebtedness, and to the purchase or payment of the interest-bearing debts of the United States; but the amount of interest-bearing legal-tender notes shall not be diminished by payments or exchanges in a sum exceeding four millions per month. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance.——The bill to admit Colorado was defeated, 14 to 21.

In the House, Mr. Schenck reported back from the Military Committee a bill to incorporate a Military and Naval asylum, for the relief of totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States. The bill was passed.——The bill of Mr. Stevens, providing for amendments, the Civil Rights bill. The amendments were agreed to, and the bill was passed by a vote of 120 to 68.

March 14:

In the Senate, Mr. Wilson called for the bill to increase and fix the military peace establishment, which, after a fully debate, and the adoption of several amendments, was passed—yeas 37, nays 9.

In the House, Mr. Dodd's resolution relative to the Paris Exposition was taken up, and Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, addressed the House in opposition. Mr. Ancona, Mr. Grinnell, Mr. Woodbridge, Mr. Raymond, and Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, followed in favor of the resolution. At the evening session the consideration of the subject was resumed, and among several amendments the resolution was passed—yeas 90, nays 80.

March 15:

In the Senate, the Civil Rights bill was taken up, and the House amendment agreed to. The bill having passed both Houses, is the first measure of the kind ever passed over the veto of the President.

March 19:

In the Senate, the House amendments to the bill establishing a national home for disabled soldiers were concurred in, and the measure now only awaits the President's signature to render it a law. The bill to provide for an annual appropriation for Indian affairs was called up, and, after some discussion, passed.

In the House, the veto on the Loan bill was considered, and the bill was reconsidered without instructions.

GEORGIA AND TEXAS.

The TEXAS Constitutional Convention has repealed the abolition of slavery, and will probably make full provision for the rights of the negro, there being only a very small number of the delegates opposed to such a course.

The GEORGIA Legislature has also passed a law that all persons of color shall have the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be sued, to be sued, to be sued, to give evidence, to inherit, to purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have the full benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of personal estates, and shall not be subject to any other or different punishment, pain, or penalty for the commission of any act or offense than such as are prescribed for white persons, and shall be subject to such only.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THERE is considerable opposition in the Corps Législatif of France to the policy of trying to keep a footfold in Mexico, and a general debate upon the question will be held. It will have great influence on the Emperor, leading him as he may be persuaded to withdraw or to remain. The Mexican question and also no question of reform. It is significant that the Emperor has appointed a Minister of Agriculture, has had the holidays to speak of France as absolutely prosperous, and has left the Paris Exposition.

Prussia seems determined to annex Holstein and Schleswig spite of Austria. Count BISMARCK has given the latter country to the alternative of surrendering its own claims or risking war with Prussia. It seems likely that Austria will make the surrender for the sake of peace.

The Emperor of MEXICO rebukes his critics from the other side of the water unexpectedly. They recall, was gaining rapidly, and the Imperial cause thus encouraged began to attack. CHAPTER XII.

We really can not and will not permit our attention to be drawn off one moment longer from Dr. Peel; he looms altogether too conspicuously upon the Somerville horizon for that. It is impossible longer to ignore the deep and widespread impression he has made upon that intelligent community.

"Describe him to you?" says fair Anne Wright to an old schoolmate, with whom she is conversing, on a visit from an adjoining county. "I can not, Laura; you must see him for yourself, child."

"Oh, well, you can at least give me some hint, can tell me something about him," urges her curious friend—naturally curious from the perpetual references she hears made to him beneath that roof: "Is he a big man?"

"At least not a little man," laughs Anne. "Yes, I do really believe he is the largest—I mean the grandest man I ever saw in all my life. Such a noble chest! His forehead, too, high and prominent. And iron gray eyes—the finest you ever saw—eyebrows, and hair all as black? That isn't the name for it. But his eyes—the most splendid you ever saw—look as if they were actually alive!"

"Why, so they are if the man isn't dead," says her more prosaic friend.

"Oh, nonsense, Laura! I told you I could not begin to describe him," says Anne, who is a fragile and lovely blonde. "There is a sort of soft fire in them, except when he gets roused; then how they glow and flash and scorch! And then he has such a voice, child; I do know it is the sweetest and deepest. And pa tells me he makes speeches in Somerville the most powerful—makes the people laugh one moment, and cry like children the next. And when he denounces the Yankees or the Union people! Why pa says his voice, when he lifts it, can be heard for miles. Pa says he is equal to Colonel Rhett Roberts, if not superior. And then he dresses so splendidly! The finest broadcloth, the whitest and finest linen, the richest vests. I do think his neck-ties—figured silk scarfs, you know—are the gayest and the brightest. One notices such things so much more these days when we are all wearing our old things on account of the blockade—the old calico, for instance. And his jewelry, too! Pa objects to that in Dr. Peel. And I didn't like it in gentlemen either till I saw Dr. Peel. He wears several rings on his fingers, large ones, one or two diamonds among them. Then his heavy gold watch—I have noticed it when he takes it out to see if he ought not to be going—it is so massive and rich, with such a heavy gold chain to it all across his bosom. But you ought only to see his breast-pins, Laura! A different one every time, at least, he has called out here—the richest! What is most uncommon about him is the quantity of perfumes. Pa almost swears about it. I don't object to it. Why, Laura, in his appearance, bearing, and all, his olive complexion, too, he looks like a Spaniard—a Spanish prince, so large and sumptuous and magnificent in comparison with us plain people."

"Why, the man must be rich," says Laura.

"Every body says so. He always has plenty of money, and he pays it out as freely as a king. The ladies there in Somerville have only to go to him to get any amount they want, provided only it is for the war in any way. Not our miserable, ragged, dirty paper-money; great round twenty-dollar gold pieces; and, you know, they are worth ever so much more than paper. And he to his politics, pa says he never saw—"

"Give for the war? He must be a good Southern man," says Laura, threading her needle afresh.

"I was just going to say, pa says he is most determined, active, liberal, confident; the most splendid specimen of a Southern gentleman I ever saw," pa said, after Dr. Peel left him last Saturday. And that's just what we like him most for," continues Anne Wright, with enthusiasm. "You know what a hot Southern man pa is: but Dr. Peel is ahead of him, of any body I know. I've always been a good Secessionist, which is more than you can say, Laura. Now don't be offended, dear, but it's actually awful to hear Dr. Peel talk about the Yankees—the most despicable people, he says, in every sense of the word; yes, and proves it in a thousand ways. And then to hear him speak about the South, its extent, resources, glorious victories, future prospects, how essential its success is to the whole world—I can't remember it all, but it is like reading an oration."

"Yes; but why isn't he off for the war?" asks Laura, whose people, by-the-by, have been dreadfully suspected of entertaining Union sentiments. Plague take them! as Mrs. Warner is steadily remarking, you find them here and there and every where.

"You silly child, he is in the war. Not a private soldier to dig in the trenches, or to be shot down like common people. If you were to see him once you would see how absurd that would be. No, Dr. Peel fills a much higher position or other. He is often away from Somerville attending to military business; in correspondence continually with President Jarvis, General Beauregard, and the rest. He brought a superb sword all the way out here to show me, one that Davis had presented him with, gold scabbard, silver hilt, with a great red gem of some sort in the end, silver chains to it, and all. Pa pressed him to tell us more particularly about his position—it was only last Saturday. You ought to have seen his manner as he said it—

"It would give me much pleasure, Major Wright, to inform you. I flatter myself it would interest and astonish you if I was only at liberty to tell. A gentleman of your discretion, however, will understand that there are elevated and difficult duties—duties which require oaths of secrecy.' And then he drew himself up with such dignity I couldn't help thinking what a splendid Confederate senator he would make. Don't whisper it, Laura; but he has already told me that he has some promise, when the war is over, of the mission to France, or one of the new embassadors like other nations—to Austria or Russia or Spain, he was not assured yet which. But, my child," and Anne sinks her voice, the quietest of girls, enraptured with her theme, "you must only to hear him tell about being taken for a Federal spy by Old Abe himself, or, much ago. He told us about a self-appointed Committee visiting his rooms at Staples's Hotel to examine, if he knew what, papers, and how he took off Bob Withers and that fussy old Dr. Ginnis, pa like to have died laughing. And how Governor Jarvis died laughing, you know, he has! He had met with ever so many singular adventures in his life, he told us, one that being taken for a Federal spy he did think was the richest of all. He sat down on the sofa, he told us, and wrote to the President a full account of it, just to give Davis, he said, one good laugh if he never has another. 'How he must have rumbled over his things, peeped into his boots, and all—pompous Captain Simmons and the rest. But he was glad to see it, he said; it showed that people were active and wide awake for the Confederacy.'"

"Why, he must have been out here quite often?" said the friend, with a smiling malice in her eye.

"No, not very often; that is, not very, very often," replies Anne, very red and then quite pale. "But we won't talk about him any more, I'm tired of it. How do you fix these gathers, Laura? you are such a nice body, and I am such a poor little good-for-nothing."

"Oh, you artful little goose," broke in her friend, "if you ain't in love with the man my name isn't Laura Rice!"

"What nonsense, Laura!" says poor transparent Anne, blushing very red, and then growing so pale it was unpleasant to see. "I never thought of such a thing. Me? I would as soon think of the Emperor of Russia. If you only knew him, what a great, magnificent—"

"Nonsense yourself, Anne, don't I know," says her visitor, who, being quite quiet, was that much the more strong-minded and sensible. "If you don't know you ought to know that just such fair-haired, blue-eyed, nice little bodies as Miss Wright are the very ones your big Spanish princes are most apt to fall in love with."

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself, Laura," said her friend, flushing with pleasure one moment, almost ready to cry the next. "You ever whisper such a thing, and see if I don't tell every body you are Union. Dr. Peel may have taken me a good deal of attention at balls in Somerville, concerts, tableaux. He may have been out to talk with pa about the war. I never once thought, I never dared to think of such a thing. If I was only a strong, beautiful girl, high-spirited, like Alice Bowles say—but poor little me? Why, he would put me in his vest pocket almost. Me, child! You think yourself mighty wise, but you never were more mistaken in all your life." And Anne vows she will never mention Dr. Peel's name to any body again so long as she lives, rattles off upon other topics for a while, and then becomes so silent as to be but poor company for her friend.

And Dr. Peel is a magnificent-looking man, no denying that fact. As Anne Wright said to her friend, he did look "the very hero of a novel, dear; Byron's Corsair, and all that. And sings? You only ought to hear him sing!"

He looks all this the more strikingly these last few days from contrast with Lieutenant Ravenel. The Lieutenant is a late arrival in Somerville. He and Dr. Peel, to whom he has brought letters of introduction from South Carolina, are inseparable. Any one can see what particular pleasure the Doctor takes in introducing him to his friends—that is to say, all the gentlemen, not Union men, to be met on the streets.

"A genuine bit of Charleston aristocracy, Huguenot blood, distinguished for gallantry in the war; on important business from the War Department, though what that business is I can not get out of him," says Dr. Peel softly to his friends in billiard saloon and street corner.

If you observe them in Mrs. Bowles's parlor on a visit they make to that lady, Dr. Peel looms up peculiarly large in comparison with the small, slender, pale, and frail form of the Lieutenant. The Doctor is quite swarthy, while the Lieutenant is exceedingly fair and rosy, no perceptible beard—too young for that. A handsome fellow, too, in his way, in his neatly-fitting gray suit, the sleeves richly embroidered; the military cap sitting jauntily on the side of his head is off now, of course, and you can not fail to admire his light and curly locks. "My dear mother fitted me out before I left Charleston with her own hands," he told Mrs. Bowles in return for some compliment upon his attire. Such frank, open, cordial manners! Fun, too, always lurking in the corners of his dark eye and chiseled mouth, breaking out continually in rusty laughter, among and unrestrained as a child, over dimpled chin and cheek. Every body likes the Lieutenant on the spot warmly; you can not help it.

"By George! and those slight-built, pretty-faced fellows, girlish as they look, are the very ones to fight, you'll bet; perfect devils incarnate when a battery has got to be stormed. That's what the English people found out about their London dandies there in that war with the Russians," says Bob Withers in reply to Dr. Ginnis's sneers at the Lieutenant Ravenel.

For a wonder Dr. Peel is comparatively silent in Mrs. Bowles's parlor this evening, and lets the Lieutenant do all the talking. And Mrs. Bowles is in a flutter of delight over a visit from one direct from Charleston, and has a thousand questions to ask about Charleston and South Carolina. Lieutenant Ravenel knows almost every body and every thing there. She has vague recollections of having often seen the Lieutenant himself when a little boy playing on the Battery there at Charleston. His family she knows, of course, ever since she knew any thing. And the Lieutenant has a world to say about Rutledge Bowles, with whom he has been intimately associated, and whom he likes almost as much as his mother.

"Only, you know, Madam, there is no merit in that. Every one admires and likes Rutledge Bowles. How much he is growing to resemble his father in the portrait—of the Major, I presume it is, Madam?" says the Lieutenant, with a wave of the hand toward the old hero in his frame overhead.

"HAIL COLUMBIA!"

"I am pleased to know it," says little Mrs. Bowles, all the mother kindling through her refined and thoroughly lady-like manner. "Did Rutledge Bowles send his photograph by you?" she adds, eagerly.

"He would have done so, Madam, for I heard him speak of desiring to send it only the week I left. The fact is, I was not intending then to leave Charleston, much less come so far south as to Somerville? Upon my word, Madam, I had no such intention. Just ten minutes before the Augusta train ran out of Charleston my Colonel caught me on the street with dispatches in his hand and a sealed note of instruction for myself. 'You will hardly have time to throw your linen in a valise and run,' he said. I did run, hard as I could tear, Madam; barely in time to catch the train as it was on out of the depot. You remember it is a good distance from the Post-office, where I was when the Colonel caught me. At the rate they hurry us a pair of fresh feet ought to be served out every few hours as a regular ration, Madam—a relay of wings, or something of the sort." The Lieutenant is so perfectly a gentleman, at the same time so overflowing with life and fun that he keeps Mrs. Bowles and Alice laughing, the first named especially, all the evening.

"I could wish Rutledge Bowles was a little more lenient toward the faults of his subordinates, I mean his superior officers, as they are called in military language," says Mrs. Bowles, not without pride. "He seems to be very severe in some difficulty with them. Yet Rutledge Bowles has, though young, a good deal of his father's, the Major's, accuracy and energy of character. He lately sent me full drawings of all the defenses of Charleston, with an exact statement of the number and disposition at the time of our troops there."

"Was that not rather—excuse me—against rules?" began the Lieutenant, politely.

"So he said in his letter. 'But since you have written for them, mother,' he wrote, 'I will risk it.' It was a foolish curiosity I had, not to see the drawings and that, but to see how well he could do it. Friends here also would like to see what Rutledge Bowles could do. And I did not wish him to come unnecessarily in conflict with his superiors."

"Oh, we all know Rutledge Bowles," says Lieutenant Ravenel, gayly. "For my part I do assure you, Madam, I have talked with him upon that very point often. You see, Madam, we were students together at—tut, pshaw, was it at the Citadel or—"

"Columbia," suggests Mrs. Bowles.

"What am I thinking about? Columbia. I prepared for Columbia at the Charleston Academic, of course. I could take the liberty with him, you observe; it is not every one who can. If Rutledge Bowles has a fault it is modesty. But I could do nothing with him. Ah, before it escapes my mind, those drawings you spoke of, would you be so kind? And all the papers, in fact, if it is not too much trouble?"

It is no trouble at all. Mrs. Bowles knows exactly where the package is. Lieutenant Ravenel glances rapidly over them, but is so pleased with them that he begs permission to take them with him, will return them in the morning—they are well worth an hour's study. Mrs. Bowles consents, of course. The clear lady glows up to the smooth parting of her silvered hair with pleasure. A visitor, and a Ravenel too, from Charleston!—it is as an angel stooping from Eden to Carolina, war, and Rutledge Bowles, the evening passes rapidly by. The gentlemen consent to remain till tea, Alice entertaining them while her mother absents herself, making some special arrangements connected therewith.

Neither of the ladies have any admiration for Dr. Peel, his sumptuous attire, jewelry, and essences. But on account of the Lieutenant, who remembers Alice, often met her in her early days in King Street—her mother also, only it is so long ago, at Hibernian Hall he thinks it was—they can not refuse to pay the Doctor due attention. Yet the Lieutenant is the soul of the evening, at tea-table, and after tea till near midnight. The war is, of course, uppermost, thanks to Rutledge Bowles, and Lieutenant Ravenel regards the attempt of the North to prevent our independence as the most unjust act of all. He describes their cowardice, how they scamper and squall for quarter in every battle till Alice can not help laughing heartily, and Mrs. Bowles's cheeks are wet with tears of mirth.

"Not that I do not from my inmost heart pity them," says good Mrs. Bowles. "The murdered, the frantic folly of their miserable leaders it is excites my anger. Poor creatures, the Federal private—cannon fodder, I presume, as most of them, ignorant persons. Yet they, too, have wives and children to sigh and weep for them."

The gay Lieutenant is grave in an instant. In low, soft tones he recounts sad, sad incidents with which, he is not ashamed of it, have moved me to tears more than in battle. "Poor, poor creatures! I agree in your Christian sentiment, Madam; yes, we can well afford to pity them." And the Lieutenant is familiar with the orphans of the Confederate generals, narrates skirmishes of which Mrs. Bowles and Alice have read, and had opportunity to read. Nor, owing to their retired situation, have they had such full particulars of the noble fleet being built for Confederate ports and in Europe for the Confederacy. The Lieutenant tells them, too, of certain negotiations then in progress with foreign powers, the ports the fullest information in reference to the great revolution, already arranged and soon to break out at the North for the overthrow of Mr. Lincoln and—pardon me, ladies—his hellish crew. A vast deal more to the same effect, all in a manner so sparkling and agreeable as not to bring back to Mrs. Bowles those happy, happy days in dear old Charleston.

"Henry must indeed see the editor of our paper—a Northern man, I regret to say," begins Mrs. Bowles.

Lieutenant Ravenel has already seen Lamman, Madam," interposes Dr. Peel. "We spent Sunday in company with him. The Star will contain in its next issue more really interesting information than any number since the war began."

And it did contain just that. Somerville read it with keen pleasure or the reverse, according to the political tendencies of the reader. Dr. Peel Ferguson regretted that number of the Star as one of the most valuable in his whole collection. The visit of Lieutenant Ravenel was the event in Somerville. Somerville, in fact, remembers it distinctly to this hour.

But it might have. The gentlemen really can not consent to trespass upon the ladies any longer. "Only one piece of music more before we leave," says the lively Lieutenant, seating himself beside Alice at the piano turning over the leaves for her, even joining in with a well-trained voice, as she played and sang this and that for the last hour.

"Well, if I can," says Alice, with a smile, her fingers on the keys.

"Hail Columbia. Only for the fun of the thing, you know," says her visitor, laughing.

"You may excuse me." Alice has a taste for fun, but finds no amusement in doing just that, she does not ask herself why.

"Well, the Star-Spangled Banner."

"Excuse me, Lieutenant Ravenel," quite decidedly, too.

"Pardon me, only Yankee Doodle, just for the amusement of it," pleads the Confederate officer, with hands clasped in comic supplication. "You play so well."

"I can be guilty of no such—such mockery," says Alice, surprised at her own resolution, force, and energy of refusal. With heightened roses, too.

"I really am amazed at you, Alice," says her mother, as Alice rises from the instrument. "A willful daughter, much like Rutledge Bowles in character, Lieutenant Ravenel. But since you have given us so pleasant an evening, Sir. Of course I respect your aversion to the North, Alice, but—but—If you will excuse my poor practice, Lieutenant Ravenel—"

And Mrs. Bowles, who is a fine player, sits down to the piano. She does not remember the joke, but it is the request of a guest, a favored guest. Yankee Doodle first. She had almost forgotten it. The servants in the kitchen positively refuse to believe their ears. The Star-Spangled Banner next. Charles and Sally, in the hall at this time, listening to Rutledge's wild vague ideas that the Yankees have arrived at last. The Lieutenant beside her strikes in with the words after the first line. Mrs. Bowles looks up nervously, to meet the laughing eyes of her guest. What a willful, handsome, foolish fellow.

"Now Hail Columbia, if you will pardon my folly," pleads the volatile officer. It is a severe strain upon our good-breeding, but she has no time to refuse. This time Dr. Peel is on her other side, his deep voice swelling that martial music. It is better sung than played, but splendidly done as it is. Alice is turning over a book on the other side of the room, the tears, to her astonishment, trickling fast and free down her cheeks. Her emotions? The variation of magnetism not more beyond her analysis or control.

"It will be such a joke to tell Rutledge when I see him," says the laughing soldier. "Mrs. Bowles is three-fourths married with him, but there is a fascination about the young Carolinian which she can not resist. With the most delicate magnificent attention the gentlemen take their hats to leave, apologizing for their long stay. And Mrs. Bowles has to apologize also for Alice, who has left the room.

"I fear I have offended Miss Alice by my whimsey in regard to that old music," says the handsome Lieutenant, seriously, and with penitent face. I am heartily ashamed of myself. I fear levity is my besetting sin. I apologize for her, Madam; she must forgive me on the ground of our being both Carolinians. And may I be," adds the Lieutenant, rising to take the pen for after taking his leave, "that you will not allude to my visit in writing to Rutledge? There are reasons—in fact, I am on a secret service." His peculiar position prevents the officer from saying more. No one has finer tact than Mrs. Bowles. She comprehends and appreciates the whole, and hastens to express again her gratification at having met him. And so they part.

"I do solemnly declare, Fairfax, you are a trump. But look here, mum, you carried it too far to-night, entirely too far. It is Dr. Peel who makes this remark over and over when they are safely in the streets, and once again with new emphasis when the carriage stops at the doctor's room at Staples's Hotel.

His companion pays no attention to him until he has consigned a complete copy of the papers from Rutledge Bowles loaned him by Mrs. Bowles.

"Beautifully done," says Dr. Peel, after examining the work. "What a draughtsman you are, Fairfax! And the list, too; useful documents."

"Worth coming all the way to this little Somerville to get. You are a lucky boy but choose are made to sell, perhaps to deceive; this we know to be correct. Good-night, good-night, Fairfax, my boy," adds the Lieutenant. "What a perfect lady she is; and so unsuspecting! But the Lieutenant is mistaken. Dr. Peel is the fool I was raised on; very little else I have heard off and on these last two years; but I never enjoyed it as much as I did to-night. By Jove! here in the heart of the rebellion, and the sincerest of rebels playing the accompaniment! Unless you ever know such a joke?" And the young man stretched out his legs under the table, threw himself back in the chair, and laughed as only the young and happy can laugh.

However, for her life Mrs. Bowles could not see the point of Mr. Peel's amusement. She condemned, guilty. And then passers-by having stopped, horror-stricken, to hear the music, poor Mrs. Bowles has to endure a long week at the matter for weeks after. Most annoying. But when Mrs. Warner, on a special visit, with agonized eyebrows, begs to know the truth, Madam. Hail Columbia, Yankee Doodle, Red, White, and Blue, Star-Spangled Banner—all most miserable old tunes—I am sorry to say again, I'm told. Why, Mrs. Bowles, you must have heard how Alonzo Wright, only a week ago, when you saw the comely face cotton, shot a man dead, dead on the spot, for only whistling Yankee Doodle thoughtless-like, for the man was a good Secessionist."

"Mrs. Warner," interrupts Mrs. Bowles, very quietly, but with all South Carolina in her manner, "my daughter Alice and myself and our guests play and sing, and do now, and at all times, exactly as we like. Mr. Wright's conduct is simply brutal. Sumptuous Dr. Peel is a totally different Dr. Peel in every sense from what Somerville has known him. Good-by, Mrs. Warner," in her air, too, with the Lieutenant, his natural self evidently.

Never mind about me, Peel, old fellow!" says his friend, gayly. "The only way to cure rotten ice is to skate your swiftest. You have your wish—out on the ice, Peel, and I'll follow my way. I wonder if I have not had some experience by this time? My way of doing matters has carried me over many an ugly place—will carry me over many an uglier yet. The fact is, Peel, I wonder—by-the-by, what your name really is. Never mind about that. The fact is, I'm a man walking the edge of a precipice; over a scantling laid across an abyss. It is top to top, Peel, with the abyss. Hit the nail if it isn't fun alive, the whole thing. I always had a genius for fun—about the only thing I had. Mrs. Bowles thinks me crazy, at the University of Virginia, we fellows used to think we knew what fun was. I rather flatter myself I was a kind of ringleader. Smoking the Fresh; dev-iling the Sophs; putting pigs up the belfry; tick to the trap, so as to come at it all night, you observe; putting tubs of cold water over the tutors' doors, so as to benefit their debilitated systems with a bath. Then secretly dyeing the professors' dogs and horses a lovely crimson—things of that sort. But this is a joke ahead of them. I realize it. There is no danger, that is the spice of the whole thing."

"And you never were in Charleston?"

"Not before the war; often since—on business, you observe, confidential and excessively private. Carolina, with a plague on the heroics! Its hunting, shooting that I was fierce in it in my life. Thank you for your hints about Rutledge Bowles, only his mother gave me enough during the first five minutes. I was intimate with him, wasn't I? Splendid fellow, I have no doubt."

"His proud beauty of a sister was too much for you," hazards Dr. Peel.

"Glorious girl, isn't she?" broke in the Lieutenant, with enthusiasm. "And if there is not something, Sir, will astonish even you. That girl is Union, Sir—Union true blue—Stars and Stripes to the centre! You needn't whistle, Peel, ought to know the signs by this time. While you were telling the mother that preposterous story about your acquaintance with Jeff Davis, Secession, war for slavery, and all, in more than I can understand—blind feeling."

"Excuse me, Lieutenant Ravenel," says Peel, foul-breathed, roaring, drunken husband, who curses and beats her and the children. It is my husband, you see. The Federal Union—the Abolition lies just there," says Dr. Peel, with a sneer.

"Oh, as to that, it is amazing how many people I find of that way of thinking. One continues to know what their country is, cling to it, too, with all their souls. By Jove, Sir, I honor them," says the young officer, with a solemn mere than words can utter. They are the very best people, too, of the places where they live. I fall in love with them on the spot, no matter where they are females. I often meet with wrinkled, toothless old ladies. You see they know people can not sell them, and so they speak out as it is their heart's content. And they do. I have heard them abuse Secession even to my satisfaction. I can't say as much for the old fellows in my arms. Whenever I chance with Union people off by themselves you can not tell what a secret organization is a little more than the thing. I can't play upon them as a girl can on a piano; tell them tremendous tales of the excess of the Secession party, how no man, melancholy they get, their faces growing as long as your arm in spite of themselves. And so one year they will come up when I slip in a little good news the other way! They do not believe a word of it, of course; or pretend not to, with a melancholy way, their eyes sparkling. How they will rejoice when the old flag flies over them again, and all the Yankees! Why, Dr. Peel, they are as steel they are; but if one could only tell them how certain the thing is! However, we must be moving, it is late, and in the morning. People might get to find out of me you know. Lieutenant Ravenel, Confederate States service—good-by."

"Well, I am ready," said Dr. Peel, producing a package of papers from his bosom. "Not much interest to me in what we have entered to already. But, first, there's a receipt for that last thousand you brought; much obliged to Uncle Sam for remitting it in full, mine. Here's—let me see—ah, yes, a statement of the rebel forces and so forth in my district, present and prospective, Lieutenant—by-the-by, I call them they may rely on it; I got the statement from head-quarters myself. You do things your way, Lieutenant Ravenel, and I do things mine, if you fancy there is a genuine Southerner of higher standing than Dr. Peel in all this district you are much mistaken. Here's a private letter. Do me the favor to leave it at its address in New York. It is exchange on London for two thousand pounds in sterling, you see; they'll understand it. A good joke, since you like jokes so well, in connection. That represents a cotton-field, you observe the words in payment by the Confederacy for I have forgotten how many pounds of powder—"

"Pardon me," interrupts his guest, with a total change of manner. "Do I understand—"

"I am astonished at you, Fairfax. Don't you see that the article was manufactured for this express purpose? We found it would throw up the bills of the Confederacy, you know, figures. The standard in our service is rather over that, I think. You ought to have seen the proud satisfaction with which it was received. I volunteered to see to the stowing of it away. Necessary to take special precautions lest it should explode. Exploded! And there is not the Arsenal this instant, all ready in case of need."

"But," began the delighted Lieutenant, "how in the mischief—?"

"Oh, I have experiments plenty for Trial, Dupont's best. The Governor shook me by the hand warmly. 'Splendid article,' he said. 'You see I'm an old soldier myself, and know what is what.'

"We are under obligations to you, Doctor.' I rather think wooden nutmegs will cease to be quoted hereafter. The articles in the way of caps, arms, powder, clothing, every thing that Yankees in Havana, France, England, Belgium, have passed off for genuine cotton upon these poor devils is shameful. Not Yankees only. It does seem that the entire world has conspired with the leaders here South against the South. I am glad of it to my soul," adds Dr. Peel, with a savage oath. "That is what I like most in the thing—that the cool, deliberate, thorough suicide in it from the start. Burned towns, railways destroyed, wharves leveled, manufactories stripped bare, to say nothing of the killed and the orphans and widows. Cure on them!" continued Dr. Peel, with a torrent of curses that the soul is his bad eyes—"no man can hate them worse than I do, and even I am almost satisfied. And then all that is going on at the present time satisfied, almost beginning to pity—perhaps," he adds, with the expression of a devil.

"Hallo, I say, look here, man," says his companion, looking keenly at the speaker. "War is war, I know, and these people would force their heads in time, I reckon. But I don't believe in the way you look at it. Take care what you say. If we are whipping them a tough enough job they are giving us it, all our numbers and navy to boot. Besides, I am a South, ern man myself, every drop of my blood." And the gay young officer's manner changed to a sharp observer upon Dr. Peel. "Besides, you talk too loud. How do you know but there may be some one else listening? Not that I think so. But I don't know," added he, with a peculiar gesture of his right hand, and resuming his gay manner.

"Never fear, Lieutenant Ravenel. I'm too anxious to live if it is only to see the delicious ending. I have taken every precaution. Besides, I don't suppose that any one here could make the people here even doubt me. The credulity, the super-astounding gullibility of these people is one long treat. I have a love to work them up, and have them yell and brag and soar to heaven in glorification of the South. Such delicious fun, I can not tell you. Not, mind, ing into contempt, and so becoming cool again.

"However, business. There, that paper explains itself. I want that, as well as the rest of it, of that raid to be made into Tennessee. I think I have been tolerably accurate here-before. There is another package for Fairfax, to be sent even from you, Fairfax. Ah, that is a little petition of some friends about that Sergeant Dunn, Mr. Bowles's overseer, who would have heard of it—after getting himself scrubbed on the back some wa—something like it in one of the old stories of Babylon, I fancy—I'll say. His information gave us that delicious blunder of the rebels below Corinth. The Sergeant didn't like it, no. You'll find the address in his family there. Several ought really to do something whatever—I am sure I am willing to do mine. they'll smell out the cipher, and in that case good-by to the men. That would be a pity. Those papers are from a Secretary of State, three Superintendents of conscripts, several officers in actual service. It amazes me, Fairfax, and evidently—pardon me, I don't mean to offend. But the rottenness of this whole thing! Talk of Southern chivalry! If you only knew as well as I do the Southern character! Not a Secretary men—not civilians mind you, but the officers, the very chivalry itself, to make money! All that is a part of course of study. Fairfax, I did think there would be at least that difference. Why, Sir," adds Dr. Peel, with an oath, "there is not a single one of these people who did not resort to make a fortune out of this war."

"Laying up for exile and confiscation, man," says his companion, gayly. "Don't be severe. It depreciates they will be more desperate in the work than before."

"Not for the South justice," continues Dr. Peel, with something like a sneer, "even you have little idea how very many Union men there are in the South and as much as they are beginning to make a cent out of the war, dumb, dead weights upon the rebellion those of them that escape hanging for it. The Confederacy is collecting another paper from his package. "There," he adds, laying it upon the table, "read that, they're sometimes good for a laugh. Another large amount of stores destroyed is rather under than over the mark."

"Pooring mills, card factory burned; ten powder wagons blown up, two more upset in crossing the river—hum—hum; train of motor cars off from—ah, yes, I see. Why, Peel, you are the very—steamer Eliza burned; thousand stand of—six pieces small cannon, fifty rounds each powder—hum, hum; machinery of percussion cap—"

"That was really a shame," puts in the Doctor, with a delighted air of his suitable fine teeth.

"If you only knew the months of depositing, contriving before they could get the thing to work as they did at last all ready—I was really sorry for them, such a bitter disappointment. Reminds me of a little thing I did a little worth pointing out. I was on a visit over the Potomac—a distinguished visitor, you observe. The Colonel insisted on my taking a wee the whole establishment. In one room they had an iron trough filled with the detonating mixture for caps. Very much interested I was, as much so as to visit the room again next day; had a handkerchief full of lime under my cloak, and—if those caps exploded I'm mistaken."

"Destruction of the Arsenal at Jackson!" says the young officer, glancing over another paper handed in his hands. "Splendid, Peel."

"Certainly," says Dr. Peel, with an effort at seriousness. "The women and children I regret as much as any man. I am sorry for them, and they would have it. You observe, there is no neighborhood in all the South in which one can not find plenty of hands. The blacks are too dull often, but the mulattoes are smart enough. Bless your soul, you don't suppose I do my work with my own hands? No, Sir, not if I can help it; besides, what is the use when I have so many ready for any hint from me. You could not do my work; it requires a peculiar gift. In one month I could lay almost every town in my district in ashes if I only gave the word. They are sometimes very often hung; yet they never divulge any thing—at least, never any thing to hurt. Miserable animals they are, of course," adds the speaker in peculiar tones. "Mere monkeys, apes, gorillas, but as mischievous as monkeys. They can not plan, have no idea of combination, yet they can do what is planned for them. They are called 'hands,' you know. And then they have such an innocent, ignorant, stupid look with it all."

"I am sick of the whole thing—sick, sick," says his companion, with ill-concealed loathing for his friend, and resting his face, covered with his hands, upon the edge of the table.

"How you reason!" said Dr. Peel, looking above the Lieutenant, bold and bad as Lucifer. "Forty odd blown up at Jackson. Why, Fairfax, those people will already—a moment's cool reflection, mind—had already made cartridges enough to have killed many thousand times that number of our men, and were hard at it still.

"How do we know, at last, but you are humbugging us?" says the Lieutenant, glad of some mode of showing his aversion, rather to be heard, and looking his companion defiantly in the face. "Who knows but you take the credit of mere accidents?"

"That is for your superiors to decide, Sir," replies Dr. Peel, even haughtily. "They have had no occasion to doubt me so far."

"Oh, well, it is none of my business," said his companion, hastily, drawing his cap down over his forehead. "Let us get through it."

"Well," he adds, when Dr. Peel has handed in, without further conversation, his last report, "it is a disagreeable business. I'd rather take it out in open field. Yet few men in the field are as useful as I am—and so you are," he adds, with some humor. "Certainly more liable to danger."

There is a long silence, during which Dr. Peel, business over, is refreshing himself with a cigar, as he sits at ease in his superb dressing-gown, rocking himself in the best rocking-chair in Staples's Hall affords. The Lieutenant, meanwhile, is securing the papers about his person.

"Being a Yankee," he begins, at last, as impelled into conversation by some new motive,

"I beg your pardon. Figuratively a Yankee, you mean. You are a Virginian, you know," interrupted Dr. Peel, holding his cigar in his jewelled hand, and emitting a long puff of smoke from his lips.

"There is nothing very wonderful in your knowing that," replies the other. "Others besides yourself have me inside our lines. No, what I was about saying is this: being a curious sort of man, I will be glad if you will tell me exactly what property you to your wife's credit will add wonderful—zeal and energy. I don't think I am an idle man in the cause, but you leave me far behind, Sir."

"I have no objection to tell you," is the reply, "provided you will tell me why you are so active. I want you to be complimentary."

"Soon told," answers the young officer, who has entirely resumed his light and dashing manner. "I am a Southern Union man. I am more intenser Union than any of those Yankees North can be if they tried, because it is my native South which I love, and long to rid of the clutch of Secession and—I wouldn't have said it three years ago, I do say it now—slavery. I got my devotion to the Union from father and mother; had it deepened by the stand I took for it at the University; since the war began it has become my very life. The assassination of one of my dearest friends by the rebels, the death of my old father, and the destruction of the old place at the same time, have helped matters; and I have an old mother—as splendid a specimen of a Virginia lady as ever lived—living at Fredericksburg, with her hand on my head and blesses me in my work whenever I see her. Martha Washington, Sir, over again," adds the officer, with emotion. "Precious little I care for old Lincoln. In fact, I've had more cold water thrown on me at Washington than ever I got from the rebels in the rescue of the South from that wretched old Repudiator and his gang, and their abominable delusions and slavery. But I fight for ——. You know all about the Crusaders and the war for the Holy Land."

"But why engage in this particular sort of service?"

"It just happened so: At the opening of the war a particular piece of information had to be obtained from within the rebel lines for a very special reason. No one would go and get it; so I had to do it. It became a habit, the excitement of the thing, the success, a little praise from head-quarters, and all. And I always had a taste for masquerading, from my Joke's sake. Why, Sir, I've passed any number of times for Davis's nephew; once or twice as his son-in-law; once with that, as I do not know whether the old scoundrel has any son; but every man has nephews, you know. There is hardly a prominent officer in the rebel service whose near relative I-have not been somewhere in my travels. I am a native of every State of the South, barring, at some time or other, from almost every leading town in every State South. I have filled almost every minor office under the Confederate Government; been in every city without exception. Masquerading! Why, Sir, I've passed half a dozen times as a lively girl driven from my home in Maryland, Kentucky, Nashville. I have been the belle of balls in Richmond and Charleston! You would have died of laughing to see me managing my crinoline and tossing my curls! By Jove, I can handle a fan and a parasol so well, at times I almost get to believe I am a woman, and not so ugly a one either! I have had love made to me by any number of military men; have been so enthusiastic for the cause; have had so many charming little ways—'Now, do tell me, General!'—'Please, Colonel, how many men have you got here?' or any thing else I want, from any information than I should forge for. But I've no time to talk. Isn't that the morning breaking?"

And the young officer rose from his chair, washed his face at Dr. Peel's wash-stand, combed his hair before the glass, and remained about the room as fresh as if he had just risen from a full night's sleep.

"Good-by," he added, at last, consulting his watch, "and the stage hears at half past. Have up that breakfast, Doctor, you ghoul. I have a tremendous appetite. There is a sort of haunt-scarumness; a dashing mixture of Achilles and—by the by, I must look after my wardrobe a masquerade! I never thought of it before! Months, you remember, in disguise at the court of Queen Victoria—and what am I in that the stage coming up the street? And I had almost forgot. What is your motive?" said the Lieutenant, making a movement of his head, snapping together the lids of his valise, putting on his cap. "I'm all ready to be off—what is it?"

"None of the motives you speak of," said Dr. Peel, grim and sullen, behind the coffee-pot. "I don't understand you—by-the-by, in any of life; some other reasons, perhaps. But the chief reason," he added, suddenly, "is hate."

"Oh, pleasure, pleasure," he cried; 'them fellars ain't thar; true's death, Sir, they's not thar.'

"And I'm agwine to bang your dad, buh," added Jim Bludso, in imitation of what the boy had said; 'and, likewise, I'll be obleeged to give you the goldarnest whaling you ever heard tell on all six quarters of the sun.'

"Oh, please don't, Sir!' cried the little fellow again—he was thoroughly frightened now—'the people won't like it.'

"How do you know?' asked Bill.

"I knows they ain't,' replied the boy.

Bill seized him by the collar and spoke fiercely.

"Now, boy, I'm bang you and your dad, and home and house in ten minutes, if you don't tell me what them fellers is hid!'

"Oh, please, Sir, I'm afraid,' said the boy.

"Don't be afraid, but tell me what they's thar? harm you; nobody sha'n't harm you but me; and, by hockey, I'll pull your gizzard out and hang you on a nail in the barn if you don't tell right off what they're hid!'

The boy was now completely cowed.

"Well, Sir,' he said, 'they's hid under our house. They's dug a hole in the ground right below the middle of the parlor. You can't see it when you look in that hole in the bankin', bekase they jotted all the dirt away, and you see it's too dark to notice the dirt in the cellar.'

"All right, buh,' said Bill, 'you'll be a man before your mother if you keep your eye peeled! We won't keep you.'

"Oh, please, Sir,' cried the boy, 'don't burn down our house; we's Union folks!'

"In what?' said Bill, with a grin.

"I don't know nothin' about any direction,' said the boy, with a puzzled look.

"Oh, you do,' continued Bill, 'well, ye oughter. You oughter say you're Union—

he sang.

Bill rushed out, and told one of the soldiers to stand with his revolver cocked at the hole in the banking, and to shoot down the first man that tried to escape through it.

Then he went into the house and asked for an axe.

"What in the world do you want with an axe?' the old woman inquired, with an anxious glance at his face.

"Axe me no questions and I'll tell ye no lies,' said Bill; 'but, unless ye want this house burned over your head, you'll keep in less than two-and-a-half.'

The woman saw that Bill was in no mood to be trifled with, and went and got the axe without any more ado.

Bill then turned to the three soldiers who had followed him into the house and told them to draw their revolvers and be ready to shoot. They did so.

Without a word Bill seized the carpet at the edges and tore it up.

The women screamed.

"Lord a mercy!' shouted the old woman, 'what on airth are ye spilling my carpet for? The man and all on us is Union, and her sellers tin!'

"Pon my word and honor,' added one of the daughters, 'that ain't near rob hid in our house.'

"We don't know nary thing about ary reb,' said another young woman.

"They all make a fuss and hollered, but Bill took no more notice of them than if they had been a parcel of hogs. He tore every bit of the carpet from the floor.

"As soon as he had done it he took the axe, and with one blow broke through the thin floor.

"Be ready, boys!' he said.

"The woman were crying and screaming and talking Union all the time.

"One or two blows made quite a large opening, and with a single jerk Bill tore up the flooring.

"What do you suppose we saw?

"Down in the hole, the cellar, beneath in dirty honesspen, huddled together at the bottom of a wide hole that they had dug beneath the house.

"There was a powerful fellow. He seized one of the rebels by the nape of the neck, and not only pulled him out, but pitched him to the farther corner of the cellar. One by one of boys instantly covered him with his pistol.

"Without waiting to rest, Bill served the two others in the same way.

"You ought to have seen him as he turned to the women:

"'Well, old Sixpence, you're Union, you ar? an' the ole man? and allers her bin? And you never seed no reb, you never did, Miss Bess? Nor you neither, on your word and honor, Miss Secesh?'

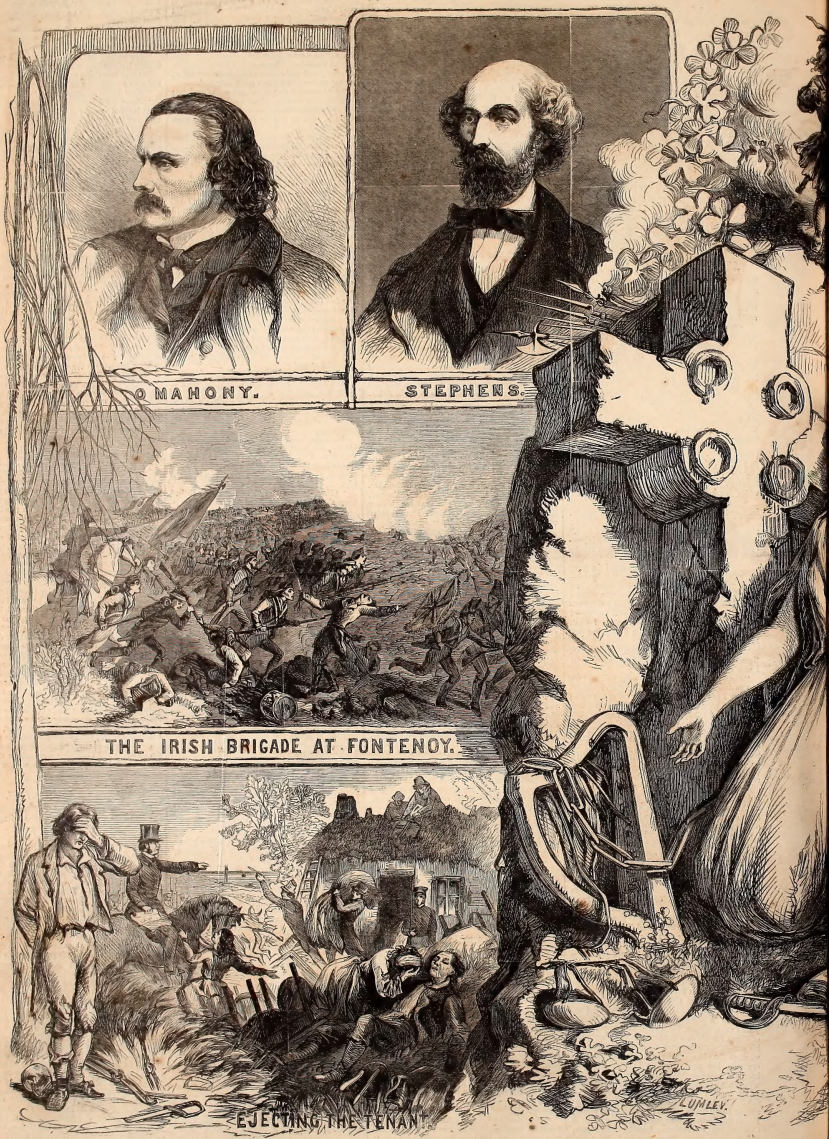
"They hung down their heads, blushed up to the eyes, and left the room without saying a word.

"We disarmed the rebels and led them to the General. But it was hard work, I can tell you, for our men so exasperated. They wanted to lynch these assassins. If our wounded man had died I don't believe the General could have held them back.

"Next day we had orders to return to Harper's Ferry. The rebels were hoisted to the boys' own saddles, and forced to ride all day and all day long on foot. Their shoes were taken from them, and they had a hard road to travel, I believe, 'that day. They were, of course, summarily executed on them for the attempted assassination of our men.

"This," added the Surgeon, "was in the days when we were not making peace prisoners, or would not have done then to have hanged these wretches. It might have exasperated the South, you know. As it is, all we did to them was to force them for one day to keep step to the music of the Union cavalry's hoofs."

THE NEW DICTATOR OF PERU.



THE revolution which has recently been consummated in the republic of Peru, originating, as it seems, in a feeling of dissatisfaction among the soldiery at the appointment of the senior colonel as the behavior of President PEZET's Government in submitting to the insolent demands of Spain last year, has resulted in the establishment of a dictatorship in the hands of the new President, General PRADO, who was proclaimed at a meeting in the Plaza of Lima on the 30th of November. The Peruvians seem to feel the necessity of immediate and vigorous measures, as the only means of maintaining the nationality intact and saving the country from further financial difficulties. The new President promises well. There has been a thorough investigation into the public accounts, and a system of taxation is shortly to be established, in order to make up the deficiency and to prevent an entire dependence upon the transient revenues of the guano trade. A general abolition of all privileges and pecuniary grants unlawfully accorded by former governments has been decreed, and many other reforms. Several brave officers and all unnecessary offices have been suppressed. A central court of justice has been appointed for the speedy trial and punishment of all persons belonging to the public service who may be guilty of malversation, dishonesty in the discharge of their duties, or other crimes. Further, public schools have been decreed for the diffusion of education among the poorer classes. These measures are all in the right direction, and indicate that the Government is in earnest for the welfare of the country.

VIEWS IN LIMA, PERU.

WE give our readers on page 196 a portrait of the new Dictator of Peru; and three interesting Views of Lima, the capital of that country.

Lima—in accordance with the old custom which required that great cities should be built at some distance from the sea-coast—is built on a plain three out of the reach of piratical invasion—is situated about two leagues from the city of Callao, on the banks of the Rimac. The site of the city was chosen by PIZARRO, in 1535. In half a century the city is said to have contained 50,000 souls. But what a decline since then! In 1836 the population was only 54,000. The view of Lima, as one approaches it from the distance, is very magnificent: but the entrance of the city does not justify the anticipations aroused by a more remote observation. Owing to the frequent shocks of earthquake the houses are rarely very high, though, as will appear from our illustrations, there are marked exceptions to this custom of building houses only one or two stories in height. On an average there are about forty-five earthquakes per year in Lima. About once in half a century these shocks are extremely violent and ruinous. In this way the whole city has several times been reduced to a heap of ruins. The most destructive of these occurred in 1746. A little more than an hour before midnight the earth began its tremblings, and in three minutes the city lay in ruins. Of more than 3000 houses only 21 escaped entire. The towers of the cathedral were overthrown. The bridge across the Rimac, with its refluent wave buried Callao and its 5000 inhabitants in an utter and everlasting silence, leaving no vestige of the wreck within half an hour.

HELEN GREY.

BECAUSE one loves you, Helen Grey,
Is that a reason you should pout,
And like a March wind veer about,
And frown, and say your shrewish say?
Don't strain the cord until it snaps,
Don't split the sound heart with your wedge,
Don't cut your fingers with the edge
Of your keen wit; you may, perhaps.

Because you're handsome, Helen Grey,
Is that a reason to be proud?
Your eyes are dark, your laugh is loud,
Your step is mincing on their way:
But so you miss that modest charm
Which is the surest charm of all:
Take heed, or yet may trip and fall,
And no man care to stretch his arm.

Stoop from your cold height, Helen Grey,
Come down, and take a lowlier place,
Come down, to fill it now with grace;
Come down, and your profession some day:
For years can not be kept at bay.

And fading years will make you old;
Then in their train will men seem aged,
When you yourself are nipped and gray.

LA SONNAMBULA.

THE country between St. Nazaire and Vannes is neither beautiful nor interesting. Sombre forests of fir, stretching over mile after mile of undulating plain, and relieved only by the appearance of a peasant's cottage or the mansion of a Breton noble, oppress the eye and fatigue the mind to such a degree that the wearied traveler is fain to turn his attention to the inside of the carriage, should he be unlucky enough to journey by the jog-trot railway that runs through this desert. There is not even excitement at the stations—in fact, excitement of any sort is forbidden by the paternal Government of France. It is unhealthy—it disturbs the mental equilibrium of the people; wherefore the utmost regularity of time and action is preserved by a discreet system of national education, which is just as visible at railway stations as elsewhere. You are not allowed, for instance, to walk up and down the platform—the impatience and suspense might produce agitation: you are therefore cooped up in an apartment as small as to the class whereby you travel; the train is placed so that its first-class, second-class, and third-class carriages are directly opposite these waiting apartments, and at a given moment the doors are opened and you are propelled into your proper place in the train, under the superintendence of the employés-de-ville. So that in traveling through the country there is not even variety met with at these halting-places. You glide into the station, and, suddenly the doors are thrown open, in scramble a few Breton peasants, and away you go again through the interminable forests of fir.

For fellow-travelers I had a lady and gentleman of respectable appearance, the latter might be about thirty-five; the former was good-looking, which ought to obviate all speculations as to years. They were not married, for he seemed particularly courteous and attentive to her; they were not brother and sister, for they were utterly unlike each other, concluded I was to be simply friends, or perhaps prospective husband and wife. The gentleman was somewhat reserved; answered her inquiries kindly but curtly; and seemed more amused than interested by her remarks. But how shall I describe the admirable manner—the ever-varying beauty, the brilliant, witty, bashful, and simple conversation of his younger friend? The artless grace of her every movement was pretty and perplexing as the motions of a kitten; she was constantly changing in her look, in her mood, even in the attitudes she formed; and the occasional observations there were such subtle drolleries, such unconscious shrewdness and humor, that the longer you listened the more you were charmed.

She dropped her glove.

I picked it up; and this little circumstance made us friends. I can not use words of thanks as pro-ceeded to remark upon the weather, then upon the country, upon the Breton populace, upon the French, upon the English, and their barbarous customs. She was indescribably engaging; she laughed and chatted, grew serious, and abruptly darted again into comedy; teased her companion for his accurate and reticent smiles; and gave herself such pretty airs and graces that one could have fancied her a child of thirteen. She asked me if I had seen "La Dame" when in Paris; if I had read the last new novel burlesquing the English; then hummed an air from the last piece of the Journal du Dimanche, a very un-Sunday-like magazine which she held in her hand.

"What I reverence in you English is your power, your grandeur, your great wealth. You are all rich—all wealthy, are you not?"

Despite the charming simplicity with which the question was asked, I was obliged, in reply, to suggest that I was not. I knew of one or two people who might be richer, with no great detriment to themselves.

"Why, you carry fortunes on your fingers, in your watch-pockets, in your purses. Will Monsieur think me rude if I ask to see his ring?"

At once the trinket was in her possession, and with quite an infantine curiosity did she examine it. She then passed it to her companion, whose attention had already been fixed upon it while it was yet on my finger.

"You will think us monsters of rudeness, Monsieur," said he; "but English workmanship is quite a novelty to us. The quaint figuring around the stone, for example, is purely northern. I presume Monsieur has also an English watch?"

"Of the eighteenth century," said I; "an heirloom in our family."

"What a treasure!" he replied, with more vivacity than he had hitherto revealed. "Would Monsieur hazy the goodness—?"

They were no less delighted with the watch, and insisted on my opening it to show its internal construction and the jewels which it contained. The back of the watch was also admired, with its quaint carving, and likewise its precious stones which were more readily visible than those inside. The gentleman leaned back in his seat, as though somewhat ashamed of having exhibited his curiosity, while the young lady remained as lively as ever, and continued her conversation during the rest of the journey.

Toward evening we entered the town of Vannes, the capital of the department of Morbihan. I pitched my traveling-case into the first omnibus that presented itself, which happened to be that belonging to the "Hôtel de la Croix Verte." My fellow-traveling lady friend was also about to enter the same vehicle, when her companion made a slight gesture of dissent.

"Which hotel?" he inquired of the conductor.

"Hôtel de Dauphin, Monsieur."

He remained a moment in thought.

"There is the 'Hôtel de la Croix Verte,'" he remarked to his companion, "and the 'Hôtel de France.'"

"Le voici—par ici, Monsieur?" cried another conductor, with an expressive motion of the hand and courteous inclination of the head.

The lady terminated the little debate by a slight shrug of her shoulders at her companion's hesitation, then, giving the conductor a very small quantity of luggage, stepped into the omnibus, and we all three drove off to the Hôtel du Dauphin. They had taken apartments, and I was shown to the table-d'hôte was fixed for half past five, we took advantage of the intervening hour to ramble through the quaint old streets of the town, and admire its extraordinary domestic architecture.

All this time I had been unable to discover the names of my companions, as the only called him Louis; he addressed her sometimes as Denise—oftener as Mademoiselle. In our acquaintance had begun without the usual English preliminaries of formal introduction or card-presenting: they were no wiser as regarded myself. We strolled, then, arm in arm on the most amicable terms, and our walk through the town was rendered doubly agreeable by the equal observation with which we exerted every fresh object of interest.

And of these there were plenty. The uneven, narrow, antiquated streets, the full of wood-built, ponderous, picturesque beauty. The projecting secondstories of the houses, adorned with grotesque sculpture carving of the beams, the quaint roofs, and the open casements of green glass crossed into diamond panes, the ancient walls of the town, the grass-covered foss of the old fortifications, the reversible and stately proportions of the cathedral, altogether presented an admirable picture of a feudal town of the Middle Ages, and we were delighted at the introduction of a few long-haired, sallow-featured, and strangely-dressed peasants to add to it a thorough Breton character. Mademoiselle Denise was enraptured with these quaint characteristics of a former age. She seemed to have little acquaintance with the manners or appearance of the Bretons: every fresh object was matter for fresh wonder, and our walk was indescribably delightful.

She was no less agreeable when we returned to dine. She was the only lady present at the table-d'hôte; but she conversed freely, even when the subject of our talk became personal. In fact, at one point, she led the conversation to that which had begun our acquaintance—the watch. She watched, and, in her laughing way, said that if the gentleman who were present would produce their watches, there would be two of them be found precisely to agree.

"And a gentleman always prides himself upon the correctness of his watch," she added, with a playful irony.

"Ah, Mademoiselle," said one gentleman, "you compel me to a confession. My friend's watch is precisely the same as my own."

Her companion laughed; but she insisted that he was right, and refused to believe it, until the gentleman politely handed her both watches.

"There is one second of difference, Monsieur; I swear it!" she cried, with the greatest glee; "and I am right after all."

"You are rude, Denise," said her friend; "let me return these gentlemen their watches."

"He spoils me, Monsieur," she said to me, "and then reproaches me. Is he not cruel, then—a savage, Monsieur, therefore, beware of the glaces!"

The glaring savage was at that moment engaged in drying his mustache after having taken a draught of en route, and was therefore in action nor in manner did he seem very terrible.

After dinner, having some letters to write to England, I bade my new friends adieu, and went up to my own room—not, however, until Mademoiselle Denise had been most particular in arranging for the following day an excursion to the Gulph of Succino and to Sarzeau, the birth-place of the author of "Gil Blas." Considerably before midnight I was fast asleep, and dreaming of the coverlet and large cushion which form the upper clothing of a Breton bed.

It could have been but a short time thereafter that I was awakened by a slight noise—so very slight, in fact, that it still remains a mystery to me how I should have heard it. With half-opened eyes I found the room pervaded by bright moonlight, which, streaming in through the casement, and drawing shadows of the bars on the carpet. I was about to close my eyes again, and address myself to sleep, when my attention was arrested by the evident movement of the door, which stood on the right of the bed. It was certainly no miracle that it should open—for I knew both bedroom doors or shutters even when traveling—nor that it should be opened at that time of night was certainly surprising.

Gradually I perceived the distance between the door and the wall increase; and judge of my astonishment when I distinctly observed a white figure appear—the figure of a woman that slowly entered, without seeming even to look at me. I need not pretend to say I was not frightened; the lonely hour, the stillness of the house, the moonlight falling through the window, combined to make this vision a horror which chilled the blood in my veins and made my hair almost bear up. But now, thoroughly awakened by the apparition, I shook aside the vague impressions produced on the mind when in a state somewhere between slumber and as I sought with a severe scrutiny to fix my eyes upon the face of this woman I recognized, beyond the shadow of a doubt, the features of Mademoiselle Denise.

Judge of my astonishment when I made the discovery! And there could be no mistake about it. As the turned her face to the moonlight the clear definition of her outline was sufficient proof, had proof been necessary. Her eyes were the same firefly-cut lips, the straight nose, the high but narrow forehead, even the dark gray eyes, which had grown familiar to me during my acquaintanceship of the previous dozen hours. She was dressed in white, as I said; but this loose outer garment seemed only to reveal more distinctly the outline of the form, which I had thought her dressed as usual, with the addition of this loose white robe. Her feet, as was evident when she walked, were bare, and long fair hair hung down behind until it almost reached her waist. Perhaps it was the striking resemblance which this vision bore to the name ("La Somnambula" that first suggested to me a solution of this seemingly inexplicable mystery; and as I further watched the movements and the countenance of the apparition of my supposition. She was either an habitual somnambulist, or had been attacked by a sudden fit of sleep-walking. At first I became ashamed of the fact the greater became my desire to avert the awkwardness and unpleasantness of her being discovered in such a situation; but calming my fears and the chances of the matter in my mind I came to the resolution of allowing her to do as she pleased, and to watch her closely for a few minutes more, in her own room, and the whole affair remain unknown to every one but myself.

She had not yet observe her eyes were open; and on her first entrance into the room she had fixed them upon me with a cold, glassy stare, attributable to her unconsciousness. In the pale, dim moonlight this mechanical fixture of the eyes was exceedingly unpleasant; but I strove to look upon it simply as the result of a physical movement. Slowly, noiselessly, she then stepped past the edge of the bed, and approached the small mahogany-table which stood at the window. Her back was thus turned toward me; and it was only at intervals that I could catch any motion, which I seemed to be examining the various articles which were scattered about the table or hanging from the toilet mirror—principally. I heard her repeat, in a low, clear voice, some lines from the Prayer-book which the good landlord had left in the room. She replaced these articles, and I heard her repeat the invocations among the other articles lying about. She took a long blue scarf, which I had hung over the mirror, and, folding it round her head in the form of a turban, stood to contemplate in the glass the picture she represented. Any thing more singular than this spectacle could not be conceived. The moonlight leil a pallor to her face, which otherwise her healthy complexion would scarcely have presented; and the fixedness of whiteness, coupled with the long white garment she wore, looked almost hideous as contrasted with the bold blue crown which she had assumed. Preparatory, however, to placing the turban on her head, I observed her withdraw from its folds a canoe pin, which I had negligently left therein, and, as I supposed, place it on the table.

Still retaining the novel head-dress she had so impressively assumed, she seemed to take an inventory of my jewelry, which was likewise placed in front of the mirror. My watch, which hung from one of the branches, I saw her take from the glass, she detached and held to her ear, with the manner of a child.

"Chick! chick!" I heard her murmur; "mon Dieu, quelle vitesse!"

I recognized this exclamation the same astonishment which had characterized her conversation during the day, and was reminded of the school-boy who boasted to his playmate that "he had got such a splendid watch! such a magnificent watch! it would wager it would go faster than any watch, clock, or timepiece in the world!"

Mademoiselle Denise seemed in no hurry to depart, and my suppose was momentarily becoming greater. The consequences might be of her suddenly awaking from this physical stupor I dared not imagine. I had heard of cases in which the somnambulist had been roused by conscience only to fall dead on the spot. And there were many reasons why this strange affair should not be known to the world at the moment—which consequent upon her being told of it, would, I knew, be inexpressible.

In a few minutes, however, I was greatly relieved by observing her unwind from her head my scarf, which she hung over the mirror in the same position she had found it. She seemed to bestow a little attention in arranging the objects on the table —probably prompted by that dim consciousness which haunts us sometimes even in dreams. She appeared to be desirous of leaving every thing in the order—or in the disorder—in which it had been on her entrance. She then turned, still with the same vacant, expressionless stare. She opened the door, disappeared with noiseless steps, and I was left to my own reflections.

I can scarcely tell what prompted me to get up; but no sooner had she gone than I stepped out of bed, and went to the door which led so interested Mademoiselle Denise. Here I made a discovery which first startled me, and then amused me. My watch had been placed, likewise my chain, canopy, sleeve-links, and a ring set with pearls and diamonds, the gift of my mother. I was somewhat alarmed, but a moment's reflection showed me how unjust my first thought had been. Moved by some incomprehensible whim, the unconscious somnambulist had carried with her these trinkets, as a child lifts whatever gay bauble presents itself to its fingers; and I felt assured that when Mademoiselle Denise awoke in the morning and found herself possessed of such strange treasures, her surprise would only be equated by her desire to restore them to the rightful owner. Probably, I thought, it is an habitual sleep-walker; and knowing her infirmity, will perceive at once how the jewelry came into her possession, upon which she will, of course, make instant inquiry to insure its restoration. Even in this strange circumstance there was revealed one of the principles which are supposed to govern these fits of aberration. Somnambulists generally are interested in those objects which are familiar to them in daytime; and reflecting on the particular interest which Mademoiselle Denise had taken in my watch when it was shown to her, I could not wonder that she should make it the subject of her regard when a peculiar fatality had drawn her toward my room. I returned to bed and slept soundly through the night.

Next morning I rose at eight, dressed, went down stairs and had the customary bowl of café au lait served in the breakfast-room; but though I waited and read the newspaper for a considerable time, neither Mademoiselle nor her companion came into the room.

I rang the bell, and inquired of the waiter at what hour they breakfasted.

"The table-d'hôte, Monsieur?"

"Yes."

"At eleven o'clock, Monsieur."

"I shall return then."

"Thanks, Monsieur."

Feeling that my ring my two friends at breakfast, I resolved to spend the intervening time in exploring those portions of the town which I had not visited. The morning was very beautiful for the time of year (October), and though the cropped and regular rows of lime-trees in the central square had begun to look very worn them, there were fortunate neighbors on the banks of the canal-like inlet which leads down to the Gulf of Morbihan were green and luxuriant in the bright sunshine. This new portion of the place I had not previously seen; and the old gateway of the massive wall, the clustering barges, the groups of women selling vegetables, the sailors lounging about the quays, were eminently picturesque. I entered every recess, I explored a large wooden saint, brightly painted, whose glaring white eyeballs and strongly-marked eyelashes produced a strong feeling of mingled admiration and horror. The artist who produced this work was, perhaps, influenced by the thought that those people who were to look upon it for the first time would be moved by terror; although the rest of the holy man's countenance was exceedingly insipid and commonplace.

At the appointed hour I returned to the hotel, and walked into the long apartment where I expected to find my companions assembled at their breakfast. But, in place of the calm propriety and graceful decorum of such a ceremony, I found the wildest confusion and consternation. There were a dozen people in the room, all talking at once; while loudest of all rose the voice of the landlord, who seemed to be overwhelmed with despair. No sooner did he observe my entrance than he sprang rather than came, and in an eager voice, which seemed paralyzed by reason of its very eagerness, he exclaimed,

"Ah, Monsieur!"

"Well, what is the matter?" said I.

"Ah, Monsieur!" he again cried, overcome by his emotion.

"What is it? What has happened?"

"I am ruined, Monsieur; I am ruined! I am thrown down, I am trampled upon, I am debased!"

I suggested to M. Dufoit that his explanation, so far from relieving him from the reverse, would but I should have to apply to some of the other gentlemen for an explanation.

"Mon ami, Monsieur—c'est moi, moi—voici le malheureux sujet qui parle!"

But during these few seconds I had caught a few of the expressions which were being rapidly interchanged by the others.

"She seemed so innocent, so sagesse!" said one.

"And I am much never have spoken of it," said another, "but for M. Dufoit discovering the loss of his plate."

"How incomparably cunning!"

"How miraculously skilful!"

"And by this time they may be any where—they were seen on the way by the first train in the morning."

"Of whom do they speak?" said I to the landlord, with a sudden alarm.

"Of the gentleman, Monsieur, who came yesterday evening, and of Mademoiselle his friend. Ah, Monsieur, I am ruined—ruined—the best hotel in Vannes. That any one should be robbed in my house!"

"Robbed—what do you mean?"

"Last night, Monsieur, Mademoiselle went into the gentleman's room, and, her base, she eyes fixed, the first one she. She appears to sleep. Monsieur he remains still and will not kill her with affright; she has his watch, Monsieur—the watch she demanded to see last night at table. He observes not this—he falls asleep—this morning he misses every thing they have fled, Monsieur!"

"Who is the gentleman who has thus been robbed?"

"I, Monsieur," replied one of their number, stepping forward with a slight smile which was very apparently forced.

"I, Louis," said, "I said, endeavoring to look quite as unconcerned, "have the honor to be your fellow-sufferer."

"Yes, Monsieur!" cried they all, having never imagined that besides the unlucky traveler and the landlord there was still another victim.

"Mademoiselle also carries off my watch, chain, ring, and some other little matters! But what would you have? Mademoiselle is pleased, and we are too gallant to refuse her any enjoyment."

"Mon Dieu, what courage! This Englishman is, without doubt, French, that he can smile in misfortune."

"The wisest thing possible," said another, with a shrug, "for Mademoiselle and her friend have had excellent places, and by this time will be beyond all pursuit."

"With you, babe," groaned the poor landlord, "and with the boner of my hotel! Monsieur, am I not a poor miserable?"

Certainly the hotel looked sufficiently unhappy; nevertheless he at once prepared to rush to the Prefet, and this occupation relieved his mind. For myself, I resigned myself to fate over a French breakfast; judging that I should hear but little further from Mademoiselle Denise or her friend Louis. My judgment was correct; in spite of the utmost official vigilance, nothing more was heard of the charming creature who thus wrecked them in a painful habit which was even more awkward to others than to herself.

THE GHOST ON THE RIVER.

I HAVE just risen from a bed of sickness, and I take up my pen, as soon as I am able to hold it, to commit to writing the events of one afternoon, while they are still vividly impressed on my mind. Not that I think they will ever fade from my memory; but it is a relief to me to tell my story. I will tell it simply as it occurred to me, without comment; that I leave to those who may chance to read what I have written. And now I will begin what comment could I make? What occurred is still to my mind unexplained—incapable of explanation. I have thought over it till my brain has caught eagerly at what I fondly hoped was a clew, but before I could follow it, it has broken and left me as last as ever. I have tried to doubt and to reason my impressions, to persuade myself that I was the victim of some delusion. But as far as I can trust to my senses what I saw, felt, and heard was real as—real to me, though conceived by a mysterious influence from some of those around me, and to others only spectral revealed.

"Chelsea, and all the piers up!" bawled the old man at the Temple Pier, as a steamer came up to the landing-stage.

"At last!" exclaimed indignantly a voice near me. "I've been waiting for twenty minutes!"

"I don't expect always to be 'up to time first,' said the old man, sarcastically; adding, as a vent for his feelings, "Temple Bar, Chelsea, and all the piers! Stand back, ladies, stand back! The passengers is first first, if you please!" he went on, as a lady in black passed him, and tried to get on board.

I was taking close to this lady, and I walked down Essex Street before me, and had passed the little hut where the man who gives the tickets sits, without stopping.

"Take your ticket here, ma'am. Hi! hi!" called the man, thrusting himself into the doorway in front of his face, and trying to attract the attention of the lady who had passed. But she walked quietly on, and seemed not to hear him.

"Pimlico," said, putting twopence on the sill.

"Would you tell that lady in black to come back and take her ticket?"

I promised I would do so, and followed the lady to the landing-stage. I found her seated on the bench at the foot of the steps, her eyes fixed on the river, and her hands clasped. Her dress, a black merino, fitted her slight and singularly graceful figure to perfection. Her veil was up, and her face, which was rather pale, wore an expression of melancholy, which, in my eyes at least, did not detract from its positive beauty. I went up to her.

"I was asked to remind you," I said, "that you have neglected to take a ticket."

"You are mistaken," she said, somewhat coldly, "I have one."

"Then I must apologize for troubling you," I replied, bowing; "but it is not my business, and you, I hope, will absolve me from all intention of rudeness?"

She bowed stiffly and said, "Certainly, we will say no more about it."

Her eyes fell again on the river, as it swirled and foamed past the piles of the next embankment. I followed them. They were fixed on a piece of paper, which danced and tumbled on the muddy water. She stared after it till it was quite out of sight. I remained still standing by her side; there was a strange fascination in her face and manner.

"Do you know what time it is?" she asked, turning to me. I was surprised at her addressing me of her own accord, after the cold manner in which she had repelled my previous attempts at explanation. I told her it was five-and-twenty minutes past three.

"Then I have five minutes to wait. The Chelsea boat will reach this pier at half past three."

"You seem to be accurately informed," I said.

"Nine years ago," she said, in a weary voice, "the Chelsea boat passed this pier at that time."

"That's a long time to remember," I said, laughing.

She turned and laid her soft white hand upon my arm, as if to impress her words on me. "This very day, nine years ago, I left this pier by the boat which started at half past three."

"Nine years ago," I said, "you must have been a child."

She shook her head. "I was a woman, with a woman's thoughts, and more than a woman's trouble." Her cheeks were flushed, and her hands clenched tightly together. There was something very strange about her.

"Yes," she went on, excitedly, "we were together, I and he. He who was more than a husband to me—and less," she added, in a lower tone, glancing at her ungloved hand. There was no ring. She spoke more wildly now, and her voice was broken. He had spoken words to me, such as I had never heard before, such as I could not hear. And I stood here under the bright heaven, with the merry earth all about me, and the golden river glistening in the afternoon sun, and one heart beating near me, which loved me more than all the world besides. She caught hold of my arm and clutched it. I had shrunk from her—the woman was mad. "I cursed her," she continued, in a calmer tone, "and vowed a wicked vow: that I should shut myself out from the bright heaven and the merry earth, and wall in my own heart with the love I had given more than all the world. I went and leaned on the bulwarks, and looked over into the water; he came and spoke to me, but my heart was hard, and I would not hear him. I shuddered as we passed under Westminster Bridge, for it is cold and dark there like the grave. But we left it behind, and out again into the bright sunlight, I jumped on to the bulwarks, and plunged into the river. I heard his cry of agony as I fell, and he jumped in after me. I soon felt his strong arms round me, but I clung about his neck and dragged him down. He tore me struggled to escape, but I pressed him close and closer. I could not die alone. We sank the last time. The tide washed us up and down, but we were still about his neck, and my face was close to his. They found us days afterward by the Erith marshes, locked in each other's arms."

I shrank from her. Her fingers relaxed their hold, and she released my arm.

"Days," I murmured, "it could not be, you would have been drowned."

"We were drowned," she said, quietly. The woman was mad or I was dreaming. I looked round at the river, at the bank; I heard the thud of the hammers as they drove in the piles of the embankment; I saw the clock at the Temple Gate to assure myself that I was awake. I looked at her, she was still sitting there; she had relaxed into her old position. The veil had fallen from her cheek, her eyes were fixed upon the river, and her hands were clasped.

"Chelsea, and all the piers!" shouted the old man, and I turned to the boat. The lady in black was before me, and as I reached the deck of the steamer, and the clerk at the office window had boomed out the half-hour, she turned and looked at me. The boat was punctual to-day as it had been nine years before.

I followed her closely on board, impelled by a strange fascination I could not explain; which I struggled against, but could not overcome. The cool gun was shining brightly, and the river danced and sparkled in the afternoon light. There was the busy hum of life all around me. The bright flash of paddles, the fries of the lightermen, the whistle of the engine as the train crossed over the new bridge at Hungerford—all the common sights and sounds of the river on a summer's day were present, to impress on me the reality of what was going on around me. But as I stood there, with the lady near me, or I felt as one who has turned back the pages of his life, and sees and hears once more with a strange vividness the events that had been in time long past seemed just about to return to me, till the very effort of thinking overpowered me, and I was being formed, and left me grasping the fragments of a memory.

I looked toward the shore. The old man was standing with his eyes fixed on his companion, and an expression almost of terror on his face.

"She's on board," he muttered, hoarsely, to one of the crew, who was standing by the paddle-box, as he stooped and unhitched the rope from a hook on the landing-stage.

The man did not answer, but looked rapidly round the boat. At last his eye fell on my companion, and remained fixed on her face with curiosity and horror, which showed she was the object of his search.

Once more I think over what I then saw, to try if a shade of doubt lurks in any part of the story of what took place. No, I heard the words the old man uttered as distinctly as I now hear the scratching of my pen upon the paper. How did I instantly intuitively receive their sense, I acted on them. I stepped toward the paddle-box to question him, but before I reached it the boat had forged ahead and we were off. For a few moments, as the fresh breeze first cooled my temples, I seemed to shake off the spell which bound me, and to withhold confided to me that strange story. I walked forward—I struggled to get as far from her as I could. But then the fascination of the horrible, of what she might attempt were there no one there to prevent her, came upon me with redoubled force. It was my duty to watch her, and I felt that I could not attempt to act in earnest the story she had told me.

I found her seated on one of the centre benches in her old position, looking dreamily at the river, never moving, never speaking. There were few people on board, and of them none seemed to notice the beautiful girl who was quietly sitting apart, apparently perfectly unconscious of the whisper that followed; I could not, I must not leave her. She leaned on the bulwarks, and watched the water foaming from the paddle-wheel.

She looked up into my face and spoke quickly, "Would you try to save me if I threw myself in?"

"I can and will," I said, evading the question. I felt more convinced than ever that her mind was wandering; I must humor her. I must, I could, at all events, prevent her jumping overboard; though if she once succeeded in that I could be of no use. As I looked round I saw her look-ing Pier evidently referred to my companion, and the man to whom he had spoken had asked no explanation of them. I had not the chance of leaving her without her incurring much danger, for she was seated again in the old place and the old position I marked in thought. I walked to the stern and spoke to the man who was steering.

"Do you know that lady in black?" I asked, pointing to the place where she was sitting. He looked at me rather strangely, I thought, but said nothing. I repeated my question.

"That lady in black with the red shawl?" he said; "no, I don't."

"No, no; the lady in black next to her, all in black."

He looked again, and then answered sharply, "There ain't no lady in black there at all. Mustn't speak to me, Sir, it's against the rules."

I had followed his eyes. He had looked straight to the place where she was sitting, but he had not seen her. Once again the veil seemed lifted from the past, and I saw what had happened long ago. The lady in black came on board and was gone; but so quickly that I could not retain it, and even the memory of what it was perished with it.

I was turning to another of the crew, when I saw that the lady had left the seat where she had been sitting, and was again leaning over the bulwarks. In a moment I was by her side. I leaned over there alone, so I gave up my project for the present and joined her.

The steaming close by the scaffolding of the new embankment, a strong tide was running out, and the yellow river foamed and splashed round the piles. My companion smiled as she watched it, a happy, childish smile. The boat stopped at Westminster: she never moved, and I dared not leave her: she clung to the bulwarks, and gazed more earnestly than ever at the water. "You had better sit down," I said, wishing to get her away from the side.

"No, the time will soon come now."

"Do you get out at Lambeth?"

"Before."

"There is no pier between this and Lambeth."

She smiled, a strange wild smile, as my mind was running on that delusion of hers, that fantastic story of her suicide nine years ago. We were nearing the place where the boat, and therefore I must watch her closely. When we got to Lambeth I would appeal to the crew, to the passengers, would call them to witness that I had not neglected to keep her from what she must have escaped.

The boat started; slowly it forged ahead under Westminster Bridge, and as the sunlight was shut out, and the dark, cold arch stretched over us, I thought of her simile. It was like the grave, and I shuddered. She saw my shudder too.

I tried to speak to her, but I could not; I went close to her, I almost held her. The boat shot out again into the sunlight: this was the time she had spoken of. I tried to grasp her dress, but my hand refused to move; I could not speak; I could not stir. My eyes found she was on the bulwarks, and had plunged headlong into the river. I did not pause for one moment; without a thought I picked up the irresistible impulse which seemed to force me to follow her. I dashed into the water after her—I sank—the water hissed and bubbled in my ears, and pressed me tight and tighter as we sank. Then for the first time the thought occurred to me of risk to myself. I struggled, I struggled. I struggled to escape, but she held me firmly; I tried to push her from me, but she pressed me close and closer. I was powerless. The tide had entangled me, and her weight dragged me down. We were still sinking; my strength was failing me, and I thought I could see a rush of roaring, fathomless water, a sense of utter darkness, and I remember no more.

I was in bed when I awoke again to consciousness; I felt weak and faint; I lay still with closed eyes, and tried to think. Gradually the whole of what had taken place on that afternoon came back to me, clearly and distinctly as I remembered it at the time. I recalled it, I murmured, more as an echo to my own thoughts than as a question; for I did not know that there was any one in the room.

"Hush!" was the kind voice by my bedside, and a grave middle-aged man took my hand. He felt my pulse: "All right," he said, "the fever has left you; you must rest now."

"Is she saved?" I asked again, "I must know."

He shook his head, but did not answer. I turned to a woman who was sitting in the window: "The fever is gone," he whispered, "but he is wandering still. Let him speak as many of him."

"I am not wandering," I said, impatiently; "I only ask if the woman I jumped in after was saved."

"She was not," said the doctor: "now keep quiet, every thing depends on that." But as he spoke he looked at me, and I could see by his manner I was not satisfied. As I got gradually stronger I tried to question the nurse as to the fate of the unknown woman, but I could get no information from her. She seemed almost frightened when I mentioned the subject; so I gave up asking her. I would question the doctor when I could get about I would make inquiries for myself.

Many times, while I lay on my sofa still weak from the effects of my illness, did I recall the incidents of that afternoon. Many times did the face of that poor girl return, haunting me with the expression of despair. I have tried to think how it was, that, knowing my own helplessness in the water, without one moment's hesitation I had leaped in after her. The decision on which I acted was sudden and irresistible; an impulse the effect of a cause unknown to me, and which in all probability I shall never know.

I was now nearly well, and was sitting up burning lazily over some old volumes of the Illustrated London News. I was tired of the pictures, and was glancing through some short paragraphs of gossip, when the following lines caught my eye:

"DEATH ON THE RIVER.—A few days ago two bodies, one of a lady and the other of a gentleman, were picked up by some fishermen at the Erith marshes. It appears that some fishermen at the Erith marshes. It appears that the dressed got on board at Chelsea, and that they were found locked in each other's arms. Nothing is known of the Westminster Bridge the lady jumped overboard, and the gentleman immediately followed her. Neither of them ever rose again. Advertisements have been inserted in several papers, as the deceased were evidently in a respectable position of life, but the bodies have not yet been claimed. The lady was dressed altogether in black, and was of singular beauty."

I read it over again. I looked at the date of the paper. It was the very month nine years ago. It was the very day, the 1st of the month. What strange fate was it that had thus thrown in my way a confirmation of that story which I had persuaded myself originated only in the brain of a madwoman? Again I questioned the reality of what had happened; again I tried to think that I had been the victim of some delusion. No; to me at least the events of that afternoon were real; my memory reproduced them with extreme particularity. How I had been saved, my kind doctor had told me; of the risk I had incurred there could be no doubt.

But she—she! I was able to leave my room I hastened to make inquiries. I may say at once I met with no success. I questioned the crew of the steamer, and, subsequently, the police; but to no purpose. They shook their heads; no lady had been seen to jump overboard. The old man at the Temple Pier was hardly more communicative; he had observed no lady particularly on that day; he did remember a lady jumping overboard, and a gentleman jumping in after her; he was then one of the crew of the steamer; it was a Chelsea boat. The gentleman and lady were both drowned, and their bodies were washed ashore, he believed, on the Erith marshes; but more than this he could not, and he was sure. And with this I am obliged to rest satisfied.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

NOTES OF THE MONTH.

THE shortest address to the month that we ever heard was that of a young lady on the 1st of Nov ember, but he only used one, and that was "March!"

At this time of civil strife it is well to keep a king's ransom. The monarch referred to was probably Dust Mo-narch.

The friends of Mr. Jeremy Diddler would do well to remember that this, above all others, is the month for failing the wind.

SAWS BY OUR OWN SAWYER.

All have their several tasks in life,
Let each his own pursue;
Don't touch the duties of your brother,
Peddle your own canoe.

That bird she flew from nest to nest
In added care must'ring:
My husband has for me to guide:
Paddle your own canoe.

That huntsman hath his bares will lose
Who cries at every hound;
No captain in two ships can ride;
Paddle your own canoe.

For your own pottage save your breath:
Who'd scald his lips for you?
Your eyes have each a double sight:
Paddle your own canoe.

Fox-sons that traveler gave
Who wears a neighbor's shoe;
Your own fit better pair with mine:
Paddle your own canoe.

Mr. Quibble, reading that "it has been decided in the Court of Queen's Bench that the Prince Consort of England can legally marry him-self," observed that that might be very right and proper, but then even in the hardest times he should prefer to marry a woman.

A poor Irishman, eating a crowd of people approaching, asked what was the matter. "A man is going to be buried." "Oh," he replied, "I'll stop to see that, for we have got to be buried ourselves some day."

EPITAPH ON A WATER-DRINKER.

Here lies Ned Rand, who on a sudden
Left off cold water for the good;
Drank old stingo, mild and stale,
And every day got drunker.
Till fuddled and blood, reduced to batter,
Conteining of more flour and water,
Which, wanting salt to keep out mist,
And heat to bake it,
Mouldered and crumbled into dust.

A Western soldier, who had been through all the campaigns and shared in many of the fiercest battles of the late war, being asked by a friend how he escaped the horrors of war till he got home to Indiana and found his partner in the form of a wife, replied, "Because I was a bachelor."

"Your purse, Tom," said an indulgent father to his spendthrift son, "would you like to borrow it?" "How is either?" "Because it is always light-ning."

Connecticut has long been notorious for the facility with which it permits the marriage tie to be dissolved, and it is therefore appropriate that a jest cr eppet by an Episcopal clergyman of Hartford, which was recently circulated among his friends, should be aimed at the House of Representatives with a prayer, and found favor in his own vocation, of an unctuous character, to which his own vocation, and so characteristic of the Legislature of Connecticut, that the reader will not be surprised:

Little Bob begged hard the other day, when some friends were dining with us, to be allowed to come to sit at the table during dessert, which I told him he might do, provided he neither talked nor ate much. He very readily assented to this condition, which he most faithfully fulfilled to the letter. At last, in his poor little fellow crying and sobbing most pitiably. "Why, my dear child," I said, "what are you crying about?" "Why, pa," he replied, "there I am, asking for nothing, and getting it!"

THE ICE BRIDGE OVER NIAGARA—SWEENY'S SKIRMISHERS (DUCK-HUNTERS) ON THE ICE.—[SKETCHED BY T. R. DAVIS.]

IRELAND AND THE FENIAN LEADERS.

IRELAND has gained little by previous revolutions which have been undertaken under far better auspices and certainly have been occasioned by far greater provocation than that which is now threatened. No conspiracy can be connected offering relatively greater prospects of success than those preceding the insurrections of 1641 and 1798; yet both fastened the yoke of the conqueror upon the conquered more completely than ever. At this time not only is the Church opposed to the revolution, but there are in Ireland alone friends enough of the English interest to more than hold in check the advocates of Irish independence. The best class of Irishmen are not Fenians.

Ireland is sadly misgoverned, but her condition is certainly better than it has been at any previous period. It is true that Irish landlords spend little on the improvement of their property; but before 1847 they spent nothing at all for this purpose. The abolition of the old system of granting leases has doubtless worked unfavorably for the tenantry, as the landlords get thus a fuller power over them, being in no way scrupulous in the raising of rents according to their own necessities or the tenant's ability to pay. But is redress for the misgovernment of Ireland to be best obtained by violence? Why not rely on the force of the progress of events? It is comparatively easy for a great nation like England to quell an insurrection, but neither she nor any power on earth is able to resist the inevitable progress of thought and liberty.

The population of Ireland steadily declines in numerical strength. In 1841 it numbered over eight millions, and now it numbers scarcely more than six. This is a sad commentary on the state of affairs.

In connection with the events of the day the several illustrations which we give in this week's paper relating to the Fenian movement will be of value to our readers. In our portraits of Fenian leaders on pages 200 and 201 we have treated the two sections of the Brotherhood with perfect impartiality, having there two representatives, Mr. Roberts and General Sweeny on the one side, belonging to the recruit Senatorial Section, while Stephens and O'Mahony represent the more regular body of Fenians. The excitement in Canada is apprehensive of a serious invasion in very great. We have given on page 205 a view of James Street, Hamilton, as it appeared during the recent excitement. Our artist, Mr. Davis, who sends us this photographic view, has also sketched for us the Lee Bridge over Niagara. The view presented is that seen from the American side near the ferry staircase. The large masses covered with ice lie near the staircase on those rocks. The water is much used by duck-shooters, who, our artist facetiously remarks, "are the nearest approach to any thing seen at sea with the Fenian Seventy Thousand skirmishers." The ice extends entirely across the river below the falls. The ice in the river between the Falls and Suspension Bridge could be measured by the million cords, and it is estimated that the river will not be clear before the middle of May.

LAUNCH OF THE STEAM YACHT "ROSS WINANS."

THE singularly-formed vessel which has been under construction during the past twelvemonth or more at Mr. Hepworth's works, Cubitt Town, Millwall, England, from the designs of the owner, Mr. Ross D. Winans, U. S. Winans, American gentleman residing in London, who have obtained a patent for this peculiar style of shipbuilding, was successfully launched on February 19.

This strange-looking vessel, which has been popularly called "The Cigar Boat," is made somewhat in the shape of a cigar, or, to speak more accurately, of a tapering cylinder, each side being an arc of a circle, the radius of which, forming the centre mast, is 256 feet in length. The breadth and height of this cylinder are 16 feet, and at 18 feet from each end is a screw propeller, 12 feet in diameter, the blades of which, nine in number, stretch into the water on each side, and below to a distance of 6 feet beyond the bottom part of the vessel.

The deck is 130 feet long by 10½ feet broad, and from it rise two short funnels and two telescopic masts, which latter are also attached to steam-gear. The part below the water-line is built of the best Lowmoor and Staffordshire iron plates, for weighting of an inch in thickness, while the upper part is of steel plates, of the thickness of five sixteenths of an inch. The vessel is divided into thirty-four longitudinal compartments, calculated to be of an ultimate power of 2000 horse, and it is intended to work them up to from 1500 to 1600. There are also boilers to these, which are similar to locomotive boilers, and supply superheated steam, having an arrangement of tubes through which the heat from the furnace may be sent when desired, instead of passing directly into the funnel.

Behind the engine-room of the saloon, somewhat resembling in shape a railway tunnel, 25 feet in length, the entrance being at the after end, at each side of a table 12 feet long, which, with the body of the cabin, and rests upon the casing that surrounds the screw shaft. This saloon is tastefully painted in white and gold, and the roof is covered with a blue variegated damask. Two lustres hang from the roof under the skylight, and a pair of wall lamps are also placed at each side at the further extremity. At each side of the saloon, and also astern of it, are small cabins, handsomely and tastefully fitted up with berths and closets, and decorated in the same style. Astern of the saloon, and bedroom is the engine-place for the crew, with berths on each side, and in the centre is the windlass, which may be described as a long crank, to be worked by four men at the ends.

Previous to launching the ship lay on the ways, not as ships generally lie, sloping down ward toward the river, but the launching was so constructed as to have her water-line level. At four o'clock the tide was found to serve—the last blow was struck—Mrs. W. L. Winans performed the act of christening her the Ross Winans—and the launch went off beautifully, the vessel carrying the flags of England, America, and the Russian Empire, also the ensign of the Imperial Yacht Club of St. Petersburg, to which she is destined to belong.

Messrs. Winans have already constructed and launched three vessels built on this principle. The first, launched several years ago at Baltimore, was 230 feet in length and 16 feet in breadth. She has but one propeller, of the same size as those of the Ross Winans, and this is in the centre of the ship. It is obvious that with this arrangement there can not be the same strength and stability as with those of the new vessel. This first ship is said to have been driven, with a smaller engine than those on board the new ship, at the rate of fifteen knots an hour. A second boat, 170 feet by 8 feet, has been launched at St. Petersburg; and a third, of similar dimensions, at Havre, a few weeks since.

PARTED.

More than one! years have pass'd away
Since I have seen your thoughtful face,
Yet could I every feature trace,
Your image haunts me night and day.

And common things doth meaning wear
They never had before we met,
And I am wearied with the fret
Of guessing the sad hints they bear.

A song brings back what time we walk'd
Above the brown cliff's sloping lawn,
From music I have even drawn
The very words we used in talk.

The crumbling church, the upland lea,
The yew-tree mingling round the bridge,
The brave gray wold—the far off ridge,
The mournful dirging of the sea—

Too well remembered! Ah, I know
We never more can walk together,
To dhase the cloud or angry weather;
But you will with another go.

Nor can I blame the choice you made,
I sit within my lonely room
And pray that I may bear the gloom
That had been light if you had staid.

Farewell, sweet Margaret! thus in life
Those paths of mutual go hand in hand,
Our fairest hopes are built on sand,
And fate with love is ever rife!

Yet will I hold your memory dear,
God send you fortune fair and kind,
And love with truth your mutual mind
Your lot through every passing year!

TESTIMONY BEFORE THE RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

WHENEVER a subject comes under the especial charge of politicians it suddenly goes under a veil of obscurity. Questions which are plain to the common sense become under the sun, and it is not any thing wonderful that we do not find a clear view of the reconstruction question. Its magnitude in the attitude which they take toward the subject of reconstruction. It is for this reason that we think of course that there is somewhat of prejudice on both sides, and that we must look for the truth in the middle position. This is sufficiently apparent in the deliverances of the press. Journals like the New York Times, the Tribune, the Evening Post, World, and Daily News take one side, and the Tribune the other. The Times is the organ of Senator Fox, the advocacy of or in opposition to the President's policy we have constantly noted. The Tribune has been conservative upon the sincerity of the political schemers by other sympathizers with the South. The Tribune has been the only paper which has had the courage to call attention to the fact that there is an endeavor on either side to make political capital out of the question. The Tribune has been with the united conviction which is on that side entertained by the North, that the great misrepresentation of the Southern State had before the people. One strenuous effort is being made on the part of the Democratic representation of these States in Congress, mouthing over the sentiments of conservatives, and of the most moderate extremists, and giving the most hopeful phase that can possibly be given to the condition of the Southern States, while the other is equally strenuous in the opposite direction, and using the most extreme radical language, denouncing and representing the condition of the freedmen as bad as it could possibly be. On both sides there is the evident contempt of dangers which are really worthy of cautious consideration, and, on the other hand, exaggerations of dangers which the facts, as they exist, will scarcely support.

In this state of affairs the evidence which is being given before the special Committee of Congress on Reconstruction is of the highest importance, and the examination which is now in favor of one or the other method of disposing of the reconstruction question is of the most vital interest. We present before our readers an abstract of the points which have been developed in the course of the last examination before the Committee.

Brigadier-General Hatcher, Brigadier-General Hatcher says that except in the eastern portion of the state there is no armed force organized against the United States. The troops alone could the troops be withdrawn with safety. General Thomas, commanding Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, testifies that he has studied the condition of affairs in Tennessee. He is in favor of the state that if protected and encouraged by a small United force the loyal sentiment would gain complete ascendancy in the state. He does not think that it would be safe at this time to remove the troops or withdraw martial law or the military force. He is not in favor of negro suffrage. The Union men in West Tennessee are in the minority, but in East Tennessee is probably a majority. Suffrage is not a standard, and he thinks this feeling will go on improving. He is in favor of the test of loyalty oath, and would be admitted into Congress it will be a precedent for all the Southern States. They can not be admitted because all the Tennessee members are admitted, and that if they reject their members they will reject those who have voted as we done. There is no doubt but what there is a universal feeling among the people that the war is over, and that it is manifested. Colonel William Spence testifies that the present causes in Tennessee operate to the disadvantage were made to protect them; he thinks the federal authorities are unable to protect the loyal men. He is in favor of the test oath, and that the admission of Senators and Representatives from Tennessee will be a precedent for all the States, and that the whole machinery in motion, and the people would become better satisfied. He is opposed to negro suffrage. He testifies he does not think many of the citizens of Tennessee are favorable to the reconstruction of the Union. The people in Tennessee are opposed to the Government. If every man should be allowed to vote he thinks it would be

It has been my object in this work to give as clear an account as I was able of tracts of country previously unexplored, with their river systems, natural productions, and capabilities: and to bring before my countrymen, and all others interested in the cause of humanity, the misery entailed by the slave-trade in its inland phases: a subject on which I and my companions saw the first who have had any opportunities of forming a judgment. . . . I would hope that whatever my descriptions want in clearness or literary skill may, in a measure, be supplied by the novelty of the scenes described, and the additional information afforded on that curse of Africa, and that obscure, even now in the nineteenth century, of a European nation—the slave-trade.—Preface.
Of the many travelers who have shown their claims to the character, Dr. Livingstone is among the most conspicuous. The present volume is a supplement to his former work. It is a record of a remarkable enterprise, and it deserves attention from those who sympathize with the history of African life and its native people.—London Times.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.
It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was attacked with an irritation of the throat, attended with a dingressive cough. I had formerly made use of White Pine Bough tea a preparation, having for its base the inside bark of white pine, slightly astringent, recommended to be very useful in case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in these maladies alluded to, a considerable quantity of the Medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was very satisfactory, relieving them in two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, and had raised mucus streaked with blood. She soon found relief and a speedy cure. She took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1855, I advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.
For all Coughs and Kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

DRESSING FOR CHURCH.

(EASTER SUNDAY.)

Has any body heard the bell?
You have?—dear me, I know full well
I'll never dress in time—
For mercy's sake, come help me, Lucy,
I'll make my toilet very spruce—
The silk is quite sublime!

Here, lace this gaiter for me—do.
"A hole!" you say? plague take the shoe
Please, Lucie, try and hide it—
Just think, it's Sunday, and, my soul,
I can not wear it with a hole!
The men will surely say it.

They're always peeping at our feet
(Though, to be sure, they needn't peep,
The way we braid our dresses);
I'll disappoint them, though, to-day.
"And cross myself," pray did you say?
Don't laugh at my distresses!

Now, Lucie, pray feel my waterfall—
Do you think it large? ain't it too small?
What lurker times things give!
My rats and mice, do they sit straight?
Please hurry, Lucie, I know I'm late—
"There? Willie," as I live!

How splendidly the silk will rustle!
(Please hand me "self-adjusting bustle,"
My corset, and my hoop.)
There now, I'll take five shirts or six—
Be hurry, that and help me fix;
You know I can not stoop!

"How shall I say my prayers to-day?"
As if girls went to church to pray!
How you be so foolish?
Here dump this ribbon in Cologne;
"What for?" to paint, you silly one!
Now, Lucie, don't be foolish.

Now then, my hat—how he abhors
This thing—it's big as all out doors—
The frightful sugar-scoop!
Thank Heaven, my cloak is handsome, too,
It cost enough to be, I know—
(Straighten this horrid hoop!)

My handkerchief and gloves you'll find
Just in that drawer. Lace, are you blind
(Now my head trail!)
It's all the fashion now, you know;
(Pray, does the print and powder show
Through my nose veil?)

Thank you, my dear, I b'lieve I'm dressed;
The saints be praised! the day of rest
Comes only once in seven,
For if, as the other six,
This trouble I should have to fix,
I'd never get to heaven!

PRESIDENTIAL PATRONAGE.

WHATEVER may be thought of the general wisdom or policy of the President's veto of the Freedmen's Bureau Bill, there can be no doubt that one point of it was very suggestive, and that was his opposition to the further increase of Presidential patronage. At present that patronage is immense and alarming. If it had been arranged by the adviser of the enemies of the offices created by the bill in question, the President, with the old "Federal" offices, and the Internal Revenue appointments, and those of the new bureaus, could have exercised a direct influence upon the elections which would have been not only dangerous for himself but demoralizing to the country. In thus giving new power to the Executive, as he justly objected. For although the country might willingly and gladly confide an almost absolute authority to an incorruptible, upright, sagacious, and purely patriotic man like ABRAHAM LINCOLN, it might tremble to know that any successor of his would inherit it. If PIERCE or BUCHANAN could have exercised, in addition to the prerogative they enjoyed, such power as Mr. JOHNSON declined in his veto of the Freedmen's Bill, the disastrous consequences would have been inscrutable.

The perils of the increase of Executive patronage proposed by the vast number of offices created within a few years are now painfully evident. There is at this very time an adulation of the President which is unprecedented and intimidating, and an eager and sedulous anxiety for his favor which the high Tory party of any monarchical country would disdain to feel or to display. Candidates for State offices hurry to Washington to ascertain whether they are welcome at the White House. Office-holders think it necessary to offer to resign if they pursue a course which they fear the President may not approve. Party Conventions nervously speak him fair. Great questions of national policy are discussed not upon their merits but upon the probabilities of the Presidential smile. The newspapers wrangle fiercely whether the result of elections condemns or favors his supposed views. The actual question of politics is not is it just, is it right, is it true policy, but—does it please the President? It is a state of affairs utterly unworthy an honorable people. It is a most alarming sign under a free Constitutional Government.

The excuse offered merely reveals more clearly the danger of the enormous patronage of which we speak. It is urged that, to differ with the President, is to run the risk of encountering the organized opposition of the army of office-holders, who, in other countries, are called the "creatures" of the Government. But when that is the controlling a voice of public action the national demoralization is complete. Honesty, intelligence, capacity have then ceased to be the requirements of the public servants; every consideration is subordinated to the Presidential pleasure: the obvious prophecy is then the cardinal condition of political success, and the republic has already rotted into a lower empire.

Every party in a free government when it accedes to power naturally wishes to maintain harmony in all its parts. Believing its general policy to be essential to the national safety, and understanding the necessity of amity between the legislative and executive powers to the success of that policy, each branch is honorably bound not to permit slight differences to produce alienation, but by prudence, sobriety, good sense, and good faith to maintain the unity which insures success. But when differences have become vital and irreconcilable, separation or surrender are inevitable. And here is another peril of great Executive patronage, that when one chosen primarily to merely the executive officer of the national will is able, in the event of fatal difference with the legislative branch, to a power exercise from the immediate and express representatives of that will, which no hereditary monarch in a constitutional country can exercise. A dangerous the public peace such a conflict might be under certain circumstances every man can see. How demoralizing the mere possibility of such a conflict is, every day shows.

Yet, as there is nothing which, when plainly seen, the people of this country would so scrupulously repudiate as a encroachment, so there is nothing of which they would be so justly jealous if their suspicions were once fairly roused; and as, in the event of conflict, they would understand swiftly and irresistibly with their immediate representatives, every good citizen will strive earnestly to avoid the possibility of its occurrence by removing the occasion of beginning and the means of waging such a conflict. The authority of the executive branch of this Government is elaborately circumscribed by the veto power. If, however, Congress is so unanimously persuaded of the expediency of a law that the President's reasons do not change its conviction, the Constitution then templates, by the two-thirds provision, that the will of Congress shall become law, notwithstanding the President's objection. It certainly does not contemplate that the President, despite the two-thirds vote of both Houses, shall oppose the national will as expressed overwhelmingly by its representatives. Yet the enormous patronage of the Executive makes this possible: and such patronage, and the veto and the military and naval command combined, invest the President with a power so hugely disproportioned to any other in the Government that it can not be safely tolerated.

There are two obvious remedies for the present and the other direct. The first is the "one term" system, which is liable to many objections, and the second the limitation of Presidential patronage. Let the heads of offices—and the widest distribution of the mass of patronage between the various Department and Congress. The corruption of this kind is a very plain peril the mind of the country will inevitably turn. The reform will be radical, and can only be effected by a strenuous public opinion. But it is the only effective means that opposes all progress, which worshiped slavery while it was trying to strike the nation to the heart, and which now resists equal rights. It is the only other necessary and wholesome change, the good sense of the people will approve and adopt it. That good sense will recognize that the most dangerous concentration is the concentration of controlling power in one man, and that office-holders are to be the servants and not the masters of the country.

CONGRESSIONAL LEADERSHIP.

AMONG the living statesmen of this country there is none who commands profounder popular confidence than WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN, Senator from Maine. Absolute integrity, a certain antique severity of character making him sometimes impatient and almost petulant in opposition to rhetoric and sentimentality, great sagacity, catholic comprehension, strict fidelity to the fundamental principles of the Government, and a singularly clear and concise oratory, are qualities which are apparent to every man who watches his career. No man surpasses him in that just estimate of practicability which is the highest statesmanship. The duty of a legislator is to know what is possible and to do it. It is to make six or eight, if you can not secure ten. It is to take the half loaf rather than to lose the whole.

In the Senate debates MR. FESSENDEN is always conspicuous for an incisive good sense, which is the surest as it is the most excellent quality of a Senator. In opposition he is always reasonable, speaking to the merits of the special case, and not planting himself upon abstractions. Quick to defend and explain the prerogative of the body-in which he sits, he neither traduces nor defies his opponents. His advocacy of measures is more effective because it is not rancorous in rhetoric nor discursive in argument, but firm, prudent, and pointed. There is no man in Congress whose judgment is truer, whose statesmanship is more absolute, or whose conviction is sincerer. If there were any conspicuous and distinctive leader in the Senate he would be the man; and that, with the single exception that he is not confessedly the leader, is due rather to temperament than to any other cause.

Unquestionably MR. FESSENDEN represents the patient common sense of the Union party in this country. He knows that the difficulties of the situation are to be surmounted not by vituperation and crimination, not by petty jealousies or lofty moral indignation, but by tranquil firmness and honest argument. He does not impugn an able reconstruction, which is sure to be baffled by events, nor an unreasoning and blind submission to chances which are calculable. Differing upon some points with the President, he does not accuse his sincerity; and convinced that certain conditions of reorganization are indispensable, he neither exasperates nor flatters the late rebel population. Had the action of Congress in both Houses been inspired by such a spirit much of the gravity of the situation would have been avoided. MR. FESSENDEN has a more cheerful temperament, and greater ambition and self-esteem would have made Senator FESSENDEN a more conspicuous leader, but they could not make him a more useful legislator.

A total contrast to Senator FESSENDEN is MR. THADDEUS STEVENS, who has been permitted by the House of Representatives to take the position of a leader. MR. STEVENS has no single quality of a statesman, except strong conviction and ability to principle. He is certainly a revolutionary leader; reckless, unsparing, vehement, vindictive, loud for the rights of conquerors, intolerant of opposition, and as absolutely incapable of fine discrimination and generous judgment as a locomotive of singing. Of a pleasant humor and personal kindliness, he is no more fitted for the task of reconstruction than the very region of the heart. Yet a Congress which is undoubtedly one of the ablest that was ever assembled has quietly allowed itself to be almost a puppet in the hands of such a man and at such a time. The consequence is that MR. STEVENS's crude and rash talk is supposed to be the voice of Congress. A bold attempt was undertaken to regulate the price of gold by law is the tacitly acknowledged chief of a body of practical business men. A representative who sneers at the press is permitted to lecture a party created and triumphant by free discussion.

The evident mischief of allowing MR. STEVENS to be the exponent of the House of Representatives is that he is not naturally supposed by the people of the late rebel States to indicate the disposition of the dominant party of the Government. He does at once conceive that the vindictive or unreasonable hostility is the main-spring of the Union policy. They instinctively resist. Seeing the President and MR. STEVENS at issue, they naturally support the President. That support again puts the President in a false position, of which he and all honest men are fully conscious, and he naturally does not feel pleasantly toward the agencies which have placed him there. We insist that MR. JOHNSON has reason to be hurt and indignant that he is represented as the friend and ally of red-handed rebels. Has he given no proof of fidelity to the Government? Because he holds views of reorganization which may appear to be right, abandon to the welfare of the Union, is he therefore to be accused of treachery? Because the President expresses his opinion, is he to be charged with usurpation? Yet MR. STEVENS makes the charge, and the House is silent.

It is one of the marvels of the time that no man known as a radical has vindicated the party and the country against MR. STEVENS. The opposition of gentlemen like MR. RAYMOND and MR. DAVIS of this State has been of avail. In public estimation they stand where "the King's friends" stood in the earlier days of GEORGE THIRD. Yet nothing is more certain than that the calm good sense of the great Union party has strongly condemned the views and policy of MR. STEVENS. His own instinct assured him of it in advance, and he said so in the first speech he made during the session, when he declared that he spoke for himself alone. It is as true now as it was then. The tone of reconstruction is blended of firmness and forbearance, of prudence and conciliation, of faith and patience; and those are words which are not found in the dictionary of THADDEUS STEVENS.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE PAPER-MONEY MEN.

THE paper-money men have won a substantial victory. On 23d March the MORRILL bill passed the House of Representatives, with amendments prohibiting the Secretary of the Treasury from curtailing more than $10,000,000 of United States notes in the six months following the passage of the bill, and $4,000,000 in each subsequent month—in other words, restricting contraction to the pitiful amount of about $18,000,000 during the recess, say 12 per cent. of the total volume afloat. Contraction at this rate may fairly be considered no contraction at all. If we progress no faster than this, a few years hence the only people who will see the restoration of specie payments.

The amendment was carried by the combined votes of the friends of the original bill—who accepted the measure with this limitation rather than be altogether defeated—and the Congressional representatives of the manufacturing interests of New England and Pennsylvania; the latter were opponents of currency contraction. It was MR. BOUTWELL's speech which gave the death-blow to the original measure. It was MR. MORRILL who led the paper-money party in opposition to JOHN WENTWORTH. These gentlemen have been instructed by their respective constituencies that any further contraction means a stoppage of domestic industry and a period of general commercial embarrassment, and have been affected to oppose any interference with the existing paper-money régime. Manufacturers understand that if the currency remains as redundant as it is they will be able to sell their goods at a profit, and that, whether if the currency be curtailed, they will have to sell them at a loss; and, with a short-sighted-ness not unusual to their class, they do not see that to resist contraction now is only to postpone the evil day, and to incur the risk of a crisis hereafter, when they will probably be less able to meet it than now. It is for the interest of the manufacturers, as of all other people, that measures should be at once inaugurated which will lead as soon as possible to the restoration of specie payments, and to the re-establishment of a stable standard of value for the government of commercial transactions. But these measures they will not support, and think only of the stocks of goods on hand. If they can sell these at a profit they will let the future take care of itself. And their power in Congress has been thus far sufficient to defeat the Government and the friends of a sound currency.

There are two aspects in which this success of the manufacturers may be viewed. One is the financial aspect. If they should succeed with the Senate and the President as they have succeeded with the House of Representatives, the commencement of substantial contraction will be deferred for a year. The consequence will be an extensive production of goods this autumn and next fall, and heavy sales, necessarily on credit, in the South and West. Another year of inflated currency would not be unlikely to lead to a fresh outburst of speculation in goods. It would follow that, when the question next arose, in December of this year, and the representatives of the people were again overwhelmed by the urgent necessity of the case to interpose some check to the upward tendency of prices, the manufacturing establishments would be in a much more prosperous condition than they would be if gradual contraction, and much less able than they now are to extend liberality to their debtors. In a word, the longer the day of reckoning is deferred, the more will it be met. If we begin now the uphill work of contraction, some weak members of society will fall out and perish by the way. But the bulk will be found strong and sinews equal to the task. Let the labor be postponed another year, and many men who could now meet the crisis successfully will be unable to encounter the shock. Manufacturers who could now afford to lose 25 per cent. on their stocks will then be called upon to lose 75 per cent. and will not be able to sustain such a loss. Merchants who could now bear a sacrifice on their goods will be in no condition to do so after another year of ups and downs. And the very men who are now the backers of THADDEUS STEVENS and JOHN SHERMAN in opposing the restoration of specie payments will discover that they would have saved money had they left matters take their course. For the whole question is covered by two propositions: First, We must, sooner or later, restore specie payments; and, Secondly, In the nature of things the longer the operation of getting back to specie payments is deferred, the more difficult will it prove, and the greater the risk of a crisis in the transition.

The other aspect in which the recent victory of the manufacturers may be viewed is political. Though many leading Republicans voted for the MORRILL Bill, and it was in part an administration measure, it was nevertheless defeated by Republican votes, and the responsibility for its defeat rests upon such representative Republicans as STEVENS of Pennsylvania, and BOUTWELL of Massachusetts. Had the Southern States been represented in Congress the bill would have passed as reported by the Committee. The South had every reason to favor the restoration of specie payments, and no interest whatever in prolonging the present era of paper-money and fluctuating values. We must not disregard the use that will be made of this fact at the fall elections. By that time politicians will have taken hold of the currency question as a political issue. It will be easy to demonstrate that the great cost of living is mainly due to the depreciated condition of the currency, and opponents of the dominant party will plausibly argue that but for the opposition of such Republicans as STEVENS, BOUTWELL, and others—in the interest of vast manufacturing corporations in Pennsylvania and New England—the currency would by that time have been curtailed, gold would have been lower, and the cost of living substantially reduced. It will be further urged by the Opposition presses and speakers, that but for the unwillingness of the majority in Congress to admit Southern men to seats, the currency would already have been in process of contraction, and the cost of living on the decline.

As for the Secretary, he will probably do his duty as best he can with such powers as Congress may confer upon him. We regard it as a great mercy to him that the original bill did not pass. Had that measure become a law nothing could have saved him from wholesale charges of corruption and speculation in the stock market. If his power to contract the currency be definitely limited to $15,000,000 between this and December he can, of course, effect little or nothing toward the restoration of specie payments. Gold will fall only because every one will understand that contraction is only deferred, not abandoned, and because the cotton crop is likely to more than pay our foreign debt. He will doubtless exert himself to convert as large a proportion as possible of his short-date obligations into long bonds, and, by getting rid of the debt on call and of his debt certificates, will emancipate himself from the control of the banks. Another year of high prices and high taxes will satisfy Congressmen that they can not with impunity advocate the interest of manufacturing companies in opposition to the public interest, and the Secretary will then have his revenge.

THE CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

A GREAT deal of unreasonable wrath has been lavished upon the Reconstruction Committee. That President-dragooning and Central Directory, which was an unfortunate expression, because it has no resemblance to a Central Directory; and the epithets have steadily palliated the rebellion declaim against the Committee as an irresponsible body to which Congress has helplessly committed its functions. This is a natural opposition, because the papers also decry the test oath as unconstitutional, and urge the admission of the late rebel States to all their old rights without conditions. They are, therefore, very impatient with a Committee charged to inquire whether such a policy is wise and safe.

The truth is, that when Congress met it was clear that it must at once adopt the policy of reorganization urged by the opponents of the war, or it must not. To adopt it was to abandon the war without fame, and to invite rebellion. Of course a loyal and honest and able Congress did not entertain the proposition for a moment. Then it was necessary to determine the exact situation of the country, and to consider the conditions upon which it seemed best that the unorganized States should resume their old relations. This was not a point for debate upon any theory whatever. It involved a knowledge of facts; and the first duty was to collect information, compare opinions, and elaborate methods. Obviously Congress itself could not undertake this work directly; and, unless it were prepared to abdicate its authority, and to allow the President to settle by himself the individual will the gravest question which could ever arise in our history, it was indispensable to appoint a Committee to investigate and prepare, to consider, and finally to report, that the whole subject might be treated intelligently by those who were elected by the loyal people of the United States to decide the question.

Nothing could be plainer or more reasonable. Surely if any subject ever demanded the most prudent and thoughtful deliberation it is the reorganization of the Union. It is not a matter to be "hurried up," nor to be determined by an abstract theory. It is the most practical of questions. As Mr. SEWARD said in his letter to MR. ADAMS describing the interview of President LINCOLN with the Peace-embassy from Richmond in February, 1865: "His power [the President's] is limited by the Constitution. And when peace should be made, Congress must necessarily act in regard to appropriations of money, and to the admission of representatives from the insurrectionary States."

The Reconstruction Committee is thus simply a Commission of Inquiry with no power whatever; and as Congress appointed the Committee because information was necessary to wise action, it very properly resolved not to act until it had the information. And the moment it may alter its instructions to the Committee, or it may discharge it. But it might just as wisely be denounced for referring questions of contested elections to a committee upon that subject, and declining to decide until the committee reported, as for intrusting this most vital inquiry to a carefully selected committee. So, also, to complain that it has not presented a complete scheme of legislation upon the subject, is to complain of the nature of the case. The essential information is, of course, slowly obtained and must be well weighed. Meanwhile, as fast as the Committee sees that a special measure is desirable, it reports it to Congress and asks action upon it. This course is also reviled; but if the Committee had been silent to this time would its conduct have been more satisfactory to its opponents?

It is surely a most reasonable and impatient complaint that the loyal people of the United States, by their representatives in Congress, are considering with the gravest deliberation the most momentous question of reorganization of the Union. The point is not whether loyal representatives are to be admitted, because nobody but a Copperhead claims that any other shall be. The question is, whether South Carolina and Mississippi shall, by the admission of members to Congress, be allowed to have resumed all the rights in the Union which New York and Iowa enjoy. It may be that it is most desirable; but is Congress to be blamed for carefully considering the question?

THE LAW OF TESTIMONY.

In the State of New York, since the spring of 1857, the parties to civil suits are equal witnesses with all others. This change has been an improvement, and the vast majority of lawyers in the State would doubtless smile at the proposition to abandon the present system. But the question is asked, and with extraordinary emphasis—If parties to civil suits may witness for themselves, why should not the defendant in a criminal suit testify for himself?

There really is no sufficient answer. If both parties were disqualified there would be at least an air of impartiality. But as it is, the just theory of the law is that every person is to be presumed innocent until proved guilty; but the practice is to hold him guilty until he can establish his innocence. And he is not suffered to help establish it. If you enter any court where a man is upon trial for an infamous crime of which he may be as innocent as you are, it is impossible that he should be in all ready regarded as guilty. We do not deny that this springs from the steps necessary to security which have been taken; but certainly we do not give the accused a fair chance if we silence him. The practice of the law in this respect is amusingly illustrated by a story of a certain New York judge who was about to sentence a negro for some trivial offense. "Stand up, Zingo!" said his Honor. "What have you to say why you should not be the law should not be pronounced upon you?" Poor Zingo, frightened out of his small wits, began to stammer, "Why—Massa—Massa—Knickerbocker—" "Don't speak, Zingo," interrupted his Honor, "not a word;" and sentence was pronounced.

A writer in the American Law Register for January, to whom we are indebted for this good story, and who treats the subject with great spirit and force, says that the only theory upon which the testimony of a party to a civil suit was rejected was that if he said any thing favorable to himself it must needs be perjury, and that the same reason is urged for a similar exclusion in criminal proceedings. But there is no delay in receiving a plea of guilty. It is only when the story of an accused man helps him that it is discarded. But having rejected the theory in one case, we must reject it in the other. Besides, before the examining and committing magistrate the arrested person may make a statement which may afterward be used against him, and so may cause before the jury without the sanction of an oath. Now if the accused may be heard without oath before a magistrate, why should he not be heard, sworn, before twelve magistrates or a jury. "If," as the writer of whom we speak says—"if his statements are received in the examination before a magistrate in holding or releasing him, why should they not be received in the form of legal testimony to influence the jury in convicting or acquitting him?"

Again, if the theory be that the accusation renders the accused unworthy of credit, why do we allow one of two accused persons to give States evidence and suffer him to escape by implicating his accomplice? By this offer we bribe both honest men wrongfully accused and rogues anxious to escape to swear falsely. Yet, so determined is the impartial law to convict, that if the State's evidence should tend to exonerate both the accused, it will not be produced.

In the State of Maine, by an act passed in 1863, the respondent to any criminal charge is allowed to testify; and Governor CONNOR, author of that State says of these changes: "So far as I can judge, they are favorable to the ascertainment of truth—the great end for which judicial proceedings are instituted.....I anticipate from the change proposed a greater certainty of correct decisions in criminal proceedings. The guilty will be less likely to escape. The danger of the unjust conviction of the innocent will be diminished." It appears that in no civilized country save the English-speaking lands is a person accused of crime forbidden to testify for himself. It is a relic of a false and foolish view of human nature. It is a view corrected by our experience and ridiculed by the inconsistency of our practice. If "the profession" will raise the banner of reform upon this subject it will be the banner of triumph.

SLAUGHTER-HOUSES IN NEW YORK CITY.

THE question of the removal of these establishments to the suburbs of the city has lately engaged the attention of the new Board of Health; but in the discussion between the butchers and the Board there was one point of considerable importance entirely overlooked. This was the condition of the cattle as to health, produced by their transfer to the city in cattle trains, and the superiority of abattoirs in the country. It would be impossible for any thing like cattle off their feed and transporting them in cars from the prairies of the West, or from Canada—and the majority of our meat-cattle come from these quarters—they must be bruised and feverish on their arrival at the pens, and in no condition for immediate slaughter. It would be evidently better to kill the animals fresh from pasture and transport the carcass quartered to the city.

The butchers object to this plan on the ground that the meat would, as they say, "be mussed" in a jarring train. But this slight disadvantage has to be weighed against the greater disadvantage in the unhealthy meat produced by bruises and fever. It would not be difficult, however, to construct cars on the plan of a cooling-house, in which animals might be transported in them without being bruised, heated, or in any way damaged. So far as expense is concerned, if the business were conducted on a large scale it would doubtless be as an advantage in having cattle slaughtered along the great lines, by which they are now conducted into the city—the Harlem and Hudson River roads.

The question, What food we shall eat, and what acutiny shall be employed in its selection, is one of more importance than is generally supposed. Many diseases are produced by meat injured by an improper mode of feeding animals. This is much more extensive in old countries than here, where we yet have the vast prairies and abundant crops of corn; but in the Atlantic States, owing to the exhausting plan of cultivation pursued, animals are often fed much less luxuriously than throughout the West. Cattle and hogs are there fatted generally in large inclosures, and with abundance of nutritious food—the improper feeding is the exception. But elsewhere such feeding is the general rule. A hog fatted in a close pen can scarcely be a fit food for man. The air of such a confined place is bad. The refuse of all food is considered good enough for the pig, and it is foul to him from a receiver in which it is allowed to accumulate until it ferments. The prejudice of the Jew against pork is doubtless due to this mode of feeding, known to produce scrofula not only in the animal, but in those who partake of the flesh. We need not speak of the abuses in fattening cows which have been kept in what are called swill-stables, as the food which they receive from sources is well known to be dangerous to health.

Food that is wholly desirable and proper can best be obtained from animals which are allowed to take exercise in the fresh air, and be fattened; and if a few butchers would unite in the purchase of extensive grounds in Westchester or Putnam counties and carry out this plan, we feel sure that the enterprise would be rewarded with good customers and large profits. The new Board, instead of directing their attention merely to the removal of slaughter-houses, would promote the health of the animals and of the consumers.

PREVENTION OF CHOLERA.

IN his admirable lectures DR. SOUTHWOOD SMITH tells us that epidemics all belong to the class of Zymotic. The Black Death, the Oriental Plague, the Sweating Sickness, Cholera, Typhus, Small-Pox, and many other diseases of less severity are epidemic and periodical in their character, and are usually preceded by Influenza. The first outbreak of cholera in Great Britain was heralded by it, and the influenza of 1847 preceded the cholera of 1848. During the prevalence of cholera all other diseases are apt to partake of its type, owing doubtless in a great measure to the terror which pervades a community at such times, and we find that the reaction of the mental impressions on the body are so powerful as frequently to result in the death of the unfortunate unless his attention can be diverted from himself.

Cholera, like all other epidemics, is fearfully rapid in its action, and if death does not occur in a few hours the attack will usually prove fatal. The great object to be attained in the treatment of the disease when it has announced its presence is to gain time. The sufferer should go to bed at once and send for his physician, for every moment is of value, and proper assistance in the first onslaught of the attack will often decide between life and death in the ultimate result.

Whatever opinions physicians may hold regarding the contagious character of various epidemics, all agree that certain conditions are alike favorable to their development and rapid progress as well as to their fatality. Filthy streets, dirty sewers, exhalations from putrid animal and vegetable substances, are all powerful predisposing causes of the production not only of cholera, but also of typhus and all other diseases of the low fever class.

The influence of the foul air voided from the human body is also exceedingly pernicious to the system, especially in overcrowded, ill-ventilated rooms and buildings; but so great is the infatuation of the majority of men regarding the subject of ventilation that, in spite of this evidence of the contrary, it is often asserted that there is no difference to be found between pure and foul air; whereas the experiments of Dr. ANGUS SMITH show that if we confine the air of an overcrowded room and allow it to remain for a week or so it forms a gelatinous deposit that possesses a strong animal odor, and if examined from time to time by a microscope the deposit shows the appearance of vegetable growths in which hosts of animalcules are rapidly produced, thus demonstrating in the most satisfactory manner the presence of a large amount of organic matter in the air expired from the lungs.

The poisonous character of the organic matter contained in such expired air, as well as that exuded from the skin, is demonstrated by the same authority in the statement that a few drops of the liquid condensed under the accumulation of foul air of an overcrowded room introduced into the veins of a dog produces death, with the usual phenomena of typhus fever.

In the face of such facts it is fully longer to disregard the important subject of ventilation if we desire to escape the epidemics that now threaten us, an attack of which is now regarded as being even disreputable to the patient, since it involves a gross ignorance of the ordinary laws of health and a disregard of cleanliness in the personal or household arrangements.

It is impossible in an article to indicate the means which families and individuals should adopt to protect themselves as far as possible from the invasion of this disease, and since the old saying that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure applies with marvelous force to the cholera, it is the duty of all to observe with care the laws of hygiene as laid down in the works on this subject. An excellent summary of them will be found in a book on Anatomy, Physiology, and Hygiene, recently published by Professor DRAPER, in which the questions of diet, ventilation, bathing, etc., are fully discussed and brought within the reach of all intelligent minds.

"INSIDE."

THE story of this name, which appears serially in the present number, certainly affords a treat. It is the most graphic and clearly authentic sketch of the social condition of the late rebel States during the war, and will have a unique value to the historian of the stormy time, and, like all true pictures of a great range of society, is full of value to the contemporary and political student. The writer of such a tale is not a solitary product of the region in which it is laid; and it is to such clear and intelligent observation upon the part of the thoughtful people of the South that we must look for wise action in the future. They are the real friends of the Union and of peace.

SOLDIERS LEFT-HAND WRITING.

IT was in this paper that many of the soldiers who competed for the prizes of left-handed penmanship first saw the invitation to that generous rivalry, and they will now learn with pleasure the result. It is plain from the number of specimens that no Yankee loses his heart with his arm, for there were two hundred and seventy-seven competitors collected from nearly every State in the Union. The loss of two arms, indeed, did not daunt one competitor, who sent a specimen written with the mouth, which was remarkable and honorably mentioned. The Exhibition Room was prettily arranged, and they will now learn with pleasure of time, it would doubtless have been a point of popular interest. Yet it was long enough open for General GRANT to visit it. He was delighted at the display, and wrote a letter playfully confessing that he should be unable to decide upon the merits of the competitors.

This, however, was a responsibility which the Committee could not escape, and after careful inspection and consideration they awarded the prizes, although they would doubtless have confessed that it was also difficult to their satisfaction. The original sum offered was five hundred dollars by WILLIAM OLAND BOURNE, who was the projector of the contest. To this two hundred and fifty dollars were added by the Sanitary Commission, and as much more by the Committee, making one thousand dollars in all. The first prize of the first class was awarded to FRANKLIN H. DURHAM, private in the Thirty-first Pennsylvania Infantry. There were twenty-eight prizes in all, and when we wish we had room for the names of the recipients, who were from every part of the country, from Maine to Dacotah. General HOWARD, the Head of the Freedmen's Bureau, who is one of the left-armed soldiers of the Union, did not compete for the prizes, but he wrote a pleasant letter to DR. BELLOWS, one of the Committee.

It was a enterprise most honorable to MR. BOURNE and to the brave Yankee soldiers, all of whom showed in the sentiments they wrote that if their left-handed they were no less manly right-hearted.

THADDEUS STEVENS.

THE figure which in the present Congress looms up above every other is that of THADDEUS STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Certainly if we were to select the portrait of that Congressman which would be most interesting to our readers it would be the portrait of STEVENS.

The subject of our sketch was born in Caledonia County, Vermont, April 4, 1793. Immediately upon his graduation at Dartmouth College, in 1814, he removed to Pennsylvania. Teaching in an academy in that State, he at the same time prepared for the practice of law. He was admitted to the bar in 1816, in Adams County. In 1833 he was elected to the Pennsylvania Legislature, and also in the years following until 1838, and again in 1841. In 1838 he was appointed Canal Commissioner, and in 1842 he removed to Lancaster.

In 1848 Mr. STEVENS was elected a Representative from Pennsylvania to the Thirty-first Congress. He was a member of the Thirty-second, and also of the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congress. In the latter he held the most important position in the House—that which is usually conceded to the leading member—namely, that of Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. In 1862 he was elected to the Thirty-eighth Congress, and subsequently to the Congress which is now in session.

Not a man of great statesmanship though of sincere patriotism, he is inconsiderate in the policy which he urges upon the country, and in his utterances upon important matters of State. He is bold, and even rash in speech. Chief-Justice TANEY had slept in his grave little more than a twelvemonth when, in an important speech in the House, Mr. STEVENS had the boldness to declare that the opinions of the Chief-Justice on negro citizenship had damned him to everlasting infamy, and, he feared, to everlasting flame. In the same speech Mr. STEVENS expressed his impatience at the magnanimity of the Government in its attitude toward the conquered Southern States, and advocated a revival of the policy which had been visited upon the vanquished in the less civilized epochs of Roman history. Mr. STEVENS is more of an alarmist, we think, than becomes an honest statesman. He exaggerates trivialities. Because President JOHNSON simply expressed an opinion in regard to the proposed amendments to the Constitution, Mr. STEVENS saw in this a dreadful usurpation, not unworthy to be compared with that which cost CHARLES THE FIRST his head. We mention these things as characteristics of Mr. STEVENS'S boldness and extravagance. His attempt, afterward, to treat the President's 22d of February speech as a hoax, foisted upon the country by the Copperheads, was equally extravagant as a bit of buffoonery.

That which gives Mr. STEVENS the great power which he wields in the House—a power which is almost irresistible—is his emphatic and earnest denunciation of treason. The country has suffered so much in the past from vacillation, that it greatly admires any thing which looks thorough and straightforward. Mr. STEVENS'S words have a gladiatorial strength which would have done honor to the boldest of Rome's orators. They sway men by their sledge-hammer strokes—they are words of iron. Whatever be the verdict of posterity in regard to the wisdom of Mr. STEVENS'S acts and speeches, future generations can not fail to render him the tribute which is always yielded to extraordinary force of character.

THE FENIANS.

WE continue this week to give illustrations of matters connected with the Fenian movement in Ireland and Canada. Apparently very little is being done by the Fenians themselves. We hear a great deal of volunteer drilling and parades in Canada directed against Fenians, but we are not aware of the fact that there has been found a Fenian in arms, Ireland has been put under martial law and the habeas corpus act suspended—and yet there has not been the first shot fired, nor the first act of overt rebellion committed. We smile when we remember the protracted howl of indignation which all England raised when, in the midst of the most serious rebellion which history records, we suspended the act of habeas corpus. It also excites a smile to read the indignant comments of the principal Canadian journals on the neutral attitude assumed by our Government toward the whole affair. The British are pronouncing most emphatically to-day the profound and instructive maxim which they have always pronounced to all the other peoples of the world: "Do as we say, but not as we do!"

It is reported that STEPHENS, the Head Centre of the Fenian Brotherhood, has escaped from Ireland. It is now several weeks since he escaped from Richmond Bridewell prison, of which we give an illustration on our first page. This prison is a Government establishment, and is also a house of correction for male and female convicts. Weaving is the principal employment of the males; those sentenced to hard labor are put to the tread-mill. The prisoners, on being discharged, are paid one-third of the earnings of their labor. This prison, as well as others in Dublin, is full of Fenians.

Arrests continue to be made all over the country. Eleven men charged at Skibbereen, on 28th February, with being concerned in the Fenian conspiracy, were brought to Cork next day, and lodged in the county jail. We give on the same page with Richmond Bridewell prison an illustration of these prisoners entering the jail. Our illustration on page 212, representing the Canadian Volunteers resting after their drill, speaks for itself.

INSIDE.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XIII.

MRS. DR. WARNER had remarked to her husband only yesterday: "Dr. Warner, will you tell me what we are coming to? Flour forty dollars a barrel, sugar four pounds for a dollar, salt twelve cents, coffee one dollar, molasses two dollars and a half, lard forty cents, chickens fifty cents, eggs one dollar, butter a dollar and a quarter—those fiendish Yankees! And not a calico in town under a dollar a yard, domestics a dollar and a quarter, shoes ten dollars, a paper of pins five dollars! If I only had all the Yankees right in front of a cannon—Lincoln and all—loaded to the muzzle, and could shoot that cannon off, I could die happy. And there's snuff, not a grain of it to be had!"

MRS. Warner stopped; words failed to express her indignation. In fact the English language had long since been used up by Mrs. Warner. Its very strongest words had been hurled by her so long and so continually upon the heads of her invaders that they had become insipid and meaningless to her. It is weeks now since she has first remarked that, if she but could do so, she would with her own hands send the North into atoms so small that Omniscience itself should never find them, nor Omnipotence itself put them together if found.

From Colonel Ret Roberts's last speech that was; but even that had become language too feeble to express her loathing and abhorrence. Having said fifty times a day that the Yankees were worse than devils, and that even hell was a punishment too light for them—said this in all possible inflections of the idea, what else could be said? Even MRS. Warner was conscious of a sense of exhaustion.

As to the Doctor, what had he to do but to be as little at home as possible, put in some word of flattery wherever his conscience and a lull in the storm permitted, and so endure? The Doctor agreed in all the fulminations of his wife upon those who had brought about the ruin of the country, with this slight difference only—that the Xantippe of his bosom located these authors in Washington, and he located them in a somewhat lower latitude. When the infinite diversity of sentiment between the Secessionists and the Union people at the South during the war is considered, the wonder is, not at the alienation that existed there on that account, but rather that no greater explosion followed. But then there was on the part of the Union people an amazing amount of—what is the softest possible word for dissembling?—and a still more astonishing degree of silence. And there was an ominous meaning in that very silence, taken in connection with the class character of the Union people, hitherto and in all other matters, for forcible and prudence, which disquieted their Secessionist acquaintances exceedingly.

There is MRS. Sorel. The times bring many troubles to her besides the absence of her son at the war. She goes out very little these days. None of the Union people do so any more than they can help. But she meets, as all Union people do, with coldness, sometimes actual denunciation, in company when she does enter it. Often is she under the necessity of entering the small room adjoining her drawing-room, where is little furniture beyond a chair and a table with a Bible upon it; oftener than of old, and she remains there longer in these days. Yet she always comes out from it calmer and in happier mood, if possible, than even in her palmiest days of yore. Nothing can be more placid than the conversations she and Edward Arthur, her guest, hold across the neat little table at breakfast, dinner, and supper; for MR. Arthur is rarely away from home in these days any more than MRS. Sorel. Mrs. Sorel has even to remonstrate with her guest upon his confining himself too closely to his studies.

The truth is, in the absence of the papers, reviews, and new publications of all sorts in which he once delighted, Mr. Arthur has taken to the old English divines in his library, volumes yellow with years and near a yard long, for which he has hitherto found little time. Into these volumes, as into pools pure and deep, he plunges over head and ears, and so forgets the times and himself. Nor are these the only pools into which he plunges. Every morning, to keep as fresh and as strong as possible, he is up and away on his horse to a creek miles off in the dense forest, into which he goes headlong, to return by the time the sun is up, glowing with his bath and the exercise, hopeful of happy days beyond Secession, hungry for his breakfast and for his studies afterward. A little Virgil occasionally; periodic Greek Testament likewise; and Hebrew also, straying away in its elephant tracks far away from Secession, across Canaan, through the rocky gaps of Sinai and Horeb, and on toward Abraham and the Creation.

What with these, the Old Divines, and his exercise, he is preparing sermons having more of the pith and essence of the Gospel in them, leagues away while so engaged from Secession and civil war. It may be only his imagination, but he has an impression that he is just now in special training for a work after Secession is over—some great work in which he is to accomplish more than he has ever dreamed of so far. At any rate he will prepare himself as thoroughly as possible.

Here is a morning, some weeks after his last conversation with MR. Ferguson, when the gallop and the bath before breakfast do not quite suffice. It is in vain after breakfast that, after getting through his lessons with Bobby, he essays the folio of theology. It may be a deep pool at other times, but this morning it seems a frozen one. He can not penetrate beneath, but slips and falls continually on the page on to a surface of ice.

On account of the bells last night! Even from Mrs. Sorel's, three miles away, he could hear the great rejoicing in Somerville—all the bells, all the cannon, all the smaller arms. He woke at midnight with the first stroke of the Methodist bell, by far the largest in Somerville. "If Providence is willing, I am," he said to himself in the act of waking; but there was no more sleep for him that night.

Somerville has been quite despondent of late, and the reaction of joy over victory is immense. Colonel Juggins has a negro boy over at MRS. Sorel's with the paper long before breakfast. MR. Arthur has read it to MRS. Sorel at that meal. Cause for rejoicing, indeed! There have been a series of battles near Richmond lasting several days. M'Clellan has been captured, with his entire army! The gun-boats have managed to escape down James River, but that is all. 60 generals, 140 captains, 30,000 Federals killed, 80,000 captured; stores, batteries, colors without computation! The war is virtually over! Colonel Juggins comes along after breakfast.

"Of that vast army, ma'am," he says to MRS. Sorel, "Bill Perkins was saying last night only 75 privates made their escape, and at last accounts our army was in full pursuit of them!" And Colonel Juggins, brimmed with enthusiasm, insists on reading over aloud the whole paper from end to end to quiet MRS. Sorel washing up the breakfast things.

No, Edward Arthur can not get into the merits of the folio this morning. He evades Colonel Juggins, goes to the stable, saddles and mounts his horse, and rides slowly away he does not care whither. "I runs like a dirty in his mind over and over a. —" If Providence is willing, I am!" Odd pa. of Scripture come to the surface, in his mem. of themselves—" His ways are not as our ; neither are His thoughts as our thoughts. He doeth according to His will in the armies of , even among the inhabitants of the earth. None can stay His hand, or say what doest thou....." And yet if Secession could but have been put down! One country again; one flag again; universal amnesty; peace and prosperity again, firmer, greater than before!" His mind runs over it all as it is: "The success of the great Wrong! The triumph of wicked men! Anarchy—the various North and South! And as it possible, after all, that such men as Lamum, Roberts, Barker, and the long tail of Captain Smithson, Bub Withers, Tim Lamum, and the like are right? Right? Pleasing to God? And all who think unlike them are wrong? their opinions despised? Heaven, and now justly rebuked?" It was partly broken rest the night past, but Edward Ashley will be rode along as if the very foundations of reason and religion were out of course.

ARTHUR AND ALICE AT THE OLD GIN.

"ONE MORE CHANCE, ABOLITIONIST."

The seven years of Chickahominy were days of disaster to you loyal hearts at the North, were they? Believe it, your deepest feelings in regard thereto were not the least because of old servants, "as cheese-cakes and cream-tarts" of the agony of hope deferred, nigh destroyed, in the bosoms of hundreds of thousands of us at the South, loving our common country as much as you. As much as you? Far more. Though trembling for you should lose it, you still possessed it. We at the South, actually stripped of all we loved, of flag and country, were yearning for their return. In our agonized bosom to both, you were as those of the wrecked mariner, who, still holding on to the floating fragments, though they sound to be only a handful of planks, see across those drowning without even that, praying and clutching—ah, how desperately!—amidst the roaring flood.

It is raining heavily, and the rider looks around to find that he has been stopped of in an open road under the roof of an old gin. He has been there before in his excursions. The gin is an abandoned one on the centre of a tract of land, which the furrows, nearly leveled by the rains to a plain, and a fragment of an old rail fence and ditch, which have been once cultivated. There is the screw, too, hard by, its long levers, with their little cap of a roof, idly resting in the open air. The gin-house is caved in. There are scraps of rope, shreds of bagging, great piles of cotton seed blue and steaming in the heavy rain. Yes, many a bale of cotton has been planted and gathered and ginned and pressed and wagoned away from this deserted spot. Edward Arthur is in full sympathy with the scene this morning; how much better to be there just now than in the field of battle, as we are at Mrs. Sorel's. As he alights from and ties his horse to one of the huge posts which support the upper room of the gin-house, he hears a story being open ahead, he is glad he has not to converse with even Guy Brooks this morning. Mr. Ferguson, he—he knows that the Scotchman is that instant in his room there in Somerville contemplating the "Rebellion" which he has justified in its place in his ponderous scrap-book. There is a gleam of satisfaction in the young minister's eye as, in his imagination, that peculiar expression which is that very instant tinging, so to speak, the very tips of the Scotchman's gleaming hair.

But he is to have company at last. There is a galloping of a horse across the old field. It is in ugly ruts, and the rider is under the protecting roof, and is off and shaking the drops from her riding-skirt before he can get to her assistance. She raises her head as he approaches. Of all persons on earth it is the person whom he would most desire to meet just there and then. Of all persons on earth it is just that person whom he would there and then most ardently desire not to meet.

It may be owing to the fact that we have double lobes to the brain and a double set of organs to the heart; but certain it is a man may have in himself two parts, and at the same moment too, a double set of thoughts and emotions —double and contrary, the exact contrast with each other. And it is with a man in such a case as it is with a steamer, say, when the engine on the one side is reversed, and on the engine on the other side backing. Round and round, morally speaking, goes the individual, but not an inch does he advance in the direction steam or no steam. At least Mr. Arthur certainly had, at this moment, just such speed.

But who can undertake to assert what her opinion of the chance meeting in that lonely spot was? If you gather any thing from her blush on first perceiving the gentleman, what you gather to gather from the pallor which, the moment after, left her face in such striking contrast with the black velvet which covered her head, and the black plume which drooped, heavy with rain, down to her cheek? Prompo enough to speak, however:

"All my fault, Mr. Arthur!" she said, gayly. "I have been out for a few days with a friend, Wright, an old school-fellow. I determined to ride home this morning, come what might. Anne told me that there was a road that I thought would get me home first. Mr. Wright is in Somerville; the hands were off in the fields with the horses, so I had to come alone. I deserve it for starting. But I will have my way, mamma says. How came you here?"

Mr. Arthur has but a disjointed reply to make. Disjointed, because he has no reason for having ridden there at all. And because she is so beautiful in the yellow light. He has not seen her, to converse with her, for many weeks now; and she has changed so! It is all in the sex. Boys do not change. The young man of eighteen is very much the individual he was at sixteen, only taller—no coming out of any chrysalis with him.

But here is Alice Bowles. When Edward Arthur removed to Mrs. Sorel's Alice was but a girl—a lovely girl, but only a girl, although Mr. Neely was in the habit of visiting her so often. But to-day Alice Bowles is slightly taller. A pony in the old gin a woman. Her face is full, and her ruddy lip, and clear eye, and gentle yet firm expression, is that of a woman—no longer a girl. She always bore herself in that erect and imperial manner—something about the white brow as if made for a crown—a bend about the neck as of Marie Antoinette among the sans culottes. Before. It was a manner that went and came with her varying moods; but to-day it is herself. It may be the plumed riding-cap she wears; it may be her long riding-dress, which brought up vague memories of grand ladies in their trains at court; it may be it was in the excitement of the ride, which brought her face to glow so; it may be the contrast between the young beauty and the littered gin-house, which she stood and the dilapidation around her; or maybe it was her sudden advent through the dreary morning, and upon the back of the dreary hour, whatever was the reason, she came upon him there very little else to him than an angel from heaven. Had he seen her such in the light, years ago, when she was only the bud of what had now opened into the perfect rose?

There was one advantage he had over her. He had not come upon her in her retreat there. She was the out-of-the-way one. She had come upon him; and, somehow, from the first he had yielded to her the burden of the conversation. She first spoke, and he had only to mutter that he felt, and she felt, he had little more to add. Ah! how she talked, in order to keep from herself—or perhaps any thing else than her riding-whip at the shreds of cotton on the ground, shaking the drops of rain from her hat, or the skirt, smoothing the long smooth hair on each side of her brow.

"And oh, Mr. Arthur, I nearly forgot. What is the news? You were suddenly asked, after all other topics were exhausted. "Anne and I could hear the noise all the way to Mr. Wright's. What great and glorious Something has happened this time?" And she entered on the topic with a sense of indubitable pain, and yet of indefinable pleasure too.

Mr. Arthur related the contents of the dispatches. Quite accurately, too, when he was a wonder in those days. As a general rule it was a thing impossible, quite impossible, to do then; but on this day he did tell the news correctly. The contents of the last dispatch the moment he laid it down, but he never could repeat it accurately. If he was a wonder in those days, it was far more unfavorable to the Confederacy than at best the printed lines warranted. If he was a Secessionist the news he repeated would have very much more encouraging for the Confederacy than even the largest capitals of the sheet just in his hands could be.

"I need not ask your opinion of the news," said his companion, more thoughtfully. "I should be ashamed of you if you did not know from Shiloh—it is partly true and partly false. And you were right. But I am glad you can tell me all. It is a matter from the first, and with all the heart. One could enjoy one's self so!"

"You have a superhension about your brother—?"

"Oh no!" interrupted his companion. "Did not mamma show you—oh! I forgot at the moment that you do not live with us now. No; mamma sometimes has a fear about my brother, but—. He is in Charleston—under arrest, I am sorry to say. There was some Mississippian or Georgian or other from the North, I believe, that he neglected to obey some order, something of the kind, I do not exactly understand it. At any rate, Robert is under arrest. Anne says mamma always is easily falling him—is under arrest in Charleston. Since Rutledge ran out there Anne says she is very much afraid that, as superiors, it is a great pity they can not make it a rule to comply with it. At least mamma always says so," added Alice, with a touch of demure fun at the corners of her rosy mouth.

Her eyes being intent on the particular shred of cotton she was twisting round her whip, the whip upon the ground, Mr. Arthur had an opportunity of looking at her. Poor young fellow! he was so beautiful! so full of life! so full of love! And Secession has put them as far apart—not as the East is from the West; that simillitude is too delicate in these days—but as North and South are the North is from the South.

"You know I have never seen your brother," said her companion, seeing a pause, and with great satisfaction that the rain was beginning to fall heavier than ever. "Is he like you?" And Alice Bowles's Secessionist Alice hastened to finish the question for him.

"A strong resemblance between Rutledge and myself," the latter answered, yes, I dare say there is. We are both of us altogether too impatient of control—much in the habit of having our own way. It is a dreadful defect of character, Mr. Arthur," she said, looking up only for an instant at him, and then continuing to twist cotton, though it was at least "an inch" of "a king," of the unfortunate piece of cotton; "but I do not see that I can help myself. I am not to blame for it. We inherited it from our father, who was celebrated for his fixedness—if there is such a word—and we, of course, have been trained to it from our cradles. If pa had only lived it would have been far better for us both; but you know his indulgence and love for us."

"I for one would not have you otherwise than as you are for the world," Mr. Arthur said, emphatically—only it was to himself, not a syllable of it reaching his lips. And yet she knew as well, in the silence which followed her remark, that he was saying just that as if he had said it aloud.

"Only to think," she hastily added, therefore, "of the thousands of brave men that must have been killed! that is, if there really was any fighting at all in Virginia."

"And of the many thousands that are yet to die in hospital and upon battle-field before this war is over," added her companion. "We read of Rencesvalles and Pontenoy, and the gallant knights dying at Chevy Chase, and all. Yet the simple truth is, old Froissart, whom you remember we read together last summer, tells of no brave gentlemen nobler or braver in every sense of the word than our Southern soldiers. Chivalry boasts of nothing which the South is not equaling every day, and every hour of the day."

"But we of the South deserve and wear the name of Chivalry, Mr. Arthur, only too well," said Alice, after a pause. "I wish I could not think of it as I do, somehow or other, we seem to be as antiquated as Chivalry is, too. As to the nobleness, generosity, courtesy, and valor of our enemies, I think all the world is agreed; but, with all that, I can not help having a vague but painful sense that we are classed by Europe with Chivalry itself. If one half of the feeling of the world in regard to us is admiration, the other half of that feeling is pity. I am afraid it is owing to some book or other which I should never have read; or it may be some natural perversity of my character, but I feel sorry for you, as if our armies, gallant as they are, are warring against—what shall I call it?—against Destiny."

It may have been some improper reading, or it may have been the independence of her nature rebelling against whatever happened to be dictatorial; but it had pained her mother that Alice was not as thoroughly under the rule of the enthusiasm as she desired her to be. Perhaps Mr. Neely had visited her too much—had overdone in his conversation the topic of the hour. However it was, as she loved her mother, she had known Mrs. Sorel too long not to acknowledge to herself the calm superiority of her sense and judgment. It was not her opinion of her mother, beautiful as that impulse was—not that Mrs. Sorel had conversed with her on the great question. No. At least not for months now had she heard a word from her lips upon the merits of the quarrel. In truth, she was partly sorry that those days were the families thrown together. Mrs. Sorel had always spoken frankly on the subject when she spoke at all, and Mr. Neely had decided in her favor. Hinge on the subject as Mrs. Sorel was in her convictions. Feeling ex. Conviction—that was the case at least.

"If you will permit me, Miss Alice," said her companion, "I may be able to explain you to yourself. If you had read and thought as little upon the whole question now convulsing the country as the most of us young people, you—I mean the absence of it—I dare say you would think and feel exactly as they do. Or if, notwithstanding all your reading and reading, your character admitted of your forgetting every thing of the kind, and giving yourself up blindly to the popular enthusiasm, you would be, then, too, you would feel and think, as, for instance, your friend Miss Anne Wright does. I do not mean to hurt you, Miss Alice, but I can not say what I wish to say without seeming to do so," he added, knotting the lash of his riding-whip industriously in front.

"I only wish I was as happy as Anne in her whole-heartedness upon the subject," said Alice. "I love her dearly, you know, as you—I mean I serve she thinks if the Yankees succeed they will actually make her go to the wash-tub for them, and that her father's demand or a field hand of her. I'd like to see them come carrying around out, her father says. Anne says she'll die first. I suppose she will have to eat any dish of her preparing, if I was Mrs. Lincoln, or whoever her future mistress is to be; it would be fair enough, seeing what they are so hasty. But," said Alice, with a laugh. "But, then, there is my dear, dear mother," she added, with sudden gravity.

"Will you forgive me, Miss Alice?" said her companion. "My admiration and affection for your mother are so strong to your own, and I venture to say only this," he continued, gravely, although he saw the color rising in her cheek—"I say only this to the date of your mother's birth you would have felt and thought just as she does to-day. It may be your misfortune, but you will, in many things, differ from your mother. There has been a vast change in the very latitude since then. Look at your mother's miniature, taken when she was a bride. There is—whether we like it or not—a still greater change in the features of men. A process of active intellect—one who reads, thinks, arrives at independent conclusions—can not be the same in opinion who has been a thirty-five years before, unless you lived like Robinson Crusoe on a desert island, or unless you lived exclusively in society on section, like the Chinese, or unless you went—"

"Fast asleep, like Rip Van Winkle," interrupted his companion, laughing. "Dear me, how rains! How mamma will scold me for venturing out from Mr. Wright's! You must excuse me, Mr. Arthur; I am in fault, but I have not to think in these days. I wish I could stop thinking, I'm sure. I would give all I possess for a good drink from the flagon that put Rip Van Winkle asleep!"

"To come out of your cave at last, as he did, and find all the world changed by other hands than your own. Well, perhaps so. And yet if there is indeed a great change for the better to be brought about by other brains and through other hands, I confess I would prefer not to live altogether apart from it. I would like—at least in my happier moments I feel so—to have a heart and a hand in the work. But it is a weariness thing to think upon so steadily. I never felt it more so than to-day."

Although Alice did not look at her companion she knew the less saw the sad pain, and even anguish, upon his face. With a woman's quick insight, however, she saw that the anxiety and uncertainty almost which used to—or which she mouth ago fancied used to—mark the countenance of the young minister, was giving place to a tweold expression of confidence and peace; an expression growing from day to day through great suffering into an aspect of certainty and joy. Yet Mr. Neely was much the handsomest man of thetwo, so fai and re; and full of cordial sympathy with the invaded South.

"If a person does not agree in sentiment with the people of the South what does he stay here for? Evidently he ought to be with that people in whose opinions he agrees. If I was with the Yankees I would go there, and I would stay there. That was Mr. Neely's decided opinion in his last conversation with Alice—another in his last conversation with Mrs. Bowles which Alice was present. Mr. Neely did not mention to Arthur's mother in that conversation—or that he could, of course, have no reference to him; certainly not.

"But suppose, Mr. Neely," Alice had innocently asked, looking up from her sewing—a soldier's shirt it was, one of a dozen made from the cover of her piano, cut up for that purpose as the only material to be had—"suppose you possessed property at the South, valuable property, all the property you owned in the world. I believe it is the certain log of property in the South for a person to leave as you advise; if you held the sentiments you mention, as you have said, as you say, at the sacrifice of all you possessed?"

"I certainly would, Miss Alice," he replied, enduring her look. Perhaps—in such a case Mr. Neely would. But perhaps in such a case Mr. Neely would not, also.

"Then if all persons were now at the North, entertaining the sentiments you do, you would instantly leave the North for the South, giving up all you have to do so?" was Miss Alice. Her beautiful eyes were full upon him. What could he do?

"I would, Miss Alice, I certainly would!" Oh, Mr. Neely! Not to know that you knew, and that she knew, whether you knew or not. But, then, the temptation was so great, to Mr. Neely the greatest temptation possible in the whole world.

"Suppose, Mr. Neely, though you disapproved of the step taken by the South, and agreed in sentiment with the North, in consequence, but stop, by the North, yet you shrank from engaging in actual war upon your own people, or even from being surrendered by such as were, how then?" Alice had asked.

"These are no days for such nice distinctions, Miss Alice," the school teacher had promptly replied. "As one feels and thinks so should he act. A man must adopt one side or the other, and without a spirit of reluctance or shame in doing so. And men will do so whose views are clear. He that is not against us is with us; he that is not with us is against us—plain as the multiplication table, Miss Alice."

Alice really did not know what to reply. But it seemed almost easy to hear this gentleman from New England speaking so freely of We and Us in connection with Southern affairs. The possessive pronoun in all their inflections were used with painful frequency by the Yankee Secessionists. "Our brave boys!" "The way We are whipping Burnside!" "The diabolical designs meditated against Us by the Federals!" and kindred phrases, were more frequent on the lips of men like Mr. Neely from the North than of those who had never been outside the South in their own selves, or in the persons of their associations, since secession was settled.

It seemed somewhat of a coincidence, then, with Mr. Neely's previous remarks, that Mr. Arthur should say now, living Alice's radical doctrine and answering her very thoughts:

"I do not wish to speak of myself. Here in God's providence I am. Not a day, or a moment of the day, that I do not feel how painful a thing it is to be in any public sentiment, especially from the sentiments of those among whom we have lived all our lives, than whom there are none in all the world for whom I honor or love more. I have done my very best to become a Secessionist, but I can not. I have done my utmost to think, at least to those of my father all, the Confederate Government will be a success and a blessing to the South. For my life I can not think so. I am not going to Europe, and if I could I would feel very much like Jonah on his way to Tarshish, stern or no stern. No, I am in circumstances as a minister of the Gospel. So long as I am permitted to do so, I will continue the duties of my office, obeying faithfully the Scripture injunctions as to the atonements over me. I was, I may almost say, in agonies of mind, at first. I am getting used to it. I have written to my wife a letter that I should not have acted otherwise than I have done that I am coming to feel as quiet as mind as a man can be—a happy, quiet gentleness that I never possessed before. And my experience, though I am not so situated as to have correspondence, or the leaves to correspond in the way, with one of them, is that of perhaps thousands of my brethren in the ministry at the South, and, in some respects, of hundreds of thousands of the very best men, all Southern men, and destined to do a great work in and for the South yet. But I am near this hour, Miss Alice. And I am the only Southern man in the whole South entertaining the sentiments I do, I could entertain them not a jot the less for that. It may be my misfortune, it may be my crime, it certainly is my case. And in the future of myself and of my country I am learning to leave the whole in the Hands that are managing it, perfectly satisfied in advance as to the result. You must really excuse me, Miss Alice," he added, with a smile. "It is the first time I have spoken to you thus of myself. I regret you it shall be the last time. It has only happened so, you see. You must endure it as one of the accidents of this rainy day."

But Alice did not hear these last words. It was only a few days ago that she had been reading Milton, and why she knew not, but the lines were passing through her mind as he spoke:

"So spake the seraph Abdiel, faithful found
Among the faithless, faithful only he;
Among innumerable false, unmoved,
Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified,
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal;
Nor number, nor example with him wrought
To swerve from truth, or change his constant mind
Though single."

Her head drooped until the plume of her riding-cap almost concealed her face. But, at last, Edward Arthur had nothing to her of himself which she did not know already, and know fully as well as he did himself. She stood still, occupied with the shred of cotton on the ground at her feet. But no longer cutting at it as before, moving it about with her and thither with the lash of her riding-whip, lovingly, caressingly even, as if it were some living thing which she would not hurt for the world.

"No, but Miss Alice, what I want to know"—Mrs. Warner had said to her in the farmhouse where the ladies met to work for the soldiers only the week before, and it was after a long stretch of remark by Mrs. Warner on the one topic—"what I want to know is just this: do you not believe that the Yankees, invading our country, burning our homes, killing our women and children, are worse than the very devils in hell?"

"How should I know, Mrs. Warner?" Alice had replied. "I have never been to the abodes of the evil spirits you speak of. I never saw a devil in my life. If I was to come upon a person possessed with one, I would keep as far off from —dear me, you must excuse me, I must go and get Mrs. Sorel yonder to give me some more thread."

"I tell you, Dr. Warner," Mrs. Warner remarked, to her husband at supper that night, "there is something wrong about that Miss Bowles. Her mother, Mrs. Bowles, such a genuine Southern woman, too. You are their family physician, and ought to cross me. Because I am so strong for the South you are exactly the opposite" [Dr. Warner demurred, but she was not far from the truth. But Dr. Warner only ate his supper with the shower-bath droop about the head, and nodded no endorsement.

"All our father was a staunch Secessionist years ago," mused Mrs. Warner, aloud, striking her tea-spoon against her empty cup. "And as for the gentleman staying in their parlor, grand enough to look at; only it's a pity he couldn't have left a few more years to his wife and children. There's Ratledge Bowles, Mrs. Bowles is so even. Lastingly talking about. A worthless, drinking, gambling fellow, there in Charleston, if half I've heard about him is true. He'd better be here at home making money for his mother. But he's a good Secessionist, was active in the raising of Fort Sumter there at Charleston. Did Alice ever visit the North?" asked Mrs. Warner, suddenly.

"I believe not," replied her husband.

"Because it always has the worst effect on Southern girls, spending the summer months at the North! I reckon that old cry is over. I never was out of the South! And a far better South, ern man you would be, Dr. Warner, if you had never spent that time in Philadelphia, attending medical lectures. If I only had my way," said Mrs. Warner, for the three thousandth time, "no Southern citizen should ever visit the North on any pretext. Nor Europe either, for that matter: they are all free to rank Abolitionist as they are at the North. Won't recognize us on account of Slavery, Yancey said there in his speech in New Orleans. Or, if I had my way, I'd build a wall a hundred feet high all round the South, in real earnest; nobody should go out and nobody should come in. To think how they used to flood the country with their books and papers and peddlers and things! Hang them all!"

"I am afraid Alice has taken an active part," began the Doctor.

"Presenting that flag? Sewing, and singing at concerts for the soldiers, and all that?" interrupted his wife. "There's something wrong for all that. I began to think so the day she opposed Jane's lottery for the assistance of that regiment. It was against the rules of religion, she said, and there is a law of the country somewhere how she came to know that?—expressly prohibiting it. As if any body would dare enforce such a law these days. And as if Alice Bowles, she himself did not go in for it, and have the meeting to arrange for it in the very church. But, upon my word, we had it out at last. I don't know exactly how it is," said Mrs. Warner, in a lower and more intense tone, peering at her husband with suspicious eyelashes, and shading the tea-spoon at him like the thyrsus of a magician. "It is Mr. Arthur! Haven't I got eyes? Never tell me! And he himself, only two years, now; helping her in her studies, and all that stuff. He's gone to live at Mrs. Sorel's, I know. He doesn't visit at Mrs. Bowles hardly at all. I met their boy Charles on the street and asked him only the other day. I know they sin't engaged, for I asked Mr. Arthur himself when he was here last. But there's something wrong in Alice's mind about Secession, and it came there just in that way, you mark my words. And how people—you among them—will continue to go and hear him preach these days is more than I can understand. For my part I'll just as soon—"

But we have no disposition to share in Dr. Warner's surveillance.

A very smart woman was Mrs. Warner. Long and unwearying investigations into the affairs of others had given her a remarkable power of insight. Who will deny all of her reasonings in this matter? The being a Union man involved, at that period of the war, in general estimation, the being either a fool or a knave. Now Alice could not believe that Mr. Arthur was either; so that her faith in the desperate depravity of Unionism may have thereby been shaken. And there was Mr. Arthur, the old and trusted friend, one whom she had so long loved and esteemed, a South Carolinian too; her sentiments were all against Secession. It only happened that way, too. But was ever fly entangled in a web so terrible? It was Spenser's ever old and forever new Story of Una and the Red Cross Knight in the wider senses. Ah, how dark and brambly the way! Consider this Southern girl—for hers is but one case of how many thousands of her sex! Now on the bosom of the old era, tended by it from birth with its ten thousand tenderest touches; all the deep exercise of early and life-long prejudice repelling her from the bringers-on of the new era; all the warmest sympathies natural to the human heart, with a kindred blood, valor struggling against overwhelming odds: add to this the ever-present force of an almost universal estimate, that the North was drawing over her, with skies so dim and with hints so vague of its coming clearness. Happy are those whose lot it is that they can be—Fate—leaders in their parents, let us instance. Happier still those who live in the centre of the era which follows—the centre of the era of Peace and Restantism, we will say. But the transition period between the two eras—how stormy and difficult all perplexity! In every transition period the perplexity lies not without only—it is within one's own bosom that the difficulty lies, and the bitterness. Easy enough to do the right when a sincere soul but knows the right—the agony is to know with sufficient clearness what is the right.

If one dare plagiarize from Brother Barker in his sketch of finding the Lord, perhaps we might be tempted as we read to let finger and eye linger upon this prophecy as bearing upon the days of Secession: "Let there be light, said in that day that the light shall not be clear nor dark; but it shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord, not day nor night: but it shall come to pass that at evening time it shall be light." Only look in Brother Barker's little book for the fulfilment, for the light was in the two verses immediately before this passage is all worn away. Brother Barker, standing in the path as a humble Christian, with trembling, has kept the fore-finger of his left hand pressed just there, holding on like an anchor to the passage, and he will tell you that he was once about wildly in a tempest of declamation, proving that therein Secession and its glories were set forth as clear as noonday, and that the only inference of judicial blindness upon those who could not see it. Let us do the brother justice; daily prejudice, and the bias of Southern education does refer to Secession, and is it striking, very striking indeed. However, Brother Barker's finger was interposed providentially: you have curiosity to look them up—those sixth and seventh verses of the fourteenth Zechariah—the reverse.

The rain is falling less and less heavily upon the leaky roof of the old gin-house, if the parties within only knew it. Twenty times has the young minister said to himself, No, by the Lord! not neither the time nor the place." But there is something about the drooped head and the lean upon the shoulder, and the shadow of the gloved hand holding the riding-whip, as it toys with the shred of cotton on the dust, that tempts him. He has not yet spoken with the soul, his heart; and how soft and affecting are the tones of the voice when one does so!

"And, next to the blessing of my own conscience, do I desire your approval," he is beginning to say, when Alice raises herself and looks across the field full right in front. She has heard nothing, but a woman's instinct of approaching danger is strong upon her. And at the same time only a couple hundred hundreds of yards away riding slowly toward them. It is strange how swift the sex is in its reasonings and conclusions.

In the instant of seeing the approaching horseman she says, and she says it hurriedly:

"May I ask it as a special favor, Mr. Arthur, that you will mount your horse and leave me? You see the rain is over. Excuse me, but please do. How unfortunate!"

Mr. Arthur hears, with sense of pleasure at the tones, but with surprise at the request.

"I have only to remount and ride off with my request if you only knew why I ask it," she said, still more hurriedly, her eyes upon the horseman, her hand upon his own, pressing his arm.

"Really, Miss Alice," her companion began.

"Oblige me this once, Mr. Arthur," she continued, in tones of entreaty and apprehension. "Yonder is Mr. Wright. You know his character and sentiments. I have a fear that he may be intoxicated—"

"You must excuse me, Miss Alice," interrupted Edward Arthur, "if I cannot at once understand your apprehension, but I can not do as you wish." And a flush almost of anger mounted to his temples.

It was too late. Alice busied herself with her pony, leading him in front of Harper's weekly, who assisted her to mount.

"Why, good-morning to you, Mr. Wright," said Alice to the horseman, who had now reached and halted in tones of gayety intended to contrast with those she had just used. "I will be glad of your escort back to your house. I myself must this morning for home in spite of all Anne could do. But I have got wet; do let us make haste; the rain is over. And she lifted her reins, gathered in her hand as if to start, keeping herself, however, still between Mr. Arthur and the person she addressed.

With an "Excuse me, Miss Alice!" Edward Arthur struck her pony a slight blow with his riding-whip, and Mr. Wright, who had reined in his horse with drunken dignity, sat staring at him face to face.

Alonzo Wright. As refined and agreeable a gentleman as you could meet with any where, when sober. When drunk, a devil incarnate. Long ago had he killed his first man. It was when he was transported, and because he fancied at the time the individual in question, a merry youth of sixteen—Jim Hartley—was looking impertinently at him. Jim Hartley had died a lunatic since then. But when he did become intoxicated the passion for killing some one again came over him. Some twenty had just passed of his drunkenness. It all took place before Mr. Wright removed to his present home; in fact he had come hither on that account: Jim, unless rumor lied more even than it usually does, if Jim Hartley was the first he was by no means the last man Mr. Wright had killed. Every body knew Alonzo Wright: and when drunk Nero on his throne had not more reason to dread him. Then the rest of them as did not fly the spot. Shunned as his house was by almost every one except a servant or five, it was on that very account that Alice had felt specially drawn to poor Anne Wright, her school-fellow, and hence her visit.

As Alice anticipated, Mr. Wright was drunk, very drunk. How could it have been otherwise in Somerville during the first week of such glad news? There had been a military prohibition on the sale of liquor in the place for several weeks past; but the announcement of Lee's surrender, as they styled it, "the blockade on whisky" to celebrate the glorious victory over M'Clellan. Men who never drank before got drunk in Somerville last night. Men whose whisky had been cut off for the months past drank last night in Somerville the full value of long abstinence. Even Lamum was shocked at the state of Somerville last night, Tim Lamum, his nephew, waiting each moment to take his office hour in the experiences of his first "regular spree." And Mr. Wright, having an entire grocery abandoned to him during the war, had no lack of whisky. No one. He was riding home with an unsatisfied craving in his heart, his loaded revolver ready for any emergency that might arise, and the wrath slumbered in his bosom against whatever negro might come out to hold his horse as he should dismount at the gate. Not a negro in the place, however, but will find pressing business on the remotest part of the plantation when he is known to be "Lonzo Lonny is comin'."

Such is Alonzo Wright, a slight-built, sandy-haired, paled-eyed man, who now sits his horse gazing upon the young minister, of whose presence he was not aware until Alice and her pony had separated between them.

It all takes place as in a second of time.

"And who are you?" Mr. Wright says, with a sudden blackness in his eyes and voice.

Edward Arthur knows perfectly well who and what is Alonzo Wright is. More than once has he been received with the most gentlemanly courtesy by Mr. Wright in visiting there. But that was months ago. Besides, it was under Mr. Wright's own roof. It stands as he is, were it under that roof he was now meeting Mr. Arthur, he would have treated him as a gentleman and a guest. But he is not in his own house; Mr. Wright is drunk, and this Mr. Arthur is strongly suspected of being a Union man. Nothing more discovered by Mr. Wright even when sober than that.

"My name is Edward Arthur," replies that gentleman; but his manner is stern from his knowledge of the questioner and of what may follow.

"A preacher and an Abolitionist," says Mr. Wright, with a volley of oaths.

Mr. Arthur has nothing to reply, but has turned to the side on which his horse is tied, and is slowly unfastening him to return home.

"And now you are going to run away from what you Yankees always do. Hold on!" exclaims Mr. Wright, in a tone such as only men like those of his class can use. "Get out of the way!" he adds, with a cut of his whip across the head of Alice's pony, which she is endeavoring to ride between them. He hears not a word of Alice's entreaty, not an ear of her existence. His eyes, almost shut, are fastened upon his prey.

"Leave here, I tell you!" drawing his revolver from his girdle as he speaks, "I've got one boy away in the army fighting the Yankees. Let no one of you remain in that bright air Richmond. If there is any thing in this world I would like to do this morning it is to kill an Abolitionist. Leave here!" Hurrah for Jeff Davis!' or you are a dead man."

Knowing his man, hearing that indescribable tone in his voice, Edward Arthur had no doubt that he meant what he said.

"Do, Mr. Arthur, for my sake, my sake, my sake," Alice says, upon repeating, while endeavoring to force her pony between them. But pony fears Mr. Wright's whip and shies off.

Unarmed, the thought of springing upon him before he can shoot, there is no alternative.

"Fire when you please, I will die first!" he replies, as pale, as cold, as rigid as a statue.

There is the sharp crack of a revolver, with Alice's shriek on the air. It may have been that Mr. Wright has been drunk too long, or that there was an extra quantity of strychnine in the whisky of last night; for the generous liquor is sometimes corrupted in the course of blockade—but the bullet sings by Mr. Arthur's left ear, and he stands erect and unhurt. And next, what? He thinks of springing upon the desperado, but he knows there are five more charges in his weapon! Mr. Wright curses his horses and again presents his weapon.

"One more chance, Abolitionist," he says, "Hurrah for Jeff Davis and the Confederacy!—or run with it!"

The young minister has no reply at all to make this time. Pale, cold, rigid he fastens his eye, glittering as it is, upon that of Mr. Wright. No attention at all does that individual pay to Alice, who has leaped from her pony and stands on the side pulling at the bridle-rein, now at rest, weeping and entreating. He keeps his weapon leveled at the forehead of his intended victim, his finger on the trigger full a minute.

There is neither flinching of muscle nor quailing of eye there. Mr. Wright deliberately lowers his weapon. "What! he questions, in an oath, "you are as brave as a man can be. I'll do you that justice if you are an Abolitionist. I could not kill even a Southern lunatic if I no was looking me as straight in the eyes. We'll cry quits if you say so;" and he rose in his stirrup to replace his weapon in confidence in its sheath at his waist.

"No, Sir," said Mr. Arthur, sternly, "I am not a specially brave man that I am aware of. But it happens to me just now that I am not particularly in love with this world. I am, I trust, prepared for the other. Besides, I am not in your hands or in those of any other man; now, as always, I am in the hands of my God."

"It looked very much as if God had turned you over to me just now; one touch of my finger on that trigger, and you would be dead in the other world sure enough. However, we won't quarrel about it. Ah, this is you, Miss Alice? Are continue," is it? You must really pardon me any rudeness. But we do not capture a M'Clellan and his entire army every day"—the gentleman instantly for now in the right humor. "Shall we ride? Anne will be glad to see you."

"Thank you, Mr. Wright," said Alice, who was by this time seated again on her pony, "I believe I will ride on home; Mr. Arthur will be kind enough to escort me. Good-morning" and the two rode slowly off, leaving Mr. Wright carefully buttoning up his waistcoat to protect his cherished whisky-flask from the drenching but what he ought use to it yet. And long sits Mr. Wright upon his horse, looking after them as they ride slowly, decidedly in reference to the course he has pursued in failing to kill some one, especially the chance, in his way of thinking, of having to kill a Union man! Dissatisfied Alonzo Wright is with the event and with himself. Stop! for the moment of the rascals have been up to something on the place since he left yesterday. Want to be free, do they? Give them good cause to run one of them—and with appetite quickened by new hope of food, Mr. Wright spurs from under the old gin, and rides off in search of his chief victim.

Alice rode along the miry way in silence, weeping and mirth struggling with and neutralizing each other to produce a sort of hysteria. She knew little these two can find to say to each other under the circumstances all the way to Mrs. Bowles's front gate, and even then. Mr. Arthur is almost haughty in his bearing, certainly very cold and quiet. And so, assisting her from her pony, they part. Mr. Arthur declining to enter the house on the plea of neglected studies.

Yet all the way to Mrs. Bowles, and when he rushed with it to the latter, one of those fatal fiancies that his companion cits of his own with a form more erect, and the morning as of a new purpose kindled within her. Ah, her fancy, I dare say," he said to himself as he rode homeward, "only fancy!"

"Proof! For any one to speak of my being proud!" Alice says to herself, as she stands in her room, her hand vacantly and mechanically about the fastening of her hat. Unconscious of herself utterly, because so conscious of another, and that other not Mr. Bowles's children, immaculate Secessionist though Mr. Neely is! Four years since the writer was seen a copy of Tennyson about a copy of some hundreds of miles, from memory let the lines be ventured:

"Love took up the harp of life, struck on all chords with might, Smote the chord of self, which, trembling, passed in music out of sight."

CIRCULAR STREET, PEKIN.

Our engraving on page 216 will give the reader some idea of the extraordinary bizarre aspect of the capital of the Celestial Empire. Can any thing be more strange and fantastic to European eyes than this Circular Street of Pekin? We can hardly realize the multifariously quaint and grotesque peculiarities of objects here before us. The occupants of Pekin to an immense fair especially holds good in streets such as this, composed of shops where the custom every day is to attract customers from your neighbor by banging out signs of all forms and descriptions, and in every direction, representing the kind of articles, goods, and merchandise sold within, and bearing names and announcements written in the picturesque Chinese characters, yellow, in gilt, or red, or black, or calico, till the street is more gay than a fleet dressed with flags for a Royal reception; signs, indeed, of every color and every pennants into the street; or suspended obliquely, like a barber's pole; or dangling from a flag-staff like a streamer or the French ordinance; or perched on the top of a mast; together with a thousand other devices of inexhaustible grotesqueness. Add to all this the ceaseless irregularity of the facades of the tent-like houses with horned eaves like a pagoda; then people your caravanserai with the strangest race on earth, and you may form an idea of the Quadrant of Pekin.

Pekin consists of two cities—a northern and a southern.

VIEW OF VOLCANIC ERUPTION AT SANTORIN, WITH THE TOWN OF THERA IN THE BACK-GROUND.

VOLCANIC ERUPTION AT SANTORIN.

OUR American Consul at Athens, Mr. CANFIELD, sends us two photographic views of the extraordinary convulsion which recently took place at Santorin, in the Grecian Archipelago. We give a few extracts from Mr. CANFIELD'S letter, followed by a detailed description of the marvelous event, translated from a Greek paper:

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

ATHENS, February 23, 1866.

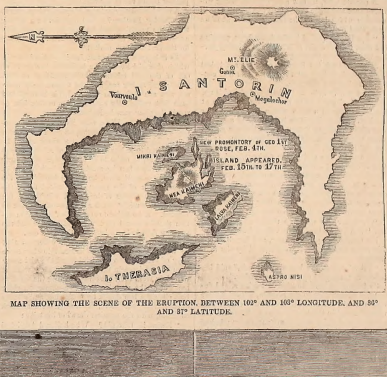
I send you herewith two photographs of New Kaimeni, taken by the best photographer here, who accompanied the Commission sent by the Government to see the eruption of the submarine volcano, of which the inside coasts of Therasia and Santorin form the internal walls of the crater. I also send you a very perfect map made by an officer of the Topographical Engineers, on which are indicated the part of the island sunk and the new elevation.

The view showing the act of eruption was taken from Old Kaimeni, and where you see a smooth sea, along the edges of which thin vapor is rising, there has now grown up a little island. The new promontory is a tongue of land running out between two little inlets or bays, in the larger of which the little island, and on the smaller the promontory, George I., has sprung up. Beyond the smoke may be seen the town of Thera, about 2½ miles from the eruption, on the island of Santorin.



The other photograph represents the part of the island which is sinking, and the white house in the water up to the windows shows their peculiar style of building, which the Santorins, with their Boeotian facilities, have succeeded in inventing. The black mass, forming the principal object in the picture, is the new promontory now at rest. The pools in the sinking portion of Kaimeni are the lakes of fresh water mentioned in the following description by DECIGALA.

This description is a translation of the first observer, J. DECIGALA, published in Greek in the newspapers of Syra. It is interesting as being the production of the only man on the island of Santorin who can read and write.

An ex-minister of the marine, who came from Syra, told me, as the latest news, that heavy shocks of earthquake had taken place at Santorin, and the whole gulf seemed one mass of smoke. The Government has sent a Commission to investigate the subject. I saw to-day letters from two members who agree in minuting every thing up to this date as merely professory, and give it as their opinion that a new island will rise, bursting forth with magnificent eruptions of lava streams.

The rock I have seen from these eruptions seems halfway between basalt and lava, is black, and on the fracture presents minute crystals of feldspar.

In the description which follows the reader should bear in mind that a metre nearly corresponds to the English yard, being 39⅓ inches.

DECIGALA'S ACCOUNT.

To the Monarch of the Cyclades:

SANTORIN, January 31, 1866.

A remarkable phenomenon has for several days occupied the attention of the inhabitants of Santorin. On the 13th instant a low rumbling sound was heard from time to time in New Kaimeni, and especially at the place called Vatyeni, where are the mineral waters. At the same time stones detached from different parts of the island were constantly falling about. Early morning of the 19th cracks could be seen on the walls of buildings, as also in the ground and the newly erected quay. Toward noon the rumblings begin to be more frequent, till they sounded like successive discharges of artillery. In the little harbor of Volcano the sea was violently agitated, and an innumerable multitude of bubbles rose incessantly from the depths. At the same time we could see on the surface and on the borders white vapors giving an odor of sulphur. The afternoon of the same day the boiling of the sea increased, and the ground on the beach commenced gradually to sink down. The morning of the 30th, about five o'clock, flames, forming a conical fire of 10 to 15 square metres at the base and 5 to 6 in height, rose from the sea on the east. An hour they entirely disappeared. We then went upon the spot with an engineer and some others to make a minute examination of the phenomenon. We then saw that the whole southern part of New Kaimeni was covered with ashes. A steam, commencing at the western shore near the port of St. George, was pursuing itself over the land and divided in two equal portions the conically formed hill and the mountain behind. Other considerable vapors were running from east to west, others from north to south, expanded like a cloud over parts the ground of the whole southeastern portion of the island. This land, which is formed only of the earth but of an accumulation of volcanic stones and ensue, or rather of the powder of basaltic rocks, was already covered in all its upper portion with vegetation. We saw here for little lakes of pure water, whose surface was receding; for having only a moderate largeur of all, which had hardly an area of 12 square metres, we saw no more than five centimetres within four hours. We advanced toward the focus of the volcanic region, and proceeded to explore other like lakes of larger ages. White and suffocating vapors arose from the agitated sea, and from the lakes we saw new fissures of greenish color, proving that the vapors which arose were of hydro-sulphuric and hydro-phosphoric nature. The ground was constantly shaken, though it subsided very slowly, directly toward the interior of the crater of the eruption. The depression of the ground was much more perceptible on the western part of the island. Between this last shown a depression of hardly three metres, while the western portion had a still greater extent in width. The subsidence, as I have said, took place insensibly and gradually, and without shaking the surface of the water at the moment of our arrival and that of our departure, we saw that in the space of less than the toll of the bell of a watch-glass had sunk sixty centimetres (about three-fifths of a yard).

The sea was agitated and red, like water containing a great quantity of pulverized ochre. Its temperature was that of the rest of the sea, but it tasted bitter, and when taken up in a tumbler appeared turbid. Between 10 and 11 A.M. there was very great, and doubtless came from the abundant springs existing in the crater of Jera, which, mixed with force from its depths, accompanied with much noise from the commotion with violence. About noon of the same day we felt it Santorin a slight shock.

The night of the 30th and 31st the sea around New Kaimeni was milky white on its surface, and on the interior of the bay it appeared as though it were boiling. The water color which continued some minutes, while in the harbor of St. George a violent agitation was formed which carried the vessels from going out, especially against the south wind, which drove directly into the entrance of the port. The four lakes formed in the morning were a little larger, and five other appeared very clear and were of a round form appeared, while the subsidence of the ground gradually continued, but more rapidly on the shore of the new island chosen, where it was estimated at 10 centimetres per hour. All the mountain buildings of the island were full of cracks; the old fractures have increased and new ones made their appearance, but always on the southern part of the island, and nowhere beyond the port at St. George. The low communication between the old and the new land by the Volcano continues to take place at intervals. The boiling on the sea continues likewise, and on the 31st there was such that it rendered the approach of boats impossible. The odor of sulphur was perceived by the crew of the ship at Santorin. The gulls and other sea birds, which on the first day had assembled in numerous flocks in the middle of the land and flying fish which floated on the surface of the gulf, did not appear on the 31st.

In the night of the 31st and 32d we saw from time to time flames of a red color, and principally at the end of the east, whence in the morning there was seen to proceed without interruption a thick cloud of white but dense. The subsidence of the ground continued with the same shortness of the 30th of the fractures, and particularly those of the conical hill, enlarged sensibly. The water in all the lakes, with the exception of one, became muddy, and bitter, and the sea-water of Volcano smelling bad, as also the water of the neighboring river, which was bitter, and the heat transmit themselves beyond the chasm to the west of the new island, under which appeared to be the focus of the volcanic action. The heating of the sea has reached to about the entire Gulf of Santorin. During night the odor and smoke became more intense, and at times red flames appeared in the centre of volcanic region, and the smoke became thicker and of deeper color. These flames, which successively diminished, reappeared at noon and a half, after which they disappeared, and we see in the same place a white column, which gradually rose.

I am going on the spot to examine there there curious phenomena.

F.S.—N. C., Jan. 25, 11.30 A.M.—The reef has been changed to an island, in which I was unable to examine very closely on account of the temperature and the boiling of the water. I approached, however, to within a mile within a distance of ten paces, and could observe all with perfect exactness. The right is a mountain of rock and the more agreeable ones, without the least danger, on one on the island gradually increasing. The water, although thick, and rising in abundance from all parts of the rising land, has not undergone a disagreeable change nor a very high temperature, and in no way impedes the respiration. You are to me to finance to be seen, and the border of foots destroyed by the subsidence, or belonging to the first island, the same which in the night of the 30-day raised with the bottom of the sea, appear attached to the two parts of the island. Between the centre of the action in the midst of the smoke without being at all burned. There are the sayings of the ground of the island. There is no noise. The stones are not thrown up into the air but the island develops itself simply in the form of a bubble, from inside to outside, with such rapidity that I can not compare with the eye the gradual increase, although unable to distinguish in what manner the stones and the earth are successively added.

Now, as I am writing, I estimate the height of the islet at from 15 to 20 metres, and its size 30 to 40 metres in length by 5 to 10 in breadth. The subsidence of the neighboring portion to-day to have increased sensibly. The water of the entire Gulf of Santorin is, so I perceive, colored and thick. The principal source of the eruption is, likewise, while on the spot, where the eruption takes place, and in a water of Volcano, close by, and the coast. It is in a state of constant effervescence. It is evident that these volcanic eruptions have a very powerful local influence on the island of Santorin, except a slight shock, which preceded it at five o'clock the same morning by the 30th instant. The meteorologic condition has never experienced any change, and these phenomena, in the midst of calm, or when violent winds were blowing from different points of the compass, or even amid the rain, they have continued to operate alike.

F.S.—N. C. has not increased to nearly the size of the former size. It directs itself apparently away from the place where it made its appearance. I do not believe the volcanic eruption has ever shown itself so active and so terrible since the year 1707. God grant it may remain so until its close!

Jan. 26.—Night might the island has continued to form itself with the same tranquillity. It is now 200 metres long, so as to present a great heap of burning coals. The smoke which rises is equally horizontal, so that I think it will be compared to a comet's tail. Some of the islands present a phosphoric gleam, and from the great chasm at the summit of the central hill rise at intervals reddish flames.

4 A.M.—The smoke augments in proportion to the size of the growing island, which is continually rising, but not with the same rapidity as yesterday. The shaking of the ground appears to have ceased. The color of the sea are as yesterday—those of the whole of ochre and troubled. Fortunately the day is fine. At 6 A.M. I am on the spot to admire again from the near at spot the beautiful and magnificent sight.

J. L. CARDALA.

AN APRIL FOOL.

IRA HART had been foolish enough, in the first place, to leave his father's pleasant farm on the edge of the village of Sparkville, and come to New York City in search of employment. Setting aside the motives which do mostly influence young men to leave farm-life and seek the city, Ira had a good motive-settle the question of folly for a good many young men—it was foolish in our friend Ira to come to a city where thousands of young men are "as thick as flies in a molasses cask," and expect to get a recognition of his merits on the strength of his own honesty of purpose. Ira found this out, and was constantly doing this foolish thing, and constantly repenting it, as Ira was very much inclined to do after there was no need for repentance. The little money he had brought to the city with him was nearly all gone—notwithstanding he had lived very plainly—and still up to any employment. M'Pack-er's boarding-house, instead of running up hill hills.

It was the first of April, and Ira came out of his boarding-house and walked up the street, debating with himself as to what direction his efforts for the day should take; for he was unrelaxing in his endeavors to obtain employment, day after day.

He had not gone three rods before he was aware of being an object of interest to a cluster of juvenile who danced and grinned delightedly in his vicinity. Encouraged by the first effort of the day, he put his hand behind him and quietly removed a slip of white paper from his coat-tail, to which it had been fastened with a pin.

"April fool!" sang out the boys; and the inscription on the paper corroborated their view of the case.

A minute later, he saw a poorly-clad young woman pass and stoop over, about to pick up a small package which lay on the sidewalk, and which had manifestly been abandoned.

"April fool!" yelled half-a-dozen boys, popping out from behind the ash of tricks, and pointing jeering fingers at the stooping girl.

She drew back her hand as quickly as if it had been burned, and looked up with a flush of confusion on her sad, thin face.

Ira went idly up to the package and picked it up, reminded of the pranks of the urchins, hilarious at the appearance of a fresh victim so quickly after the last. Supposing it to be a paper of pins, he was about to empty it into the mud of the gutter, when something in its feeling deterred him. It did not feel like pins.

He opened one end of the package, and found that it contained a little red shoe—a baby's shoe—another with the mate to it, and eight quarters of red rutile. Evidently the boys knew nothing of the contents of the package, which some one had accidentally dropped, and which the girl had taken for them brave enough to open on the first of April.

"Whoever tied up these things so neat," said Ira, "tied up the package for me."

He turned the package over, and found on one side some writing, nearly obliterated by the mud and wet.

"I'll take it to the house and dry it," said he, and then, perhaps, I can read the writing."

So he walked back to the kitchen, and descended straightway to the kitchen, knowing there was no fire in the house that mild day except that which burned in the kitchen stove. The girl was gracious, and did not resent the intrusion; indeed she wiped a chair with her apron, and placed it in the range for friend. Bridget lacked a civil word as well as her betters, and Ira was always courteous to servants—a result of his early training, perhaps.

At last, I am sure but Ira was more at home in the kitchen than he was in the parlor up stairs, where the boarders congregated—and with reason, for airs, especially Mr. Strutt, the dandy bachelor of 35, who furnished the waggery for Mrs. M'Packer's establishment at Sparkville.

The mud being dried, Ira was able to read the inscription on the paper: "J. G. Bandrol, No. — Broad Street, City." Broad Street, the owner of the package in the counting-room of a large grocery wholesale house, at the designated number.

Mr. Bandrol looked up with eager hands.

"Where did you find it?"

Ira told him.

"You can save the notice in the Herald this morning; I suppose?"

"No, Sir; I saw no notice."

"What! Did you not see the reward offered?

"I didn't come for any reward, Sir," said Ira, moving away. "But—" he stopped and turned about, "I guess I am back, Sir, now, and if you've any work for a young man. That's an honest question that I'm asking at every chance I get."

"No; there is no work now," said Mr. Bandrol.

"Then I bid you good-day, Sir."

"Hold on!" said Mr. Bandrol. "You'll be looking up the notice and coming back after the reward. You may as well take it now. Here!"

He handed it to Ira, who said:

"Reward!" said Ira, turning the clean greenback over and over in his hand. "No, Sir," handing back the bill, "I prefer to earn my money."

Mr. Bandrol looked at him with some surprise. A clerk sitting at a tall desk exchanged a wink with a fellow clerk, which said, as plainly as words, "Here's a green one!"

"There!" said Mr. Bandrol, without taking the money, "you better run along. If you don't want it you can give it to the poor. If it's any consolation to you—you seem to be a supersensitive young man—I'll say that you've saved me a hundred dollars or any man's money for that little mess of rubbish. My wife has nearly cried her eyes out over its loss. Go along; give the money to the beggar-woman on the corner if you like."

"Very well, Sir," and Ira left the office.

"John," said Mr. Bandrol to a porter, "what young man back?"

John obeyed.

"Give me your address," said the merchant to Ira; "if I hear of any place for you I'll send you word. What do you want to do?"

"I can keep a set of books, Sir," said Ira, "or I can roll a hogshead or shoulder a barrel. I'm not afraid of work."

Mr. Bandrol handed him a pen, and motioned him to write his address on a slip of paper, which Ira did in a clear round hand. The merchant looked at it, nodded, and put the slip away.

I know very well what nine out of every ten young men—whether city or country born—would have done if they had found Mr. Hart's little piece of good luck; but Ira was a trifle peculiar, you see—and that is the reason why I happen to have a story to tell. Ira threw a cent in a while in a game and peculiar young man to relieve the dead level of commonplace young men, I don't know what would become of the story-reader. I'm sure.

The absurd and extraordinary idea which found a lodgment in this young man's brain, as he stood at the corner of Wall and Broad streets, thinking over his April Fool adventure, was something like this:

"That pale-faced girl who was about to pick up the little package would have picked it up if those boys had not yelled 'April fool' at her, and if Bandrol had not been there. She would have returned it, and got this money that's now in my pocket. By good rights then the money is hers; and I'll not feel at ease in my mind if I don't know as I ever saw my duty plainer before me in my life.

A regular-built greenhorn this young chap, wasn't he, Charley Gray?" And now he'll go poking round the neighborhood looking for that girl, like a needle in one of Mother Hubbard's haystacks. Big thing for the first of April, ain't it?

As it happened, however, Ira knew the house in which this girl lived. He had seen her go in at the door of the house building three or four times; and as her manner was uncommonly modest, and she looked so very sad, this circumstance had made a deep impression to enable him to recall the place now he had occasion.

But in that building, with its single entrance, four in front, and perhaps a score of different house-holds—perhaps more than a score; and if he had entered it in search of each of all those doors in the block, in order to find this particular young woman. So when he reached the building, as he had along toward sunset, he stood on the opposite side of the street, and looked up at the dizzy seven stories of brick and window, in the hope that he would catch a glimpse of the face he wanted. If he failed to see her Ira had a dim notion that he would go through the house and ray at every door in search of the right one.

While he stood there he became conscious that he was again an object of interest to a certain area boy of vivacious disposition, who had strayed from the package in the morning. They were, it was plain from their gestures, relating the sportive incident of the morning to a new-comer, an older boy, clearly a boot-black by profession, and a bully among these youngsters. Presently the boot-black sang out, with the full swell of his lusty lungs:

"Hurhat! Who did? Who hollered April fool at her? I'll whack 'im in de smoot fer it!' Who hollered at her?"

Ira caught this up quickly. He went over to the boys.

You know that girl who was going to pick up that package this morning just before I picked it up?"

"Yas," said the boot-black; "you bet I know 'er. Didn't she give me some bully soap when I fed her? I'll whack any feller what hollered at her."

"That's your sort!" said Ira, diplomatically, patting the boy on the shoulder; "but just show me to her door, and I'll not go at whacking for her."

"Well, I donno," said the boy, looking Ira over with a preciously knowing squint, and seeming to hesitate. "Yer a stranger to me, mister. But," he suddenly added, "I guess yer ain't on it, neither—don't mind! The young lady ain't to home, though."

"Sho-ut?"

"No. She goes out er sewin'-day-times, an' stays home nights. Come now't-night 'bout seven an' I'll be here—I will, sure."

This conversation took place in the doorway of the tenement building in question; and Mr. Strutt, our hero's fellow-boarder, who was one of the tenants, beheld the participants therein as he passed the corner of the street on his way to dinner.

"I see you in the doorway of a mansion in an adjoining street to-day, Mr. Hart," said Strutt, at the dinner-table, wishing to hit friends as much as to say he had seen him. "Have you any relations in the country now; "had you been calling on some friends or relatives there?"

"No; that is—no relations!" said Ira, blushing violently, as he was fatally prone to do when directly addressed in the presence of that elegant conducted ladies and gentlemen at Mrs. M'Packer's.

"I mean the tenement house in ——Street, where I saw you a few minutes ago," said Strutt, smiling, blandly. "Friends there?"

"No," said Ira, eating his dinner industriously.

"Ah, only friends?" persisted the tormentor.

"No, there's nobody there I know in particular," said Ira, still blushing deeply.

"Then, Mrs. I'Packer," said Strutt, laying down his knife and fork with much solemnity, and addressing the majestic lady at the head of the table, "I fear we are about to lose a fellow-boarder. I suspect Mr. Hart is looking for apartments elsewhere."

At this surprising scintillation of wit a titter ran round the table at Ira's expense.

"It's none of your business what I was doing there, Mr. Strutt," said Ira, with a sudden energy that drove the blood all out of the dandy bachelor's face with a rush, "but since you've made me think before all these people when I've really nothing to think at, I'll tell the whole story."

Whereupon Ira related his April Fool adventure, and how he was going to see the girl to-night, and why her the money that belonged to her.

Mr. Strutt was in ecstasies over this story; it was the most refreshing thing he ever heard, of its kind, really—cucumbers and lettuce and things wouldn't be a circumstance to it; he cracked several brilliant jokes in rapid succession on the subject.

Somehow Mr. Strutt's jokes did not meet with their usual success on this occasion. The majority of the boarders were positively touched with respect for this young man's remarkable verdancy—there was an odor of rustic, natural simplicity about it to be more disagreeable.

After tea that evening Ira went around into —— Street, and found the little boot-black practicing a double-shuffle on the steps of the tall tenement house.

"I told Miss Harvey yer was comin'," said the boy; "an' she sayed p'raps yer was her brother. 'S that so?"

"No," said Ira, "I'm not her brother," and he thought again of Mr. Strutt's witticism about "relatives."

Ira Hart had never seen poverty like that which met his gaze on being ushered into the room where Miss Harvey lived; together with her invalid mother, as afterward appeared. Ira looked about her depth in New York, but he had never seen it. This was bad enough, in all conscience. No carpet on the floor; no curtains to the windows; no picture or ornament, even the cheapest, to relieve the barren aspect of the walls; and all the furniture in the room was a bed, a table, a chair, and a little stove. There was a cupboard which let into the wall, and as the door stood ajar, Ira saw a meagre collection of dishes—like the stove, perhaps cooking-utensils. Dealiness drew every where.

The girl had met our hero with a face full of inquiry, and placed the only chair for him, saying in a whisper:

"Please to sit down, Sir, and please don't wake up mother for she's sleeping very heavy."

This referred to a thin, white-faced woman who lay asleep on the bed, evidently far gone with consumption.

Ira looked about him with his deepest blush. He felt as if he had no right to look upon this poor girl's dire poverty, and seemed to have no right in looking on her bare feet—a necessary exposure which he had no business to cast his eyes on.

"I—I've come to—to—to give you your money," stammered Ira, standing up and tugging at his pocket-book; "here's some money that belongs to you," and he handed her the two dollar bill.

"No," said the girl, looking with, strange eagerness at the money; "it is some mistake. It does not belong to me."

"Oh, but you don't understand," said Ira.' And then he explained what the reader already knows.

"Oh, how good!" said the girl, clasping her hands, as Ira's hand and pressing it to her lips. "God must have sent you to us. We are in sore need. I was trying to get my mother's cup."

Tears of gratitude filled the girl's blue eyes, and as she spoke they began to grow larger and larger, and had to be kept out of his left sleeve and wipe it repeatedly.

"Can I—can I do any thing else for you?" said he. "I should be glad if I could serve you any way."

The girl looked him in the eyes, and gave him a smile so sweet that it thrilled him through and through.

"I thought you would ask me that question," said she. "I don't know why; but I thought you would. Yes; it is possible you can do that or us which will be more than even money. Money, which is so welcome—so welcome! I will tell you our story in a few words."

Ira Hart sat and listened.

"We lived in a little village in the western part of the State"—and she named the village—"and had a little cottage and garden. My father was a carpenter and joiner—my mother's second husband. He died suddenly about six months ago, leaving us very poor indeed. Mother's health began to fail declined so fast that she feared for the future. She has a son somewhere in this city—my half-brother. I have never seen him. He left home when I was still a baby. Mother resolved to come down here and find her son. We are perfectly unused to city ways; mother's money was all gone, and she has never realized what a great city this was, and what a place to search in; and of course I knew nothing about it. So we came down here, and mother's health became apparent. Mother grew worse and worse. We had rented this room and furnished it quite decently; but we have had to sell one thing after another, till this is all we have left. I have earned what I could with my needle, but that is very little. Mother grew rapidly worse, and the future looks very dark unless my half-brother can be found. But I know no more than a child where to look. You can see yourself how we could find him."

"I'll try, at any rate," said Ira. "Please to write his name in this little book."

She took the pencil he offered her and wrote as desired. Ira read it, and jumped up out of his chair.

"Gracious!" he cried, but in a suppressed voice; "what ha thought it?"

What he thought the girl, with flushing face.

"I'll bring him to you this very night," said Ira, putting on his hat and plunging out of the room. "Wait till I come back; 'twon't be long."

He ran as fast as his legs would carry him around to Mrs. M'Packer's, and rushed into the parlor where a party of the boarders were enjoying a quiet game of whist.

"Ah, here's our April fool!" muttered the irrepressible Mr. Strutt, winking at his friends. "Well, Mr. Hart, have you surrendered the intruding greenback, and what did the girl say? I'll bet the cigars, Jenkins, she cracked him on the back and sang out, 'Bully for you, country!' Didn't she, Hart?'

"Well, not exactly," said Ira, forgetting to blush on this occasion. "But she thanked me very heartily on behalf of her sick mother; and she sent word to you, Mr. Strutt, that she'd like to see you."

"Me?" said Strutt, looking up from his cards in astonishment; "you're getting your green worn off fast, Hart. But you can't April-fool me, you know."

"I can't help it," said Ira, very solemnly and very liberately, and looking Strutt full in the face, "lies helpless on a bed in that tenement house. Your half-sister, Miss Harvey, is watching over her. Both are suffering in the direst poverty. Will you walk over and see them? If you won't, I invite these ladies and gentlemen to go with me and see Mr. Strutt's relations in his stead."

"Here's some hanged mystery or other!" exclaimed Strutt, pushing back his chair and flinging down his cards; "I'll go and see what it is."

Ira accompanied Mr. Strutt to the door of the room, told Miss Harvey who he was, and then considerately left the three alone.

The result was that the dandy bachelor, who was not at all a hard-hearted fellow, but his mother's sister placed in a situation of comparative comfort the next day.

How this April-fool adventure of Ira's got to Mr. Sandrol's ears in all its details I could easily explain at length if it were worth while. It did get to his ears, at any rate, on a few days after the young man got a note from the Broad Street grocer. This note was placed in Ira's hands by an old gentleman named Cosey, also a boarder at Mrs. M'Pack-er's; and it offered our hero a good situation in the counting-room of Cosey, Van Wyck, and Barbird, wholesale dealers in groceries, where he is still at work, to the satisfaction of all concerned.

One of the aforesaid gentlemen, I presume, is Miss Agnes Harvey; for Ira has continued the acquaintance with this young woman. What will come of it is left impossible to tell. Agnes is certainly a very nice girl.

MY TEMPTATION.

I was brought up a weaver, as my father was before me. I was a good hand at my trade, and I worked steadily at it. When about twenty-four years of age I married. My wife was also a weaver. She was quiet, amiable, and industrious, and made me an excellent wife. We soon had a family, but as we were both expert and quick work we not only contrived to keep the wolf from the door, but lived in comfort and respectability as well. We worked for many years for the same firm, one of the largest in England, doing our work well, and never during the whole time wronging our employers to the value of an ounce of silk.

When I was about thirty-five years of age the head partner sent for me, saying he wanted to speak to me on a matter of importance. When I came, he presented myself at the office, and shortly afterward was ushered into his room.

"C——," he said, "you have always been much satisfied with your behavior, and now we are going to advance you. The under-foreman in our receiving-room is going away, and you are to receive his appointment, if you like. Your wages will be thirty-five shillings a week, and your wife can work for us as before."

You may easily believe I was overjoyed at the offer, which I immediately accepted; and two days afterward I entered on my duties. They were very light, and consisted principally in receiving the work brought home by the weavers, examining it to see that it was properly done, and giving out the bobbins for fresh work. Times were now very flourishing with us, and we lived sufficient to give the children a good education. My employers were perfectly satisfied with me, and I worked on soberly and honestly.

After I had been seven years under-foreman, the foreman one day died suddenly; and I was most anxious to know who was to succeed him, as he had been a very good friend to me, and we had worked on very amicably together. My doubts at last terminated in a very satisfactory manner. The head partner sent for me one morning, and told me the firm were so pleased with my steady behavior that they had determined to promote me the situation of foreman, with a salary of two hundred a year, to be paid quarterly. I was, naturally, delighted at the intelligence, as I considered my fortune was a good one made. I thanked the head of the firm most gratefully for his kindness, and assured him that every effort should be made on my part to give him satisfaction.

"Of that I am assured, Mr. C——," he said (it was the first time he had called me "Mister," and it was not a little flattered by it); "you can now enter on your duties as soon as you please."

When, in the evening, I told my wife of our good fortune, she was completely overwhelmed by it, and for some time could hardly realize it; but when I told her the head partner had called me "Mr. C——," she was even more pleased at that than I had been myself.

"And why should you not be called Mr. C——?" she said. "I am sure you would make as good a gentleman as the best of them."

"Fair and softly, my dear," said I. "Let us first feel our feet, and then we will talk of that afterward."

My duties now were not more severe than formerly, but far more responsible; for I was intrusted with considerable sums of money to pay the workmen. I had also an under-foreman to assist me, who was a sharp, clever fellow; and we got on very well together. Once a week my books were audited by the firm, and I was frequently complimented not only on my exactitude, but also, as I was a good foreman, on the neat manner in which they were kept.

Although my income was now two hundred a year, it had not increased much in reality, for I had been suggested to me that, now I was in a situation of trust and responsibility, it was hardly just that I should allow my wife to drudge like a common weaver. I, without hesitating, admitted the justice of the remark, but I hardly thought my wife would agree to it: however, I was determined to try her, so I told her when I went home in the evening that I hardly thought it right she should continue at the loom, considering the position in life we were now in. To my great surprise my wife not only made no objection, but positively told me she had already thought as much, and that she had spoken to me on the subject, but did not like, as she was afraid I should think her lazy.

Although my wife had now given up the loom, she was by no means idle. Unlike most weavers' wives, she was an expert needle-woman, and she occupied herself in making the children's dresses. True, she had always done so before, and had had time for them as well; but now we were in a more genteel position, it was right that the children dressed, and, of course, a good deal more needlework had to be done: but, as my daughters were now old enough to help their mother, it was no great increase of expense after all.

After I had been a few months in my new position my wife one day said to me, "You will be handed called to-day, and I paid him for the quarter. He talks about increasing our rent. He says you have had the house to yourself so long, that, considering the rate of rents in the neighborhood——"

"I shall not pay any more than I do now," I replied, "and it is absurd to charge for him to want it, considering how long I have been his tenant. I would rather look for another house than pay a shilling more than I do at present."

"Well, dear," said my wife, "and I think you are right. Besides, there's another thing strikes me. We are living here on the weavers' rents, and mixing with them, which is not quite right considering our position. I was thinking, that when the girls are growing up, and they ought to do something better than marry weavers."

I was struck with the justice of my wife's remark, and requested her to look out for another lodging or house, which she promised to do.

The next day when I returned home I found my wife had busied herself in finding a new dwelling for us. She had set her mind on one in the Hoxton Road. It was considerably handsomer than our own, and much more expensive. We were paying twenty-five pounds a year, and this was forty without taxes. It was, however, a most respectable, airy wife said, than the one we were then living in in Fleur de Lis Street, and she had hit upon a plan to make it comparatively cheap. It appeared at first sight. It was to let off the first-floor to some single gentleman who was employed in the City in the daytime. In the evening he let we should have all the credit for the appearance of the house and not be at my higher rent than we then were.

I complimented my wife on her excellent arrangements; the house was taken, and in a few weeks we were in possession.

But although the rent of the house would not be more than our old one when we had let off the first floor, and the gentleman should create a world be far greater, there was the expense of furnishing to be taken into consideration. This my wife calculated pled us for the moment, but my wife said in a short time she would make up the amount by the rent of the rooms.

We found without difficulty a tenant for our first-floor, a young man, clerk in an insurance office. He was a quiet, inoffensive fellow, and, paying regularly his rent every week. I now proposed that we should begin economizing the money we had paid for the extra furniture, which it was expedient to do so till later, as she had other expenses to meet at the moment. I inquired what they might be.

"Why, my dear," she said, "it is utterly impossible that the girls and I can dress now in the manner we did in Fleur de Lis Street, when we were living among weavers. They have been here six very genteel, and I don't like to dress different from our neighbors. We are now in a good position, and we ought to mind the dignity of my position."

I foolishly admitted her arguments, and we not only put off saving the money for the furniture, but we also somewhat increased the expenditure of new clothes as well. When my wife had obtained the new dresses for herself and children they certainly looked very well in them, and I felt, indeed, very proud of my family; but unfortunately, after the purchase had been made, we did not save the money we had expended for the furniture. We continued to live on quietly enough; but we spent, I am sorry to say, somewhat more than our income, though not by much, and I was not quite at my easiness. I, however, was obliged to apply to a loan office for assistance, which I had no difficulty in obtaining; and I received it just in time to pay the rent, the affair gave me very little trouble.

I have told you the commencement of our unfortunes, I will now tell you how our gentility ended. My wife's love of dress increased, and with it our expenditure, but our income remained the same. At last my wife confessed to me that the clerk on the first-floor had begun to show great attention to Charlotte, our eldest daughter, and she had every reason to believe it would end in an offer. His family, she said, were very respectable, and it would be an excellent match; and she considered the best thing we could do would be to get acquainted with them. I told her we must be careful what we did. I had no objection to make the acquaintance of the young fellow's family: but at the same time we must be careful not to increase our expenditure, as I had already great difficulty in keeping up the amount of the interest of the money I had borrowed from the loan office.

"My dear," said my wife, "what nonsense you talk! How is it possible we can mix with people in a better position of life than ourselves and spend no more than we do now?"

"How much money should you want?" I inquired.

"I do not exactly know. I must get the girl some new dresses, and we must cut a dash a little. You know, after all," she said, "that if he marries Charlotte, you will not be at the expense of maintaining her; so, in the long run, it will be a saving to us."

I gave in to her plan, and I applied at the loan office for more money, but to my great annoyance I experienced this time considerable difficulty. However, I got the money at last, and my wife bought Charlotte some new things; and we got intimate with the clerk's family, who appeared very genteel people, and lived in a large house. We visited at each other's houses occasionally, and at last the young fellow proposed for Charlotte.

Every thing was now the exception of my increasing debts, went on flourishingly. On one occasion we went to a dinner-party at the house of the clerk's grandfather, a wealthy solicitor, for the purpose of introducing Charlotte to him. My wife, as we were preparing to leave home, appeared very nervous, and after fidgeting about for some time, said,

"The old gentleman is a very sharp fellow, my dear. Take care you do not let any thing fall that will show that we were at one time only weavers, because he imagines we are far higher folk than you suppose."

"I do not wish to speak about family matters at all," I said; "at any rate, you need not be afraid of me. But what makes you think they believe we are better off than we are?"

"Well, my dear," said my wife, coloring slightly, "I don't know how it occurred, but they all believe you are likely to be taken into the house as a partner."

I was exceedingly angry when I heard this, and I inquired of my wife from what source such an infamous falsehood proceeded?

She replied that she did not know; but implored me so strenuously, and at the same time with a guilty a look on her countenance, that in case it were mentioned to me I was not contradict it, that fully perceived it was a piece of boasting of her own. I scolded her severely on the matter, and told her that if it were mentioned to me I should certainly contradict it. Fortunately nothing on the subject was mentioned during the evening, and although it was a source of uneasiness to me and my wife for some days afterward, the affair at last died away.

We had now to invite the old solicitor and the family to dinner, and before the day arrived I found my wife had got considerably into debt in the neighborhood, and I was again obliged to apply to the loan office for assistance. The secretary told me they would consider my application, and let me know the result; and in a few days their decision came. It was, that as they refused to advance me any more money, but that when my outstanding bills were due they should certainly press for the full amount.

This news came like a clap of thunder on me. What to do I knew not, or where to find the money. To sell my furniture, six months' rent was owing on the house, and the landlord was pressing for it. However, I shut my eyes to the circumstance for the present, hoping that, as soon as the dinner-party should be over, I would turn over a new leaf and insist on far greater economy being practiced in the future.

The day arrived for the dinner-party, for which my wife had made great preparations. Before leaving the house I took an opportunity of requesting her to be as moderate in all this as she could, and was on the point of leaving her, when a bill was heard at the door, and a broker's man entered with a distress warrant for the six months' rent. I was perfectly aghast at the sight, and the servant, as I was powerless, I had not twenty shillings in the house, and it wanted a month before my next quarter's salary would be due. I was, of all alternatives, but to leave him in possession; and with a heavy heart I proceeded to business.

I got on a cab, and was still the time arrived when I was accustomed to take my dinner. Being to dine at home that day, I went to a neighboring public house to get some food. As I was seated at the table, the gloomy aspect of my affairs came before me, and my eyes filled with tears. Ashamed of my low spirits, and wishing the enemy of my ruining myself, I called for a glass of spirits-and-water, although ordinarily a most sober man. As I drank it my courage returned, and I began to think in what way I could retrieve myself. But one way presented itself to my mind, and that was a most rigid retrenchment. I resolutely resolved on practicing it, even against my opposition on the part of my wife; but still the disagreeable fact presented itself to my mind, that I was not yet out in possession, and that the same day we were going to give an extravagant dinner-party. Something must be done, but what? I applied to my thoughts; I called for another glass of spirits-and-water. As I drank it the idea came to my mind that a considerable sum of money was in my possession in my possession, but it was my employers'. Why could I not borrow some without their knowing it? If I could pay off the broker's man I could redeem to a certain extent my credit. To-morrow, I argued, I will sell off every thing, and the proceeds would, after all, of my furniture would be enough, for that, and the payment of the money I owed to the loan office as well. The first step was to procure the amount. It might oppose me, but I silently and solemnly swore that no persuasions of hers should induce me to alter my determination.

I now returned to the house of business. There was a considerable sum in the till, of which I kept the key—nearly one hundred and fifty pounds. I took from it, trembling the while like a leaf, the money I required and not a shilling more, and shortly afterward, plunged in a violent headache, I returned home and paid out the broker, to the great joy of my wife.

The dinner passed off in a most satisfactory manner, although perhaps it appeared more so to me than it really was from the quantity of wine I was obliged to drink to drown the thought of the action I had committed. The next morning I rose with a severe headache; and my whole was so overcome with her exertions of the day before that I left her in bed when I went to business. However, I argued, it mattered but little; the next day would be Sunday, and then I should have ample time and opportunity to express my determination to my wife, for I was fully resolved I would sell every stick of furniture I possessed, and enter some cheap ready-furnished lodgings nearer to the house of business. On the Sunday I told my wife the resolution I had come to, and a terrible scene we had of it. She accused me of gross cruelty and meanness. She told me I might at least have waited till the wedding was over, and then she would have offered no objection. Many times I was on the point of telling her of the desperate action I had committed, for I would not acknowledge to myself it was a dishonest one, although I should have considered it infamous in another. Charlotte at last came to my wife's aid, and her tears quite subdued my courage. As the license for her marriage had already been obtained, it at last gave way, and it was understood between us that it was on no account to come off, which was to take place in a fortnight, or plan would be adopted.

One morning in the next week I received a message from the firm to attend at the City-house of business about some alteration in my duties. I immediately surpected there was to be a change to be made in the manner of paying the weavers, which had already been hinted at once or twice, and that my accounts would be audited on the next Saturday, the last in the month. When I arrived, there was no one in the counting-house, and on the desk was a large blank book-book. The head partner saw me, and I neatly abstracted from it a blank check and entered it in my pocket. When I saw the head partner he received me very coolly, and told me that on the next Saturday my books were to be examined, and the system of paying was to be adopted. I promised every thing should be in readiness, and left him.

I was now desperate, and I resolved on forging my employers' name to a check for one hundred pounds; but when I took the pen in my hand I lost all courage, and I forged. I stood for some time, and I went to the public house, and after drinking two glasses of gin-and-water I had sufficient nerve to commit the forgery.

But now, how was I to get the check cashed? At last I remembered that my daughter's suitor was a clerk in a bank, and I resolved to make him my tool. When I arrived at home I agreed him applied to the bottle for courage, and as he was leaving the house I asked him if he should be able to tell me if he would get a check cashed for me at the London and County Bank the next day, and bring me the money in the evening. He promised he would do so, and kept his word; but unfortunately he was personally acquainted with the cashier, and they had many times conversed on business on indifferent subjects. To shorten a sad story, the fraud was discovered, and I was tried and found guilty. My employers recommended me to mercy on account of my previous good character, and I was sentenced to only three years' imprisonment. My daughter's marriage was of course broken off, and my wife has since died of a broken heart. Some weavers have befriended my children, but the youngest were sent to the work-house and my family broken up. I have paid dearly enough for a couple of hundred pounds. When I leave here, God only knows what I shall do; my character is gone, and nobody will employ me.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE ROBBER'S DEN.—A New York railroad car.

What part of a building would a proud man be likely to avoid?—A humble part.

A person was boasting that he was sprung from a high family in Ireland. "Yes," said a by-stander, "I have known a number of the family so high that their feet could not touch the ground."

Do the ladies like short or tall men the best?—Why, Hyson of course.

A little boy in an over good family was rebuked for looking into his spelling-book on a Sunday. Says he: "I study now that I may look into the Bible when Sundays as well as read the Testament week days.

"Sow and you shall reap." That's so. We sewed our old coat the other day and reaped a lot of tailors.

"Take off your hat, man," cried a judge to a prisoner. "I'm a lady," was the reply. "Then," said his lordship, "I'm not a judge."

THE HEAD AND FEEDER OF AN OFFENDING.—The hat fabrics as the Boston Sephinx is designated by one's maid, and is in the service of a lady at Kingston. This is rather a dangerous place to be a hatter's head.

What room in the house reminds you of a troublesome complaint?—The room attic.

"Frida goeth before a fall." It frequently goeth before a waterfall.

A REAL SOCIAL JOKE.—What's the next wine to Golden Sherry?—Silver-ado.—Ed.

THE HARRY'S MISGIVING.—Eating a mess-pie, and wondering, after a pause, what the contents were composed of.

A POSER.—As a schoolmaster was employed the other day in explaining to his pupils the "book" of nature without the trouble to either the stars, the precocious pupil put the following question to his instructor: "Whaur dis a' the figures gang till when they're rubbit out?"

PROVERBIAL EPIGRAM.

Civility, that nothing costs,
Oft procures to its possessor;
Flies are attracted less by Vinegar than honey.

"Opportunity makes the thief." Not in our case. We found a big anchor and chain cable on the sidewalk the other night, and we didn't touch it; there was nobody about neither.

Why is a boarding-house keeper who fortifies his table with strong butter like a naval officer who has his table with strong butter like a naval officer who has his table with alongside another in action?—Because he is prepared to repel boarders.

An Irish musical author, being asked if he had composed any thing remarkable, replied: "My last work was a composition on the multiplication table."

PARIS FASHIONS FOR APRIL, 1866.—[SEE PAGE 221.]

MARY ANERLEY.

LITTLE Mary Anerley, sitting on the stile,
Why do you blush so red, and why so strangely smile?
Somebody has been with you—somebody, I know,
Left this sunset on your cheek, left you smiling so!

Good Mary Anerley, waiting by the wall,
Waiting in the chestnut walk, where the snowy blossoms fall,
Somebody is coming there—somebody, I'm sure,
Knows your eyes are full of love, knows your heart is pure.

Happy Mary Anerley, looking, oh, so fair,
There's a ring upon your hand, and there's myrtle in your hair!
Somebody is with you now—somebody, I see,
Looks into your trusting face very tenderly!

Quiet Mary Forester, sitting by the shore,
Rosy fades at your knee, roses round the door—
Somebody is thinking of somebody, I know,
Made you sorry when he sail'd: are you sorry now?

PARIS FASHIONS.

COIFFURE CLOTILDE.

THIS head-dress consists of two velvet ribbons, embroidered with clear, white glass beads, and a border of black lace, representing a Grecian pattern, about a quarter of a yard long. The ribbons are supported by a half-circle foundation of wire covered with black silk.

The black lace is slightly gathered, falling over the head, and is ornamented with steel pendants in the star form.

The two pieces of lace are united on each side, and are fastened upon a foundation of about half an inch wide, forming two bordes, each half a yard in length. Upon one side is a bow of black velvet ribbon about an inch wide, and a bunch of mixed flowers. The ends of the black velvet ribbon are fastened under the chignon by an elastic cord.

CROCHET PETTICOAT.

[For a child from two to four years old.]

This petticoat is wrought in tunisien crochet; the centre of scarlet worsted, and the border of black in design à la grecque. The petticoat is commenced on the border by making a chain of 173 stitches of black worsted. The first three rows are made in the underlaing crochet stitch, which is a variety of the tunisien, differing only in the manner of taking up the stitch.

From the fourth to the eleventh row the tunisien crochet stitch is used with black worsted. The next three rows are done in the underlaing crochet. Then the scarlet worsted is taken for the centre of the petticoat, and eleven rows are made in the ordinary tunisien crochet. The narrowing is commenced in the second stitch of the twelfth row by uniting two stitches, and in the following row counting these two as one. The narrowing is repeated seven times in each row at intervals of seventeen stitches, and is continued in the same manner every third row—that is, in the fifteenth, eighteenth, twenty-first, twenty-fourth, and twenty-six h. After the twenty-seventh row, which is the termination of the petticoat, a row of plain stitches is made, and the two opposite sides are sewed together, leaving a space of about four inches.

As a finish to the border a row of scallops is made in scarlet worsted, each scallop being composed of two plain stitches separated by two fancy ones.

GEORGE PEABODY.

NIGHT CAP.

Fig. 3 serves as a pattern for this cap, which is composed of a crown and a fore part. The crown is cut to a point indicated in the model, and is gathered and sewed to the fore part, which is only a straight band about an inch wide and two-thirds of a yard long, sewed together in the middle to form a point. On each side, about four inches from the middle behind, is a large eyelet hole for a string to pass through.

The gathering of the crown comes altogether behind. The cap strings, which are about an inch wide at first, but increase in width, are trimmed at the ends with a bit of lace. A trimming of fine muslin covers the front, composed of two bands lightly gathered in festoons, and stitched on with a band.

BIB "EN PIQUE."

Cut out the bib whole, according to Fig. 5. Trim with loops or edging on the parts indicated in the pattern. Put on a button, and work a button-hole, as in the pattern, and fasten on each point on the shoulder a bow of ribbon about four inches long.

SOCK FOR INFANT OF SIX MONTHS.

This sock is made of white flannel, bound and ornamented with cherry ribbon. It is cut from a seamless piece of flannel, with a lining of muslin. Bind together with ribbon. Sew the two sides together in the middle behind. Proceed in the same manner with the middle of the upper part from the toe upward. Make a bow of ribbon about an inch wide for the top of the shoe.

PEABODY SQUARE, ISLINGTON.

THE magnificent bounty of an American merchant has bestowed a quarter of a million sterling, equal to one and a quarter millions of dollars, on the poor of London; and the trustees of this fund, since the first installment of £150,000 was placed in their hands, have thought it best employed in the construction of improved dwellings, as described in their lately-published report. The sites for the erection of these buildings are variously situated. Our engraving on page 221 relates to the plot at Islington. This plot measures 47,863 square feet, and cost over $40,000. There are four blocks of buildings, to comprise in all 155 tenements, with ample accommodation for upward of 656 persons. The whole cost of these buildings, exclusive of the sum paid for the land, will amount, when the accounts shall have been closed, to $158,450.

The entire community at Islington now consists of 674 individuals, of whom 19 are widows, the rest married persons and children.

The buildings consist of four blocks of houses, five stories in height, which are let out in tenements of one, two, and three rooms. Each block will afford accommodation for sixty families, or 240 in the aggregate. The rooms are each of them about 9 feet wide and 12 feet long, and of a suitable height. The attic of each block is paved with tiles from the Isle of Wight, and is surmounted by a handsome ornamental turret. There is also accommodation for washing and drying, and at each end of the buildings is a cistern 12 feet long, 6 feet wide, and 6 feet deep, capable of containing 1760 gallons of water. Every thing has been done to render the sanitary arrangements complete in every respect.

The principle and organization in each of these extensive structures is the same. Drainage and ventilation have been insured with the utmost possible care; the instant removal of dust and refuse is effected by means of shafts which descend from every corridor to cellars in the basement, whence it is carted away; the passages are all kept clean and lighted with gas without any cost to the tenants; water from cisterns in the roof is distributed by pipes into every tenement, and there are baths free to all. Laundries, with wringing-machines and drying lofts, are at the service of every inmate.

The weekly rent charged for one room is 2s. 6d., or about 62½ cents; for two rooms 4s.; and for three rooms, 5s. As MR. PEABODY directed by his letter, the sole qualification required for a tenant is "an ascertained condition of life such as brings the individual within the description of the poor of London, combined with moral character and good conduct as a member of society."

GEORGE PEABODY, whose gift to the London poor is the most munificent ever made by a private person to a public charity, is the leading American banker in London. He is a native of Danvers, Massachusetts, and about 74 years of age. He became a partner in a leading house in Baltimore, and went to England in 1836.

HOMES FOR THE LONDON POOR—PEABODY SQUARE, ISLINGTON.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

PERSECUTION are being outlined. Visions are about to be realized. To proof whereof are the facts: Gold is falling; prices of all goods are falling; rents are falling; and last, but not least, the dirty streets and nuisances of New York are falling—into the hands of the Metropolitan Health Board.

The first-mentioned fact is evident from a glance at the daily monetary quotations. The second is more apparent from an inspection of the general market reports; for from the unbelievable public feeling, there is now, as a matter of course, in the amount of change which any body receives after purchasing a sirloin of beef or a dozen yards of muslin. But the change will soon come. It is very easy for dealers to add a few pennies to the pound on beef, or to the yard on calicoes that have risen. But ah! it goes terribly against the grain to allow purchasers their rights, and give them the advantage of falling prices. Accordingly, merchants may as well bend gracefully to the coming breeze, which, if rightly met, will not harm. They are unconscious should mutual benefit. Certain it is that even ladies not over prone to sacrifice their longing for new things to any uncertain notion of economy are resolved to postpone replenishing their wardrobes a while longer because "goods are falling." Rents, there is no telling anywhere in this dull-day. But many even if they are not restricted in money, have a fancy for getting things "cheap," and are chastised if they are compelled to pay more than the market value for an article. And constantly an opportunity to return to good old prices is reasonably a thing to be desired by all.

The large number of houses in the market, both "for sale" and "to let," the actual decrease of rents, and the other startling admission of real estate owners, indicate in a conclusive manner that old-fashioned "high" rents will be more honest to let the middle of April than now, and at a lower rent."

The prospect of investing in clean streets and pure air looks brighter than ever before. True, only a fortnight has yet passed, but that is a thorough beginning. And the chokes may yet be kept out of New York, or more with a method in its operation which will repay the power. If only every citizen will do his duty. The way is opened for any responsible person to give information to the Board of Health, regarding any nuisance which comes under his observation, by addressing the Sanitary Superintendent of the Board—office 301 Mott Street—or by entering the complaint at one of the Police Stations, where books for the purpose are to be kept. Of course such information should be given in a clear, definite, and brief statement, accompanied by name and address, so that further inquiries may be made by the Commissioners if needful. If every body would do his duty in this respect, there would be no need to report those nuisances that seem to belong to nobody—as for as regards the care taken—the result would be most satisfactory.

It is said that "there is neither Cattle Market nor Slaughter Pen in Paris. The great markets are at Poissy, thirteen miles distant, and at Sceaux, five miles away. Within the city limits, though in the suburbs, are five public abattoirs, where all the slaughtering for the town is performed. They are under the control of a Guild of butchers, who are responsible to the Minister of the Interior, and are consulted when new arrangements are to be made by Government. The most vigil ant supervision of police attends them, and no butcher may follow his trade without a license. The slightest detail in the slaughtering or sale of meat falls under the most public regulation."

In these markets the greatest attention is paid to decency, cleanliness, and to the comfort of the animals. They are carefully fed and watered, and no undue driving, hauling, or beating is permitted. Of course every expert of the several slaughter-houses is carefully cleansed. So rigid is the police inspection that no sick animal is killed, no diseased meat can be sold, and no atom which threatens health is allowed a moment's lodgment in the great area."

What a contrast is this Paris system to the unhealthful and unclean arrangements which among us have so shamelessly existed! We could almost wish that a resolute Napoleon had, long ago, enacted certain laws for New York city.

A superb sleeping-car has recently been constructed, designed to run over the railway between this city and Erie, on the New Jersey Central Railroad. This car, which is valued at about $20,000, is fitted up in the most elegant manner, the soft rustling of the silken curtains, the subdued light from the ground-glass windows, the coolness secured with a superb velvet, and the magnificent carpeting in totally unlike any vehicle that is usually found attached to a train. It contains fourteen berths, a bath-room, besides a bridal-chamber, lavatories, closets, etc. The seats are covered with the finest velvet, and the floor with Brussels carpet. The wood-work is of black walnut, and the decorations of silver plate. Each berth is separated by elegant and rich damask curtains, and is supplied with silk mattresses, linen sheets, pillows, etc., just as in the most fashionable hotel.

It may be mentioned that those who take passage in the car will have to pay for the privilege.

An exchange enumerates a long list of "Curiosities of Humanity," some of which would be quite worthy a place in the museum of curiosities. Among these are—

The bashful that says to his wife on a Monday night when cook is in revival, chance is behindhand, and "stock down" "My dear, you look tired—had not you better go down with the baby while you rest?"

The man who, when he sees, and goes out to chop kindlings for exercise after heavily recommended bed-making by his wife, as a healthful method of expending energy.

The man who is always delighted with the domestic puddings and pies, and don't expect a single bit of the like unless a French restaurant!

The man who never saw a collar pattern that fits so much better than his own did!

Of course, the above definitions as well as masculine "Curiosities" in the list; but we think it more appropriate, considering the "curiosities of women," that they should be only an private exhibition!

Some irreverent investigator inquires if the use of the handkerchief is a part of theological training. As an excuse for making this inquiry, he says:

"I notice some ministers take it out of their pockets as they do their sermons, and lay it on the pulpit. Some spread it out lengthwise through the middle of the Bible; some fold it and rest it under the Bible; some put it over their heads; some clench it in their hands as if they were praying; some blow it as the audience do when keep crowding in late their pockets and pulling it out again, with a great movement, as if about to speak, and what use to make of their hands. I went once to hear a popular young preacher, and as much as half the time the man was made up of pocket-handkerchief, and the most of the other half he got out of it with one hand or the other.

Ministers seem to be privileged to be eccentric. There is a story told of a certain preacher who wound up his sermon one Sunday with the following sentence: "On account of the warmth of the weather and the ripeness of the hebrius, and because I've got to go fishing to-day, I will say no more at this time." And at another time, when he had said the sermon through, he took the Bible with a clap, remarking, "And now, brethren, I have done."

We have a distinct remembrance of a venerable and worthy minister of New England, who, in his travels, frequently came unexpectedly to the house of a friend. After being seated at the tea-table, he would often say, in the first unwelcomed manner possible, "I would like some cold hasty-pudding and milk for my supper;" or ask for which he always, equally unlikely to be prepared.

At a recent Parisian soiree several American ladies appeared without crinoline. It was remarked of them that, "whereas they formerly succeeded in their skirts upon umbrellas, they now have a good deal the appearance of closed ones. Not that the skirts are actually closed, but they make up in length, and the train which they wear are so full, and so generously sweep that the entire lady is quite as great as it was in the days of crinoline." A vast quantity of underclothing is said to be necessary as a substitute for the discarded hoops, which, indeed, were invented to remedy this very inconvenience. Whatever be the success of the experiment in Paris, it will not, it may be considered within moderate bounds. It is more the exaggeration of a fashion than the fashion itself which is hitherto been the object of complaint and ridicule.

It may be mentioned in this connection that a grand ferry-boat recently constructed for the Brooklyn Academy, a petition was made that the lady guests would dispense with crinoline altogether for the particular occasion, the motive being in view the accommodation of a larger number of guests than usual; but, sad to relate, very few complied with the request.

It is currently reported that young ladies are now wearing aprons of the finest cambric, and of many yards in width. The minding one as they ideble through the merry dance, of the nursery ditty of their childhood:

"With rings on her fingers and bells on her toes,
She shall have music wherever she goes."

What next will fickle fashion bring?

Somebody, who seems to understand the subject, thus discourses upon Life:

"It is never too late to do right; as, for instance, a gentleman began to study grammar when he was eighty. He never began it. It is never too late to get married. Nestor, the daughter of Enoch, took her first husband when she was eighty. It is never too stop any habit; James, the inventor, wrote his first invention at eighty. It is never too late to shake off the yoke of sin. Sometimes too late to 'pop the question,' a man once did it at eighty-two. Sometimes too late to repent. Even after hurrying her first husband, 'You are too late,' was the reply, 'the clergyman spoke to me at the grave!'"

The steamer from the Rio Grande, bringing the report of a naval action between Spain and the South American allies. The action, it appears, was a bombardment, which had been for some time past at sea, looking for the Allied fleet —viz., the Villa de Madrid and Blanco—had been successful in finding—and to their cost too—the object of their search in the harbor near Ancud, Island of Chiloe. The Spanish ships stood in close to shore in order to find the depth of water, when they were opened upon by a very heavy battery on shore, armed principally with guns recovered from the lost frigate Assaycuna, and one of them was struck seventeen times, while the other, the Blanco, received one heavy shot below the water-line, which had to be plugged. The two frigates then came close in to fire dare and opened fire, although at long range, with their broadside guns. They returned after two hours' work and expending about seven hundred shot and shell, only to find that the enemy had fled from them, so must be first silenced or crippled before they would to get inside of the ships there ashore. The next day the two Spanish ships returned to Valparaiso.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific to cures which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any reformers.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that diseases can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: Health is health the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of Equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

SCROFULA.

It is no universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of Fistulynia, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA.

STRUMA, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, ULCERATION, SALT RHEUM.

This taint (HEREDITARY and ACQUIRED, filling life with untold misery, is by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

[ARTHRITIS], LUMBAGO, SCIATICA, SCIATICA, GOUT, TIC DOLOUREAUX.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a success, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated—sometimes it is entirely relieved. Cases, chronic or vicarious, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by it.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY; removing the foul Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hastens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth in their place as ever.

CONSTITUTION. LIFE SYRUP

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other difficulties of this kind, which are so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Moth Patches upon the female face, depending upon a diseased action of the Liver, are very successfully to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will clear the secretion, and remove the deposit, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Lungs give rise to Languor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an ulcerated or cancerous condition of the organs, accompanied with burning or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

J. W. BRADLEY'S

CELEBRATED

DUPLEX ELLIPTIC

(OR DOUBLE)

SPRING SKIRTS

Are universally acknowledged by Ladies throughout the Length and Breadth of the Land

To be the most perfect and agreeable Skirt ever invented, the three thousand sets of every kind made being heavier, and twice or double covered.

They will not break or break, like the single springs, but will preserve their graceful and perfect shape where three or four ordinary skirts will have been thrown aside as useless.

They combine comfort, durability, and Economy, with that elegance of shape which no other skirt but the DUPLEX ELLIPTIC the STANDARD SKIRT of the FASHIONABLE WORLD.

The Duplex Elliptic, Empress or two Elliptic Steel Springs, ingeniously braided tightly and firmly together, adapt to ships, making the toughest, most flexible, elastic, and durable Spring ever used. The wonderful flexibility and great comfort and pleasure to any lady wearing the Duplex Elliptic Skirt will be experienced particularly in all crowded Assemblies, Operas, Carriages, Railroad Cars, Church Pews, Arm-Chairs, &c., and for Promenade and House Dress, as the Skirt can be folded or closed in so as to occupy a small space as easily as a silk or muslin dress. For Children, Misses, and Young Ladies, they are superior to all others. They are unquestionably the lightest, most desirable, comfortable, and economical Skirt ever made.

The "Empress Trail," the latest style introduced, is made of the new Duplex Steel, which is rolled thick, giving a great resistance, and producing the most perfect and beautiful Trail suggested by the present fashion, being now of the flexible qualities for which the Duplex Skirts stand so pre-eminent.

A Single Box

OF

Brandreth's Pills

Contains more vegetable extractive matter than twenty boxes of any pills in the world besides. Fifty-five hundred physicians use them in their practice to the exclusion of other purgatives. The first letter of their value is yet scarcely appreciated. When they are taken, the whole garden death and continued sickness will be of the past. Let those who know them speak right out in their favor. It is a duty which will save life.

Our race are subject to a redundancy of vitiated bile at this season, and it is as dangerous as it is prevalent; but Brandreth's pills are an invulnerable and effectual protection. By their occasional use we prevent the collection of there impurities, which, when in sufficient quantities, cause so much danger to the system. They will soon complain, dyspepsia, loss of appetite, pain in the head, heart-burn, pain in the breast-bone, sudden faintness and costiveness.

That the great superiority of these Instruments is now universally conceded is abundantly proved by the FACT that Steinway's scales, improvements, and peculiarities of construction have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both hemispheres so CLOSELY AS COULD BE DONE WITHOUT INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT RIGHTS, and that their instruments are used by the most eminent pianists of Europe and America, who prefer them for their even, pliable and powerful tone which ever responds.

HISTORY OF Friedrich the Second,
CALLED FREDERICK THE GREAT.
By THOMAS CARLYLE.
IN SIX VOLUMES. VOL. VI.
12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per Volume.

Probably the History of Frederick will forever remain one of the finest pieces of literary painting, as well as one of the most marvelous attempts at special pleading, extant in our own or any language.—London Spectator.

Mr. Carlyle has at last completed his graven image, and sets it up for the admiration of the world, and, with that amazing fancy for hero-worship in which he excels, would force us to believe his paragon all that he paints him; and drives it certainly power in the picture. The old records have been most thoroughly sifted by Carlyle, who seems to have eliminated every grain of wheat from bushels of chaff.—Examiner and Chronicle.

Illustrated with nearly 150 Wood Engravings.
12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

A desire has frequently been expressed by professors and teachers who have used my large work on "Human Physiology" that I should publish an abridgment of it, suitable for use as an elementary text-book in colleges and schools. I have accordingly in this work endeavored to satisfy that wish, and to furnish a book sufficiently simple and compendious for such general use, and yet representing the state of the science at the present day.—Extract from the Preface.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. X.—No. 485.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

"THE CURT REPLY."

THERE are, we suppose, few of our readers who do not remember from very early days the anecdote of the ambitious RALEIGH scratching on a window-pane, where it would meet the eye of his Royal mistress, the line—

"Fain would I climb, but that I fear to fall;"

and QUEEN ELIZABETH'S dubious, or, as Mr. FOLINGSBY's title suggests, "curt," rejoinder, forming a couplet—

"If thy mind fail thee, do not climb at all."

Yet we must confess that, unless the gentle reader has studied history to better purpose than ourselves, he will find some difficulty in fixing the time, place, and circumstance of the story. It is, of course, beneath the dignity of FROUDE; it has no documentary evidence to recommend it to MISS STRICKLAND; it is not to be found in MISS AIKEN's more gossiping "Memoirs of the Court of Elizabeth." We turn with confidence to TYTLER's tolerably elaborate "Life of Raleigh," and, lo! it is not even there. The first reference to it we light on is in one of the early memoirs of Sir WALTER—that by OLDYS. But this only proves a faint scent to guide our chase: the anecdote is given, but with no details whatsoever, and FULLER's "Worthies" is quoted as the authority. But, alack-a-day! our fox only proves a buck hare after all. The anecdote is given in the baldest possible manner; only the phraseology is a little more antiquated, reading thus:

Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall,
If thy heart fails thee, climb not at all.

The popularity of the anecdote is doubtless due in great measure to SCOTT's introduction of it into "Kenilworth," where it appears with all the circumstantial embellishments of the novelist's imagination. The handsome young gallant has just been, according to the tradition, taken into the Queen's service in acknowledgment of the chivalrous sacrifice of his richly-embroidered cloak that Gloriana might walk dry-shod. Intoxicated with certain marks of the Queen's favor, received when accompanying her Majesty in her diversion on the river, and after the return to the palace at Greenwich, when, at evening, she was walking in the gardens, "Squire Lackcloak" contrived that a maid of honor should see him enter a summer-house and write on a window-pane with a diamond ring which the Queen had given him as a recompense for the loss of his cloak. The sequel is, of course, perfectly evident.

The attempt to paint an anecdote is generally a misemployment of the resources of art. However, we can hardly find fault with the artist for selecting a subject which enabled him to represent "good Queen Bess" in all her brave attire, and (whether the incident be true or false) so characteristically engaged. We must, however, take exception to the portraiture of her Majesty, as being as outrageously flattering, in its way, as RALEIGH's own extravagant adulations of "the goddess," "the Diana," "the Venus"—his excessively vain yet most sagacious Queen. At this time ELIZABETH was approaching SIXTY, her features were very strongly marked, and she never had the embonpoint of the picture. The peeping RALEIGH is, on the contrary, not so good-looking as his authentic portraits. Mr. FOLINGSBY is an Irish artist, studying at Munich. In No. 460 we gave an excellent picture by him of "John Bunyan in Bedford Jail."

"THE CURT REPLY."—[BY G. F. FOLINGSBY.]

THE GREAT FIRE IN CINCINNATI.

WE give on page 228 illustrations of the recent conflagration in Cincinnati, sketched on the spot by our artist, Mr. WAUD. The fire broke out in FIKE's Opera-house. This building—the most splendid structure of the kind in the West—was completely destroyed. Very fortunately the immense audience congregated to hear "Midsummer Night's Dream," had dispersed before the accident occurred, otherwise we should have occasion to detail the horrible features of another human holocaust devoted to the Moloch of Flame.

The first appearance of the fire—due, it is thought, to a gas explosion—was in the scenery back of the stage at 11.30 P.M. The Cincinnati Commercial thus describes the scene which followed:

"In five minutes the flames had wrapped the whole magnificent interior of stage and auditorium, and burst through the rear portion of the roof. On the wings of the drought they gave shot, the tongue of flame rising to a great height and lapped over upon adjoining buildings. Soon huge masses of black smoke burst from the cornice of the Fourth Street front windows. At a quarter of twelve the scene was exciting in the extreme. The hall square bounded by Fourth, Vine, Baker, and Walnut streets had a dome of luridly gleaming flames, through which columns of smoke shot up, and from which showers of sparks and bunches of flame floated upward, and then descended upon the burning mass below. The dome and ceiling, with their gorgeous and artistic ornamentation, fell with the roof with a terrific crash, and there burst upward a dazzling light, blinding in its intensity. Shortly but surely the fire crept down through the various stories of the building, though effective and gallant efforts were done to the magnificent stores, fronting the entire length of the building on the first floor of Fourth Street, into the wealth of literature, the tens of thousands of volumes of books of CARROLL's store, the valuable stock of SINGER's sewing-machines, the fine music-store of W. C. PETERS, and Philip Phillip's pianos, the immense gallery devoted to the magnificent stores recently fitted up for the reception of STRAUP, STRATTON & HELMAN'S Commercial Institute, the cheerful rooms of the National Union Telegraph Company, the job printing establishment, with its valuable machinery, and all the dozen offices besides. From the rear and west side of the Opera-house the flames marched with overwhelming strength to the extensive stables of the Adams Express Company and the building of the Cincinnati Daily Enquirer. The fall of a large mass of wall upon the roof of the Enquirer building hastened its partial destruction, and soon the flames were communicated to the rear of the first and second floors, and climbing upward crept through the front windows, and told the story of their power to the firemen, who gave up the struggle with them. But with its usual power it ready to terribly used the devouring flames wrapped the structure in their embrace, and the work of destruction was soon far advanced. Through the back rooms, where were stored nearly $500,000 worth of cute through job-presses, and composing-rooms, and editorial rooms; through the engraving-room of JONES & HART—all totally destroyed."

The total loss is estimated at $1,751,000, over one-half of which was involved in the ruin of FIKE's Opera-house.

Our artist has sketched the scene presented by the ruins the day after the fire. An interesting feature of the sketch is the view given of the Chain-gang at work among the ruins.

THE LATE KING OF SIAM.

IT is perhaps not generally known that there are usually two Kings of Siam. But the Siamese Royal brethren, as elder and a younger—not Siamese twins—hold unequal shares in the divided monarchy—two-thirds of the power being vested in the First and one-third in the Second King. The junior of their fraternal Majesties has lately been removed by death; we therefore give his portrait on page 236. The senior, whose fame as a learned Buddhist sage, with his other philosophical and literary accomplishments, has been attested by high authority, pursues a wise and liberal policy, which has resulted in a great increase of the prosperity of his kingdom, since the treaty of 1850 opened the navigation of the Menam and other Siamese rivers to European shipping and commerce. In the year 1864 the foreign export and import trade of Siam amounted to more than $12,500,000, and employed 55,000 tons of British shipping, besides a great quantity carried on in native vessels, which are built of the teak wood of the country, on the best European models, in the dock-yards of the Menam. The capital city, especially to China, is a most important article of Siamese enterprise, amounting to 125,000 tons in the year; and this kingdom is in a fair way of becoming one of the wealthiest and most civilized of Eastern states. The Second King, recently deceased, "would have been," says Sir John Bowring, "a very distinguished man, if he were not eclipsed by the more active nature and more prominent position of his elder brother. He spoke pure English, wrote a hand which might be a pattern for a European schoolmaster; he had work-shops for the manufacture of scientific and mechanical instruments; he had, moreover, a taste for literature, and I found the shelves of his library filled with European, and especially English, books." The palace at Bangkok, in which both Kings resided together, is a huge pile, inhabited by about 2900 persons: the First King's private house being more than 100 feet was little distinction, as regards the pomp and ceremonies of their Court, between the royal pair.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1866.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

IT was unfortunate that the President should have lately said to a delegation from New Jersey that he is too old to change, for the greatest changes of his life have occurred within the last few years, and no reasonable man will ever too old to be convinced. Especially at a time like this, when the wisdom of public policy and the national welfare depend not upon theories but upon the actual conditions of affairs, it is surely the part of wisdom to cultivate patience and toleration and an open mind. During the dark days of the war a Union Senator became one day from an interview with President LINCOLN and exclaimed, impatiently: "There's no bracing atmosphere at the White House." The President, he said, is never away. No wonder Union man is stronger for seeing him." That it was a very dull Union man. MR. LINCOLN was strong because he was patient. His patience enabled him to know and to weigh exactly the force of opinions. If he had constantly said upon the vital points of the war, "My mind is made up. I am not to be moved," he would have lacked precisely the distinctive quality of his greatness as a man and of his fitness as President.

President JOHNSON's temperament differs from President LINCOLN's as General JACKSON's did from General WASHINGTON's. Mr. JOHNSON likes fights. All his life has been a bold, sturdy political champion. He has been trained in the most orthodox discipline of the most unpopular of parties, and he gives blows as well as takes them. At the close of a fierce war he stepped into the Presidency over the body of his predecessor murdered by those who would also have killed him; and his grim resolution to maintain the Constitution and Union, as he understood them, promised to be inflexible against all those views differed from his own. But forgetting, as it seems to us, that the most patriotic men may honestly differ in a crisis like the present, he rather impudently recognizes as the only friends of the Union those who support his policy in every point, without weighing the probable and obvious motives of such support in many quarters. Thus while he identifies himself with patriotic sentiments the defender of the Union and Constitution it is remarkable that those who have not shown that they were not the very men who overthrew the wisdom of some of his measures, while those who have been the open and bloody or secret and treacherous foes of the Union, now vehemently applaud every word he utters and every act he does. Is it that those who with ANDREW JOHNSON have hitherto defended the Union against every assault did not comprehend what they were doing; or is it that those who after long deliberation struggled fiercely to destroy it, are at heart its most intelligent advocates and truest friends, and the safest counselors in its reorganization?

But this rapturous approval of the President by his political enemies is not a new phenomenon. The party which advised surrender to the rebellion, and exhausted the language in contemptuous vituperation of Mr. JOHNSON while he was a rock against their treasonable fury, has no course left but to excite and exasperate division between him and his friends. They applaud him not because he demands that treason shall be made odious, not because he maintained military rule and suspended the habeas corpus in the disturbed States, not because he imposed assent to emancipation upon those States and excepted large classes from amnesty, not because he demanded that "a public example * * * should be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship," but because his measures do not command the unqualified support of all Union men, and because they hope to widen a difference into a fatal breach. When Mr. S. S. COX, who said at Chicago in 1864 that LINCOLN and DAVIS ought to be brought to the same block together now says at New Haven that Mr. JOHNSON, the faithful friend of Mr. LINCOLN re elected with him, is the best of Presidents, it is hard to believe that a politician so experienced as Mr. Cox cannot see the meaning and the support of its true value. He must know that the breach between him and the Copperheads is irreparable. He must know that they would willingly use him as a bridge to pass the Union over, as a stalking-horse to their own purposes, as a spring-board to leap into power; that they would use him to the last and then contemptuously discard him. He ought surely to know that the party which must rely for success upon its old alliance with the old spirit of Slavery in the South, and not upon the new spirit of Union and Liberty there, would as soon vote for CHARLES SUMNER as for ANDREW JOHNSON. The Copperhead policy of to-day is a vast reaction against the spirit and results of the war and in favor of the old Southern policy. In such a reaction does the military Governor of Tennessee, the Senator who alone from the South was true to the death the leaders of that old Southern policy, think that he has any place? Had the Presbyterian church lower and confidence in the Court of the Restoration?

The President can not hope to create a new party however doubtful States may waver. The Union party comprising that overwhelming majority of loyal men who sustained the war can not disband merely because the war is over. It will of necessity cohere until the full results of the war are secured. With whom, then, will the President trust himself, with his friends or his foes? However he may differ with those friends, can the difference be such as to induce it is with his opponents? We have no wish to conceal that difference. The various views and measures which compose what is called the President's policy are fully understood and approved by him in perfect good faith. They are inspired by the conviction that the best method to be adopted is one of moderation, conciliation, and the preservation of our constitutional system. In this conviction all patriotic men will agree. But upon the question what is security, and what is not, upon Constitutional, there are wide differences. When the President assumes that by a formal acceptance of the terms he has imposed the Union is really restored, when he refuses to see further delays or conditions; when he opposes any constitutional amendment, or any serious national guarantee whatever that the rights of the citizens are represented in Congress: when he thinks that the present remedies of law are sufficient for whatever friction or wrong there may be in the long disorganized system; when he thinks it adequate, that they should not be strengthened until those States have a voice in Congress, he differs from the vast majority of the loyal people, and apparently begs the very question at issue, which is, upon what conditions those States shall have a voice?

It is not enough that he declares himself the defender of the Constitution against those whom he calls its new assailants. It is not enough that he declares himself the enemy of centralization. It is not enough that he declares that he stands by the Union, and that those who do not agree in every point of his policy are enemies of the Union. The question still remains. The President is unquestionably pure of purpose, and very determined. He is very clear in comprehending and skilful in interpreting the Constitution. But he is certainly proved his fidelity to the Union. But the equal integrity, and ability, and devotion, and firmness of Congress are also unquestioned. President JOHNSON must see that the Union party can not accept the indiscriminate support of all his views and measures as the only constitutional fidelity. He must see the profound mistake if he regards the situation as a struggle between himself and Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS. When he sees those who have so little respect for Mr. STEVENS's wisdom as to has himself gravely questioning his course, it is a fatal delusion if he sees only Mr. STEVENS.

The Democratic is taking the position for the President to believe that the party whose last general and official manifesto was the Chicago Platform of 1864 is sincerely the Union party of this country? Would he have the Union Convention to settle the questions of to-day more than of two years ago? If the alternative is presented to him of supporting such a party, or of attempting to form a party composed of the Copperheads, the late rebels, and a few recruits from the Union line, or of continuing to act with those who have fought with him the good fight, but who now, in some important points, differ with his judgment, we shall believe, until belief is impossible, that he still holds to his words of the 8th of February, "that he might differ with some of his friends, and he should feel wholly at liberty so to differ, and to state the grounds of his own opinion belief or opinion; but he considered himself identified with the great Union party, and had no desire or intention of being found outside. He intended to exercise his own judgment, but was ready to yield it when he found it was not sustained by the judgment of the people."

CONNECTICUT.

THE result of the election in Connecticut is peculiarly significant. It shows the great Union line unbroken. It is a plain demonstration that the loyal people of that State, whose sons and brothers went to the war, from which so many never returned, are not yet ready to deliver the State and the country into the hands of those who denounced the war and excused the rebels. ISAAC TOUCEY and THOMAS H. SEYMOUR, one of whom, as Secretary of the Navy, did what he could by sending away the national ships to paralyze the Government, and the other of whom, as candidate for Governor, openly expressed his sympathy with treason, are not the accepted political leaders of Connecticut.

The contest indeed was, as usual, severe, but the result was a remarkable triumph for the Union party. In 1864, at the Presidential election, when the honorable existence of the Union itself was at stake, the Union majority for Mr. LINCOLN was only 2406. Now the war is over. There is naturally a certain reaction. The Copperheads masked themselves last year as candidates who voted for the war supplies in Congress, and even for the Constitutional Amendment. The Union party is disbanded by the gratitude of the President. His sympathies, under the circumstances, were unquestionably against the successful candidate who had frankly declared his difference with the President on certain points. The canvass was conducted upon the radical ground in a State which last autumn refused impartial Suffrage by 7000 majority; and yet, notwithstanding all these influences which undoubtedly impaired the majority of General HAWLEY, reducing it to half of that of Mr. LINCOLN, the whole Union ticket is elected: there are 18 Union Senators to 7 of the Opposition, and a Union majority of 50 in the House.

The result secures a Union Senator in Connecticut in place of LAFAYETTE S. FOSTER, and, we hope, indicates that the question of impartial suffrage may be successfully revived at no distant day. The people of Connecticut form among the States the people of which, with charity for all and malice toward none, propose to reorganize the vast disturbance of the Union upon the simple constitutional basis of justice.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

THE Civil Rights Bill was drawn with simplicity and care for a very necessary purpose. It declares who are citizens of the United States, defines their rights, prescribes penalties for violating them, and provides the means of redress. The power to do this springs from the very nature and function of a supreme government. The power being conceded, it is fair to demand that any measure of legislation shall be shown to be necessary, politic, and constitutional.

It is not essential to an intelligent use of language in the laws and common speech that the true meaning of citizenship should be defined. Nearly a fifth of the population of the country are citizens. They are subject to the Government; they support the obligations and do the duty of citizens. Are they citizens or not? The question may be more unanswerable than to fear or hesitate to define their status? If they are not citizens, are they aliens, are they unnaturalized natives? Domiciled aliens and foreigners have the protection of law, indeed, but these are neither. They are native to the soil. They owe and perform the obligations of other citizens. Why not call them citizens?

That color was not originally a disability for citizenship is undeniable; for the citizens of many States, even before the formation and adoption of the Constitution, citizens of the United States, and in some of the States at that time colored persons were not only citizens but voters. The Constitution, between the years 1787 and 1803, by implication and directly, admit that color is not a disability. In 1843 Mr. DANA, U. S. District-Attorney-General for the United States, gave his opinion that a free colored man can be a citizen. But as the Government became thoroughly tainted with the spirit of slavery, that obstacle was to acknowledge the fact increased and obscured the whole question. Mr. MARCY, as Secretary of State, held both opinions, that colored men were and were not citizens. Passports have been both issued and refused to them as citizens; and finally the spirit of slavery culminating in the DRED SCOTT decision, declared that a free negro was not a citizen. In 1862, under the Government purged of the influence of slavery, the question again arose, and Attorney-General BATES in a masterly opinion held that color was not a disqualification. But the baffled party of division still asserts the contrary. President JOHNSON in his veto of the Civil Rights Bill admits a difference of opinion; and the Constitution, while it speaks of citizens, nowhere defines the term. It is therefore both timely and wise, at the close of a civil war which has abolished slavery, that the highest authority should declare distinctly who are citizens of the United States, and what are the rights to which citizens are entitled.

The policy of such a measure is plain from the fact that the civil rights of millions of the native population of the United States are destroyed in certain parts of the country on the ground of color: that this invasion springs from the worst evil habit of the country, and that, if not corrected by the supreme authority, the inevitable result will be a confirmation of this spirit, and a consequent perpetual menace of the public peace by deepening the unreasoning of the outraged class of the population that the chance of legal redress is hopeless. The good policy is evidently to open the fountain of that recountry earnestly desires repose, but that repose is and ought to be impossible while millions of loyal and tried friends of the Government are exposed, as in the absence of such a bill they are exposed, to the vengeance of those who are still, and naturally, alienated from the Government. Nothing can tend so surely to confirm the peace of the Union as the kindly but firmly expressed intention of the Government to protect and enforce the equal civil rights of every citizen; understood by civil rights, according to Chancellor KENT, "the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right to acquire and enjoy property." This is substantially the explanation given by President JOHNSON of the right conferred by the Emancipation Amendment. "Liberty," he said in his message to Congress and to Judge WAIRDLAW, "means freedom to work and enjoy the products of your own labor." The Civil Rights Bill merely secures that freedom; for no man enjoys the fruit of his labor if he can not own property, and sue and testify and convey.

But if the United States had the constitutional right to confer this freedom, can it be unconstitutional to defend it? If it were constitutional for the Government to insist that the late rebel States should guarantee this liberty, can it not insist that they shall assent to its definition and protection? What else was the significance of the second clause of the amendment authorizing the Government to enforce it? Having freed a man from chattel slavery, is the Government bound to look on passively and see him reduced to a new virtual slavery, by a State vagrant law, for a trivial offense? The President, indeed, asks in his veto whether the present laws are not sufficient to protect the rights of the freedmen. What rights? If they are neither citizens, nor domiciled aliens, nor foreigners, what rights have they? Before those rights can be conferred before their rights can be defined; and then, if existing remedies are adequate, they are not impaired by the bill. If they are not adequate, the bill is plainly necessary.

The President's objection to the bill as special legislation is a manifest misapprehension. The bill is universal in its application. If the rights of any citizen of whatever class or color are invaded any where in the country the bill provides the remedy, without any exclusion or exception whatever. But the bill has a great weight upon the fact that "worthy, intelligent, and patriotic foreigners" must reside here five years before they can become citizens, and expresses the opinion that the bill discriminates against them in favor of those to whom the avenues of freedom and intelligence are just opened. But the President knows that the case fairly. Let us ask it in another way. If "worthy, intelligent, and patriotic foreigners" are to be made both citizens and voters at the end of a residence of five years, is it unreasonable that worthy, intelligent, and patriotic natives, all whose interests and affections are and always have been bound up with the country, should be made citizens, generally, at the end of twenty-one years? If it be objected that the mass of the natives in question are not intelligent, the reply is asserted that the mass of the foreigners are so? If it be right to take a foreigner totally ignorant of our language and government and the whole spirit of our system and give him, after five years, the right to vote, can it be wrong to take a man like ROBERT SMALLS, who instinctively knows and loves and would give his life for whatever is here, after the end of three years of emancipation give him, not so much as a vote, but the name and rights of a citizen? That is a question which we do not and answer in the Message.

The objection that the bill interferes with rightful State legislation is not sustained by a careful consideration of the bill. The United States may lawfully define the civil rights of their citizens no State can lawfully impair those rights. The bill leaves the legislative discretion of the States unlimited by any thing but the fundamental civil rights of all citizens which the nation itself protects; and it gives the United States courts exclusive jurisdiction under an express clause of the Constitution.

But the most extraordinary objection urged by the President is that the Civil Rights Bill is antagonistic to the principles of political economy. It is not easy to see precisely what is meant by this statement. The bill provides that all citizens shall have the same right to make contracts, to sue and be sued, to give evidence, to purchase and convey property. Is this settling questions of political economy? We should as soon have suspected that it was an attempt to solve astronomical problems.

But the serious objection to the veto lies in the fact, which is evident throughout, that the President thinks enough has been done to redeem the sacred honor of the United States, not of the separate States, pledged to the emancipated class. He says indeed that he will co-operate with Congress to protect them; but Congress is maturely considered and presented two methods of protection, and he rejects both. What is the President's plan? Is it to leave them to the Black Codes? Is it to call them free, thereby exasperating the late masters, and then suffer those masters unchecked to forbid them to own property, to bear arms, to testify, and to enjoy any of the rights of freedom? Is it to trust to time, and to hope that when the present generation, to whom war is not yet real, is exterminated, some kind of justice may be done their posterity by those who come after us? The present danger to the Union is not in the direction feared by the President. It is not from the United States doing a simple Constitutional act of justice; it is from the States perpetuating the old injustice from which our troubles sprang. State rights injustice begat by slavery brought war, war alienation and bloody war. State rights interpreted by liberty can alone give us Constitutional unity and enduring peace.

WHAT IT COSTS TO CORNER WALL STREET.

About three months ago the leading director of the Erie Railway Company—familiar to all observed that the stock of that concern had been oversold by the reckless Bears of Wall Street, and undertook to "corner the shorts"—that is to say, to buy up the stock, so that the speculators who had sold it for future delivery should not be able to buy when they wanted it. The director took into his confidence one of his director bought and bought, and as he bought the stock rose. Pretty soon it was 85, then 90. Still the director bought on, and by-and-by it was 95, presently 97. The Bears had gone on buying it might have been 100, or 110, or even 120, by this time. There are limits, however, to the capacity of even the boldest speculators. By the time the Erie director had bought rather more than all the stock afloat in this country he thought it was time to stop.

He had achieved one half of his enterprise. He had pretty thoroughly cornered the shorts. Foolish operators who had sold Erie short at 80, found themselves compelled to buy it in at 95, and the difference—$1500 on every hundred shares—went into the pocket of the speculative director. There were many who, finding sold short at 80, refused to buy in at 95, and remained "short," borrowing the stock from day to day. These the speculative director punished by refusing to lend them the stock except for a bonus—say $50 a day for each hundred shares. Day after day passed, and a few resolute patient "Bears" paid their 18 per cent. a day, and refused to cover. All the weak and faint-hearted "shorts" had already bought in.

The question now was, what to do with the stock on hand? A few thousand dollars had been taken from "Bear" speculators. But this apart, the speculating director found himself the owner of all the Erie stock in the market at an average cost of over 90. There was no demand for the stock. Nobody in Wall Street or out wanted 100 shares. At 85 there had been a small consumptive demand. At 95 there was none at all.

The speculative director formed many combinations, by means of which he succeeded in interesting others in his operation. In the course of a day or two these combinations led to disputes among the confederates, and some of the parties to the conspiracy began to sell. Others followed, and the cry of sauve qui peut being raised, such quantities of stock were thrown upon the market that in a few days the price fell from 97 to 75.

The speculative director had not succeeded in selling all his stock. As his account then stood the sale would not cost him more than $1500 less than half a million. It was a painful reflection for a man who was accustomed to make, not to lose, money in stocks, and especially in Erie.

A week or so elapsed, and the director resolved to look for his money where he had lost it. He began to buy Erie again. Other speculators were as quick as he, and Erie began once more to rise rapidly. From 75 it jumped up to 80, from 80 to 85. At 85 to 85½ the speculative director made his grand demonstration. He bought all the stock that could be had at the price—say 30,000 shares in a single day. On the following day all the Erie loaned out was called in. From ¼ to ½ per cent. a day was again demanded for the use of the stock. Once more the Bears were squeezed within an inch of their lives, and none but the resolute held out. On the next day the grand pinch was ordered. The stock opened at 87, and every one said it was going to 90 before noon. To the amazement of every one, at 87 there was an ample supply; fully 10,000 shares were sold in the morning, quite enough to supply the more pressing wants of the Bears. It subsequently appeared that some weeks previously, when Erie was 75, the speculating director had sold a call for 10,000 shares at 85, and the holder of this call had defeated the corner by supplying the Bears at the expense of the seller of the call. Thus once more the attempt to corner the shorts had failed.

It took the speculative director but a few days to realize that he had once more missed his mark. Most of the shares he had covered their contracts, and as there was no consumptive demand for the stock at 86, it was clearly futile to put up the price. The director began to sell with vigor and despatch. How much he sold and at what prices is only known to himself and his brokers. Within a fortnight the price fell to par cent., and real stock was still being delivered from the speculative director's hoard. It is not unreasonable to suppose that at least a quarter of a million must have been lost by him and his friends in their second attempt to corner Erie.

It is now supposed that they have altered their position, and gone short of the stock. In the late new allotment they may or may not receive the losses they have met with in their previous attempts to corner the street. But Erie will have to fall very low indeed to give them the $750,000 thrown away in the two abortive enterprises of January and March, 1865.

The lesson should not be lost upon Wall Street speculators. If the leading director of the Erie, with unlimited capital, unrivaled skill, and vast power over the market, failed in making money by cornering that stock, it is safe to conclude that no stock can hereafter be profitably "cornered," unless the party which corners is content to wait for years before making it for an indefinite period of time thereafter. Such operations, in a word, inflict severe loss upon the Bears, but bring no profit to the Bulls. The feeling of Wall Street is such at the present time that the mere mention of the words "clique" or "corner," in connection with a stock, is sufficient to prevent operators dealing in it. No one will buy or sell a cornered stock. And though people who sell that which they have not got are naturally victimized by such disputes as underlie the way stocks reported to be oversold, it does not follow by any means that the cliques themselves will find a market to dispose of the stock. Many of the public argue that a cornered stock must be let alone, and when the Bulls, after ruining the Bears, try to convert their property into cash, they can not, as a rule, find a purchaser. This has been done by the Erie director. Prairie du Chien stock, some account of which was recently given in these columns, was cornered by a sold to-day in any quantity at 50, though the last reported sale was 96, and the clique—which owns all the stock in existence—bids 92 as a matter of form at every board.

In an article publish'd early in January we alluded to the probable downward course of prices in Wall Street during the present year, and to the probable unemployed speculators combining to corner this and that active stock. Both expectations have been realized. Prices have fallen very nearly all round, and one of the most active stocks—Erie, Michigan Southern, and Rock Island—are or have been cornered. The result is that business is falling off in Wall Street, and that the number of operators is being steadily diminished. The Bears are being cornered and bled profusely; the Bulls are being loaded up with stocks which they can not sell, and which they will only be able to hold so long as money remains easy. The indications are that business will continue to decline until a speculation arises in some new investment, which can not be cornered, and in which no thimble-rig can easily be practiced.

THE "METEOR."

THE case of the Meteor is peculiarly interesting as showing the extreme care of the United States Government to maintain the honorable American relation of neutrality. Nothing can be more desirable, nothing can be more dignified and impressive than to show to the world that, when we denounced British neutrality as a mere name, we knew what we said, and were not crying out merely because we were hurt. Yet it is quite possible that, in the very purpose of showing this shining moral, our Government may be a little hasty to seize an occasion. And that is the exact question of the Meteor. Shall she be seized and detained as a violation of the Neutrality Laws intended?

The Meteor is a noble screw war steamer. She was built in the best manner, is thoroughly equipped, could be readily armed, and was doubtless intended for service during the late war. The war being over she was about sailing from New York for St. Thomas in the West Indies, when the Spanish representatives here complained that she was to be sold to the Chilean Government now at war with Spain, and asked for her detention. The Government immediately issued the necessary order, and the ship was seized. The claimants of the ship assured that the Court appoint appraisers, that the ship might be justly valued and bonds taken, and the vessel released. Upon this motion Judge BETTS decided, on the 23d of March, that the release was not obligatory, but discretionary with the Court. He held that the importance of a strict observance of the Neutrality Laws was so great that the United States should have reasonable time to prove their case; and that when, as in this instance, a forfeiture was claimed under the third section of the Neutrality Laws of 1818 it was clearly the intention of the Government to detain the vessel in order, if necessary, to execute the forfeiture. The application for release was therefore overruled.

It now remains for the Government to justify its action, and to prove that hostilities have been fitted out a ship to commit hostilities against any country with which the United States are at peace. But should the charge fail it is a very hard case for the claimants. The libel was filed on the 23d of January. It is now the second week in April. If the charge be baseless, if it were wanton, the owners, to drag daily from the use of their property, and subjected to the expenses and delays of an important suit, have apparently no remedy but applying Congress to give them compensation. Judge BETTS will never forgive them no other redress. There is no reason or excuse for so shiftless and unjust a state of things. If a citizen brings an ungrounded suit he is made to pay the piper. If the Government does the same thing it should be subject to the same penalty. Great property interests should not be left unprotected by any peremptory action of a Department, to the discretion of a judge, or to the delays of the law. If the owners of the Meteor are innocent the law let them pay the penalty. But if they are innocent let the accuser pay for the losses he has inflicted. And this is a redress which should be established by law.

THIERS AND LOUIS NAPOLEON.

In his late speech upon the grant for the GREAT PARIS EXPOSITION, MR. BANKS, the Chairman of the House Committee of Foreign Affairs, said that he had no doubt of the visit of LOUIS NAPOLEON to go to war with this country. It was not surprising, therefore, that the honorable gentleman proposed that we should accept the Emperor's polite invitation to his Fair, and that we should go thither in Monitors and military baggage-wagons, carrying our 20-inch guns, 600-pound rifled projectiles, with Admiral FARRAGUT at the head. If, however, the French Emperor is still desirous of war with us, as the result of our domestic struggle, we hardly think that the mere spectacle of our projectiles can accomplish what the prolonged and vigorous use of these projectiles failed to effect. We should have been glad to hear the reasons of MR. BANKS's faith, for we doubt if this country or France is of his opinion.

The Emperor of France is a much duller man than he has been hitherto supposed if he is not convinced that his Mexican expedition is a failure. He knows very well that the United States are waiting for him to leave Mexico. He knows that MR. SEWARD's dispatches, however polite, are very plain in their statement of the feeling of this country; and that if we wait we do not cease to watch, and that any serious movement of increased persistence will be met by force. He is still civilized enough to abhor war. He is aware that we have as yet made no false move. His Mexican enterprise is unpopular at home. The pressure against it grows constantly stronger, and he is doubtless persuaded that this Government is much too sagacious to overthrow that opposition by a policy which would unite France to violently its honor.

Meanwhile the late speech of M. THIERS reveals a new danger to the Empire. The veteran Bitherto the opposition in France has been revolutionary and not legitimate. It has opposed his dynasty, and has thereby justified him in his own assumption that it was the natural and political foe, M. THIERS, has adroitly changed his base. He declares that there is now no question of the dynasty. That is established. The question is liberty which the founder of the dynasty has promised, and which he has hitherto withheld upon the plausible pretext that it could not strengthen the hands of its enemies. The opposition itself now removes that pretext, and respectfully requires a fulfillment of imperial pledges. This is an immense fortification of opposition, for now if there be any danger of revolutionary measures it is not upon its side. It can now reasonably demand, as THIERS does demand, freedom of the press, personal security, and retirement from MEXICO and other unpromising expeditions.

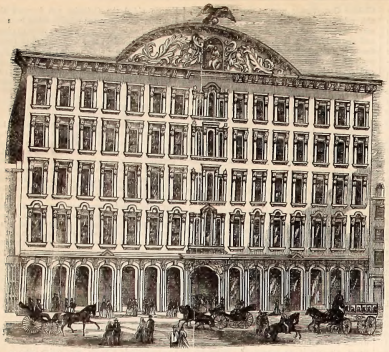
There was never a time in which watchful quiescence was so clearly our true foreign policy as at this moment. Neither LOUIS NAPOLEON nor the United States desire themselves as to the traditional amity of the two countries. France aided the Colonies not because the Bourbons and they favored rebellion, but because helping the Colonies was a heavy blow to Great Britain. The debt that we incurred to LOUIS XVI. has been fully cancelled by LOUIS NAPOLEON. He has put himself completely in the wrong. He must right himself or account to France. Our position is one of steady observation.

LENGTH OF LIFE.

DIFFERENT animals have different limits of life, the universal being of all degrees, from the insects of an hour up to the animals that live even beyond a hundred years. There is in each case a period of growth in which a supply continually exceeds waste, followed by a period in which there is an even state, supply and waste being balanced, and then comes a period of decay. These periods seem to have quite a definite relation to each other, for the longer is the period of growth the longer is the middle period of maturity, and therefore the longer is the whole life. For example, the horse that gets its growth so much sooner than man, does not live half as long; and the elephant, on the other hand, which arrives at maturity about the thirtieth year, lives to a much greater age. Of fishes the salmon, which attains its full size quickly, has short life, while the perch, the carp, and the pike, which have a slow growth, are long-lived. The same truth holds of the vegetable world.

Length of life depends somewhat upon the degree of activity of the life of relation, and is longest where this is lowest. Tortoises, crocodiles, and fishes furnish as many more instances of great longevity than the warm-blooded animals, which are comparatively a much more active life. And of the warm-blooded tribes the less active are generally the longest lived. Thus the stately, proud, and slow-moving peacock lives about twenty years, while the restless and quarrelsome cock has a much shorter life. Still shorter is the life of the sparrow and of the smaller birds generally, and their activity is, we know, intense. The rule does not always, however, hold good; for the hare, though so sharp much, and is far from lively when he awakes, is rather short-lived, while the active camel sometimes reaches the age of a hundred years.

We may thus infer that the natural limits of life in different animals are conformed generally to the activities which they each. There is a provision for every animal which is consistent with its best development, and either going above or below this is detrimental to it. Man is not fitted for such activity as is maintained, for example, by the restless horse, nor for such a low degree of life as that of the tortoise; and if he choose either his organization will suffer, and life will be shortened. To use living animals for labor is a cruel abuse of power.



It can not be said, then, that there is a certain amount of vital power given to every individual, which he has to use in this is just that he will last. On the contrary, the putting it forth to the extent of the design of his nature is essential to its preservation. In other words, some good degree of action is necessary for the development of the vigor of health. Yet it is not probable that the due exercise of the laws of health would extend the limits of life very far beyond what they are at present, though it would very largely lessen the mortality of infancy short of old age, and render life more comfortable and useful.

There is one consideration in relation to length of life of great importance to be omitted. As mortal tendencies are transferred from parents to children we should naturally suppose that every hygienic effects, as well as in the struggle against actual disease. A full victory is often obtained by the new individual over some hereditary mortal tendencies of the most decided character.

SOLDIERS' FAMILIES LABOR AND AID SOCIETY.

IT was the reproach of the country after the Revolution that the soldiers were neglected. But the spirit that sustained the enormous labor of the Sanitary Commissions during the late war does not permit the neglect of soldiers' wives or widows come to work daily, and are paid one dollar a day. There will be a hospital in the house for disabled soldiers, and a school in which mothers can leave their children, while they are themselves at work elsewhere in the building. Employment, and elsewhere in the building. Employment, and the character and experience of the ladies who direct the society are ample proof of the sagacity, thrift, and tenderness with which the Home will be managed.

The institution needs money now, but it is intended to be self-supporting. The Sanitary Commission promises a thousand dollars some time hence; but our good friends might wisely remember that he gives twice who gives quickly. MRS. JAMES GERMOND and MRS. F. B. MORGAN will gladly give any information or receive any contribution.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By George F. Harrington.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XIV.

"Brr I do sincerely hope, my friends, that we are really by this time to turn away from these record and seventh chapters of Daniel. There are a host of other passages in Scripture I am anxious to show you. Astonishing, is it not, that men should have supposed so long that America was not referred to in the Bible? Why there is not a day passes but I, for one, find some fresh allusion in it, especially to our glorious Confederacy. Yes, let us leave this behind us as settled. By 'the Ancient of days' here in Daniel is clearly meant the old United States. By the 'one like unto the Son of man' is as undoubtedly meant the Confederate States. The 'mountain' refers, as we have seen, to the United States also. The stone 'cut out of the mountain without hands,' which is to dash all other nations to pieces, and become the great empire Christian nation of the millennium, is, as we have clearly shown you, the Confederate States. Any flaw in our reasoning is simply impossible. Any man that can not perceive this is hopelessly rotten. Heaven forbid, dear brethren, there should be a Union man among you!"

And here Brother Barker pauses, wipes his streaming face and then his moist hands with his very damp handkerchief, lays it beside his Bible to dry, takes another sip of water, and begins afresh. He is in the pulpit on his regular monthly appointment in the Pines, a country neighborhood some fifty miles from Somerville. A log church it is, densely crowded to-day. On his last regular Sabbath there Brother Barker had preached a thanksgiving discourse upon the defeat and capture of M'Clellan at Richmond, so powerful as to bring him into a state of hoarseness from which he is not recovered even yet.

"I'd rather wear out than rust out," he has remarked; and to-day he is delivering one in his series of sermons upon the Confederate States in Scripture.

The fact is, it is long now since Brother Barker has preached any thing else except the war. Nothing in the world more insipid, behind the times, obsolete for the present, than the Gospel. But has he not taken up prophecy instead? And is not prophecy as much a part of Scripture as the old gospel? And Brother Barker frankly disclaims all credit as the discoverer of his new interpretations of prophecy; they are discoveries too splendid for that.

"I only use the investigations of other divines at the South," he said. "The documents themselves can not be circulated as widely as they ought owing to the dearth of paper. But so conclusive are these discourses, so exceedingly encouraging to every Christian patriot, that so far as my poor bleeding heart will allow I am making them known by word of mouth to all under sound of my voice. I learn there are up here in the Pines some who cling to the old Union still; few, very few I do hope. If the brutality of the North, if the justice of the Confederate cause have not convinced such of their error, Scripture surely must. Scripture," brethren, Scripture! And right here let us turn, if you please, to another passage—but wait a moment. Let me see," says Brother Barker, folding his long arms upon his narrow chest, and standing back a little from the pulpit. "As you all may know, your unworthy speaker was born at the North. I have some half dozen brothers alive there this very Sunday, I suppose. Do you want to know the Scripture that cured me of my last love for the North? Turn then to Genesis forty-first, fifty-first. Wait a moment. What was the first great battle of our revolution? Manassas! Very good. Now read the passage: 'And Joseph called the name of the first-born Manasseh: For God, said he, hath made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house.' See?" And with the finger of his left hand on the passage, Brother Barker spent a vehement five minutes in showing how entirely the South had in and by that battle been made to forget its long slavery to the North, all affection even for that the home of its ancestors.

"Scripture prophesied enough for me here," he said, with both palms on his Bible. "'My old father? Manassas! My brothers there? Manassas! The North, and all in it, now, henceforth, and for evermore?' At the very least utter forgetfulness and eternal alienation. In other words, Manassas, Manassas! And yet there are people who doubt whether our war is referred to in this Holy Book!" added the preacher, with an air of patient resignation.

Another application of the handkerchief to face and neck and hands; another sip at the glass of water.

"Let us turn now to Isaiah sixty-sixth, seven and eight." And Brother Barker reads—"'Before she travailed, she brought forth; before her pain came she was delivered of a man child. Who hath heard such a thing? who hath seen such things? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day? or shall a nation be born at once? for as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children.' Now remember," continues Brother Barker, leaning one elbow on the desk, his long forefinger demonstrating the point of remember what has been proved that, as the ecclesiastical Zion was a type of the New Testament church, so the political Zion was equally an emblem of the central nation in New Testament times—that is, America. And clearly does the preacher apply the prophecy to the instantaneous secession of the South.

"Turn again to Daniel twelfth, seventh." And Brother Barker finds the place and reads—"'When he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished.' Now, who are the holy people?" asks he. "America, of course, the Christian Israel. What was their being scattered? Secession evidently. And what was to be accomplished then and there? Look back to the seventh chapter going before: the establishment of Christ's last and most glorious nation—these Confederate States! Can any thing be more conclusive?" And Brother Barker goes over the passage and his comment thereupon several times, to the satisfaction of upon the hearers. Very fixed is the attention of those hearers.

Once more, if you please. Isaiah twenty-seven, verse first. And the preacher reads—'Ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of Israel.' What exact manner of Secession! No co-operation, no movement of the States as a body; 'one by one' do the States secede!" And on this point also Brother Barker dwells at length.

"Let us turn now to the eleventh of Zechariah," the preacher reads the chapter. "By the breaking of the staves Bands—Unity and Bands'—was prophesied the dissolution of the Union. The three shepherds alluded to in the passage, and all that is said of them there, how manifestly it refers to Missouri, Maryland, Kentucky, and the temporary exclusion from the Confederacy!" And the interest is thrilling as Brother Barker shows from the passage how the North, in its awful destitution and self-division, are to "eat the flesh of one another!"

But the enthusiasm of the preacher overflows all bounds as he turns to the fourth chapter of the Prophet Micah, and paints therefrom the millennial splendor of the Confederacy. Over and over again does Brother Barker read it. "'In that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out—drives out!" cries the preacher, "'and her that I have afflicted; and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation.' Observe, brethren, 'cast far off'—a strong nation! And the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth, even forever.'" And so to the end of the chapter, at which the speaker arrives entirely exhausted.

"Matthew twenty-first, forty-third," resumes he, his handkerchief almost flying in his hand from its service upon face and neck. "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof.' In the verse before is allusion to a rejected stone," reasons the preacher. "You will remember we saw this stone all through Scripture; cut out of the mountain of the old Union; destined to destroy and supersede all other nations in the Confederate States; 'become the head of the corner' is there says. Why? Because the Union, the old Christian Israel had failed—every thing failed—bring forth fruit—fruit which the Confederacy will bring forth!" And closing the Bible, Brother Barker describes at length the awful agonies of the North, its universal infidelity and abominable wickedness. "Ought I not to know?" he asks, in conclusion. "Am not I a Northern man? born there, raised there? It is sometimes asked by people, sometimes the preacher, with both hands clenched upon the ledge of his pulpit, and leaning as far forward as possible between them—"sometimes asked why Northern born men make the strongest of all Secessionists. I will tell you, brethren. It is because we who have lived at the North know the North so much better than men at the South. From long, personal, close observation we know the North!" And what intense loathing did the preacher infuse into the word! Strange that his audience should have such a sense of distaste at hearing this from the lips of one born there! True, of course, but they did not like him to assert it. The Brother is conscious of this, and falls back a little disconcerted upon the thirty-fourth chapter of Ezekiel, the eighteenth and nineteenth verses.

"You need not take my word, friends; see what Scripture says of the conduct of the North." And he reads—"'Seemeth it a small thing unto you to have eaten up the good pastures, but ye must tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures? and to have drunk of the deep waters, but ye must foul the residue with your feet?' And as for my flock, they eat that which ye have trodden with your feet; and they drink that which ye have fouled with your feet." And the minister illustrates this prophecy of the tyranny of the North over the South by its course in regard to the Tariff and the Territories, resolving himself with the speedy righting of the South, prophesied so clearly in the verses which follow.

"Some of you have been rather trying to jokes me about my last sermon here," the preacher says, by way of digression. "True, I did believe then that M'Clellan was defeated and captured. Suppose it was not so complete a defeat as we then supposed; and where is that one of us that had any doubt on the subject then? Look again at my text of that sermon: 'I will remove far off from you the Northern Army, and will drive him into a land barren and desolate, with his face toward the east sea, and his under part toward the utmost sea, and his stink shall come up, and his ill savor shall come up because he hath done great things.' Is there a man that does not see that Scripture refers here to Lincoln's army, by its very name, too? I need not enter into this passage again. If it has not been fulfilled entirely yet, it certainly will be, and that soon. But let us turn to Daniel again, seven, eighteen, this time. 'The saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever.' Now what does 'saint' mean when applied, as Scripture means it should be here, to a government? Why, it means a mild, a gentle government. Friends, contrast the Confederacy with the old Federal Government. That bound the States together strong and hard; ruled them with a rod of iron; the most despotic Government, as this war shows, that ever disgraced the earth. But our glorious Confederacy! How perfectly mild and easy it is! The States are free to go and come under it as each one pleases, no restraint, no coercion. The North is invading us—does our Confederacy invade them? No, brethren. It only asked to be allowed to go out of the Union in peace. It did not want a war. It never dreamed of a war. This day it is the gentlest, most peaceable, most leniency; the lightest, easiest government the world ever saw. No wonder Scripture speaks of it under the name of 'saint.' Ah, if the North could but come up to the true idea of all government in this nineteenth century; the millennial, the Christian idea of government—States free as air to vote themselves whichever way they like! Instead of that, what do we see? Why, the old heathen ideas of permanent rule, coercion, war! I tell you, friends, Secession contains in itself the very essence of Christian freedom; it is a Gospel doctrine; it is the very germ and substance of all human organization in millennial times!" And largely did Brother Barker expatiate on this theme.

"Bear with me, brethren," he continues, as he searches the pages of his Bible. "I want to show you another—ah, here it is! Zechariah thirteen, from the seventh verse." And here the pen recalls from recording in such connection the first, at least, of the verses quoted by the preacher. By "the man that is my fellow" Scripture meant, according to him, the "one like unto the Son of man" referred to in Daniel; in other words, the Confederate Government. "'And it shall come to pass, that in all the land,'" continued the preacher from his Bible, "'saith the Lord, two parts therein shall be cut off and die; but the third shall be left therein.' When we seceded there were thirty-three States, you know," continued the preacher, holding his finger upon the passage for after use. "Three classes there were among these thirty-three States. First, the Border States; second, the Coercion or Northern States; third, the Confederate States, eleven, you observe, just a third of thirty-three. The two parts cut off from God's new and glorious millennial Confederacy, shall die, you see, be defeated, destroyed, perish—the Border and the Northern States. The third—our Confederacy—shall live and flourish in the land in permanence and prosperity. And look how our trouble from the blockade and the war is farther prophesied—verse nine—As if I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried: they shall call on my name, and I will hear them: I will say, It is my people: and they shall say, The Lord is my God.'"

But it is impossible to follow Brother Barker. Only the intense excitement attaching to every syllable said by any one on the one topic enabled the audience to sit so patiently under his eloquence. Less than twenty minutes of a discourse from his lips on any other topic would have wearied them out. There was there, too, in the glowing enthusiasm of desperate. Whoever else did not he at least did believe in his interpretations of prophecy. Need we say how he described the impending convulsions at the North from the sixteenth chapter of Revelation, the nineteenth verse? Or the rout at Manassas and in all the other battles of the war, so foretold in the forty-eighth Psalm, fourth, fifth, and sixth verses? Or the future influence of the Confederacy over the world in the nineteenth chapter of Revelation, the fifteenth verse, the "rod of iron" referring to its commercial, and "the sword out of his mouth" referring to its moral influence? That Secession was the act of God himself, He setting up the Confederacy with his own hand, Brother Barker proved from the second chapter of Daniel, the forty-fourth verse. The peculiar estimation set by Heaven upon the same Government, from Isaiah the twenty-eighth chapter and fifth verse. And that the Almighty himself was fighting for them the prophet Zechariah has left beyond question in the fourteenth chapter and third verse of his prophecy. Let those who wish to study the theological aspect of the insanity in the times refer to the chapters and verses specified at their leisure. Let them remember in doing so that there were men who sincerely believed Jefferson Davis or Barker's application of them, and a new insight will be had into the depth and desperation of the insanity.

But the preacher has reserved some of his most telling texts to the last.

"I was in the same discourse I showed you," said he, "that in Scripture the number seven refers to the seven States that first seceded. Permit your humble speaker to give you a few more illustrations of this most striking fact." And so he drains the last drop of water from the pitcher, fills when he begins, pulls down his waistcoat by the lower edge, moves pitcher and glass out of his way by placing them on the bench behind him, and resumes:

"Micah, brethren, fifth, fifth. Then shall we raise against him seven shepherds and eight principal men." And clearly is it proved that while the seven principal men means the seven States which first seceded, it is Virginia, standing when the Federal Government had become "Assyrian" in its attitude toward God's chosen, which makes the eighth.

"Seven, my brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. And transfixing the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he exercises special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel: only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach." Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instead of each one hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain free, preserve, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, in the the peculiarity we had for us by the Almighty?

"Once more, but once, though you can not but observe how exhausted I am. Jeremiah fifteen, nine. He that hath borne seven has given birth: she hath given up the ghost; her sun is gone down while it was yet day." That the Union is this unhappy mother; and its fate, after the departure of the seven seceding States, the utter desolation in mid ocean that Beecher Barker surpasses himself in the delineation thereof. When he ceases at last it is solely because he is physically unable to articulate more clearly audible. And then he holds forth his long arm, his heavy-lidded eyes almost shut, and stands for minutes exhausted but triumphant, in the attitude of a conqueror over his captives.

Fanaticism? It has nothing to do with such merely as a sect: it is temperament. Look at Brother Barker as he stands. That narrow forehead, that lank hair, those restless gray eyes, those incessant hands. Had that man been cradled in Rochester and Mormonism he would have been Donite, apostle, leader of the delusion. Had he been into the mysteries of Spiritualism, no man would have whirled more madly on its rapid error. Only let him have had a hint in time of Father Miller's theory of the end of the world, and no man alive would have been more positively certain than he that the world was to end on the second day of June, 1843, at precisely half past two o'clock to the morning. The Scriptures are full of it! The Bible for this, and the other, whatever the fancy be he flies off upon? He could find you passages innumerable, passages beyond all shadow of question, passages so perfectly convincing of his theory that, it pains him to say it, but you are an infidel if you hesitate to believe. Or place a red conical cap upon that small, narrow head; strip off the suit of rusty black, and wrap Brother Barker's lean shanks in a cow's skin instead; give him a twirl by the shoulders, and no Dervish along the Golden Horn would revolve more fanatically on his toes, or with greater strength of conviction and lungs than he.

But the evil is, Brother Barker is not content to revolve on himself: he is for a war all the world if it fails to spin and scream with him. Riding one's hobby is an innocent amusement enough. Did not Uncle Toby ride his hobby? Only Uncle Toby never rode his hobby over any one else, and that is almost the sum of the pleasure of the ride with Brother Barker.

Dr. Warner had once remarked to his wife that Brother Barker was afflicted with a species of moral "cutaneousness," by which he meant, as he explained to his wife on demand, that the Brother never forever breaking out afresh in the sudden rash of spirit and tongue whatever heat happened to be in the atmosphere. It mattered not a straw the nature of the heat from the first the hottest of the heated was Brother Barker.

At the time Mrs. Warner entirely agreed with her husband: and the defect of character which her own also, so repeated and deplored the fact as to lose the Doctor nigh a score of patients, the members of the Brother's church. To do her justice, however, when the preacher went in for Secession with Mrs. Warner, that lady retracted in the circle this supreme defect in him, and mournfully ascribed such an impression on the mind of the Doctor to "his abominable Union notions."

Nadab and Abihu? Alas, the censer of this minister never glowed except with "strange fire." Most of his ministry had been spent in onslaughts upon other denominations, and it was wonderful the skill with which he platted detached passages from Scripture like so many separate thongs into scourges for his foes; for all who did not agree with him were foes, actual and active foes to be met and defeated as such. Neutrality? No more than moderation. Was there an atom of it in his character; therefore he could not conceive of its existence in that of any one else. And when Brother Barker did preach the Gospel, it was in tones so vehement, so unlike the gentle accents of the Master, that the very Gospel heaven, and Gospel hell, and Gospel salvation wavered too strongly of the minister himself to have their full effect upon the mind which bloweth as it listeth never blew at all in his estimation save as it blew exactly from that quarter he would have it, and in a hurricane at that.

"Just one thing more, my friends," says Brother Barker, as soon as he has recovered voice enough for the purpose. "When I was explaining just now that prophecy from Daniel about the mist-like character of our Confederacy, its being, in other words, the mildest government the world ever knew, so mild as to be almost no government at all, just brotherly, I saw a gentleman in this congregation shake his head. I ought to have stopped and asked him why he did it; but, truth is, I was under such headway I could not stop then. Let me now ask the Brother why he shook his head?"

There is nothing more embarrassing than in the audience, the deep stir within the heart of war. The minister stands silent for some minutes, but no chance in the way of chewing—nothing else noticeable.

"I believe you are the friend that shook his head," the preacher remarks, and that long finger indicates a man on the left of the congregation. An unusually large and tall man it is, a conspicuous object on account of towering above those around he sits. A large, prominent face, plenty of black hair and whiskers, butternut coat and pantaloons, no relaxation of feature during his brown chances in the way of chewing—nothing else noticeable.

"Paul Brooks, I think," adds the preacher, all the St. Dominic and the Torquemada stirring in his veins.

"Sir!" exclaims the gentleman designated, after a torrent of amber. "Did I shake my head?"

"Yes, Sir, you did," says the inquisitor, solemnly, and in the discharge of a painful duty.

"I did, heh? I didn't know it. But I know I thought it very strange when you said at this time to think of it, I dare say I did." The speaker says this coolly enough, but he knows the peril he has incurred, for he is among his foes. Paul Kentuckian as he is, even more than he acknowledges it in his mind. There is breathless, painful silence.

"May I ask why—may this intelligent audience of Southern citizens ask why you shook your head?" The question is addressed to a criminal condemned. He will let him say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, however.

"When I shook my head, though I didn't know till now that I did it," replies Paul Brooks, "it was when you used the figure as if this new movement was the freest and mildest Government on earth. What I meant by shaking my head was—exemption and mildness to me!"

The preacher hears him in silence; then only draws together his lips in unspeakable contempt, and shuts his hand in the deepest sorrow, and takes up his hymn-book.

"Forty-sixth Psalm, second part, long measure," he begins.

"Will you excuse me one minute?" says the Kentuckian, as he rises. "I am in the middle of things seeing it's Sunday. You won't object, I suppose: and I think a good many of us would be interested."

The preacher pauses, hymn-book in hand, with the air of a martyr at the stake, assaulted but patient.

"You say Scripture speaks plainly of this new movement?" asks the Kentuckian.

The preacher looks down with a low bow of the head. There is something indescribable in it. It is as of a judge on the bench to some unreasonable prisoner whom he is already settled.

"And we must take exactly what Scripture says of this movement—that is, what Scripture may seem to say about it?"

Brother Barker smiles a sad but patient assent.

"And we, as good Christians, must obey what it says in reference to this movement to the letter?"

The Kentuckian retains his seat, but spits copiously between each question.

"By movement I suppose you mean our glorious Confederacy?" replies the preacher, sparring with both hands to the audience in sorrowful expectation.

"Yes, Sir," says the Kentuckian, very mildly, even persuasively.

"You have some intention in your question, I see that. But yes, Sir, yes. What Scripture says of our Confederacy—and it alludes to it continually and pointedly—we obey, Sir, implicitly." And the preacher loses a little of the martyr as he stands on the defensive.

"Then you have one or two texts in Scripture," begins the Kentuckian.

But "Brother Barker was sharp as a steeltrap," as was afterward remarked by some then present. "Exactly as I thought," he interrupts, at the same time closing his Bible and pushing it away from him. "No, Sir, thank you. I do not read those passages. For one, I can not. I dare not make such mockery of the word of God."

"Nothing more to say?" remarks the Kentuckian, and so expectorates and subsides into his former indolent position on the rude seat he occupies.

"Forty-sixth Psalm, second part, long measure!" says the preacher, briskly, and with some emphasis, hymn-book in hand.

"Hold on a moment, Brother Barker!" It is an old man seated, with a staff between his knees, near the pulpit. "I don't like this way of doing things on a Sunday, and in meetin'. But now we are at it friends present would like to hear you read the passages; every thing bearing on the pint is interesting."

The preacher acknowledges the movement of assent among the crowded audience. But he can not comply.

"No, Brother Robinson, if I would I could. As a minister of the Gospel, standing here in this sacred place, I can not. I dare not make mockery of God's blessed book."

"The shortest way is, let us read them then. Friends present want to hear. No danger of Scripture hurting any of us whatever part it is. None the texts, Mr. Brooks." And Brother Robinson, the patriarch of the neighborhood, is standing before the pulpit, the minister's Bible in hand.

"I had no intention of disturbing the meeting," began the Kentuckian.

"Passages, Mr. Brooks; you name them passages," interrupts the patriarch.

If the Kentuckian names the eighty-third Psalm, the first five verses, the patriarch is a long time finding the place. Brother Barker leans, with a peculiar smile, over the raised upon the pulpit.

"Keep not thou silence, O God: hold not thy peace, and be not still, O God. For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult: and they that hate thee have lifted up the head. They have taken crafty counsel against thy people, and consulted against thy hidden ones. They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance." "Let's see," consulted together with one consent: they are confederate against thee." Humph, confederate against thee!" The patriarch finds the passage very slowly.

Brother Barker groans.

"Hold on," he says; "Brother Barker has stated what he considers to be Scripture language, that is—are the Confederacy Scripture speaks of. I see the ones confederated together in this place are mentioned in the text. Let's count. If I recollect the patriarch transfers the Bible to his left hand, while he counts aloud with the fingers of his right upon the knee. "Edom, Ishmaelites; Moab, Hagarenes, Gebal, Ammon, Amalek, Philistines, inhabitants of Tyre, Assur, children of Lot—Selah. Seven exactly!" Deep sensation among the audience.

"Any more places, Brother Brooks? Be safe, for here's a long passage to follow, which is to come over again to be certain. "Out with it, Brother—yes, eleven exactly!

Isaiah nineteen, second, third, fourth, and seventh verses," from Paul Brooks. Breathless attention.

"And it was told the house of David, saying, Syria is confederate with Ephraim. 'Confederate?' Yes, well. 'And his heart was moved, and the heart of his people, as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind. Then said the Lord unto Isaiah, Go forth now to meet Ahaz, thou and Shear-jashub, Take heed, and be quiet; fear not, neither be fainthearted for the two tails of these smoking firebrands. Thus saith the Lord God, It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass. Humph, queer!"

There is a movement of interest in the congregation as the reader ceases.

"My friends," begins Brother Barker, holding up his right hand.

"In one moment, Brother Barker," the patriarch interrupts him. "Any more passages, Mr. Brooks?"

"I was told Mr. Barker found a good deal about the Confederacy in the Bible. I happened to come across a Concordance, and hunted out the places where the word occurs. Our preacher says the Jews were nations of the Confederacy. I thought the word in their history might teach something. However, only two passages more. Let me study a moment. Ah! yes—Obadiah, seventh verse," says Paul Brooks.

"Chapter?" asks Brother Robinson, turning over the leaves.

"Ain't any chapter, seventh verse."

"All the men of thy confederacy have brought thee even to the border: the men that were at peace with thee have deceived thee, and prevailed against thee: they that eat thy bread have laid a wound under thee: there is none understanding in him," reads the patriarch. The very slow manner in which the passage is read is itself significant to a running audience upon it. The interest in the congregation deepens.

"Only one more: Isaiah, eighth chapter, ninth verse," says Paul Brooks.

"Associate yourselves, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces; and give ear, all ye of far countries: gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces; gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces. Take counsel together, and it shall come to nought; speak the word, and it shall not stand." But there ain't any thing about the Confederacy in this," says the patriarch, looking up.

"Go on," says the Kentuckian, with a copious expectoration first.

"For the Lord spake thus to me," the reader continued, "with a strong hand, and instructed me that I should not walk in the way of this people, saying, Say ye not, A confederacy, to all them to whom this people shall say, A confederacy; neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid."

"That's all," said Paul Brooks.

The reader closed the volume, laid it on the pulpit, and took his seat, resting his chin again on the staff between his knees. Dead silence.

"And do you, Sir," said the preacher, severely—"do you, Sir, say to this intelligent Christian, intelligent Southern congregation, that those passages have reference to our glorious young nation?"

"I say nothing about it. You all hear the witness you attacked me first. I only say, if all your places in the Bible mean as you say, what this these other places mean? I leave the silence that follows the splash of the Kentuckian's indignant expectoration is distinctly heard.

"I have read, I have heard of awful perversions of this blessed and sacred book, brethren," says Brother Barker, after a pause, and in deep and measured tones; "but never in all that desecration and wresting of Scripture I never heard in my life. On Sunday! In this holy place! During the very hour of divine worship! Only this one thing I've got to say, brethren"—and the preacher leaned over his pulpit toward his audience, and spoke in low, significant tones—"has been told before Paul Brooks is a Union man; now I know it from his own lips. Brethren, brother Jews, look myself back, as with a calmness awful to behold. "Forty-sixth Psalm, second part, long measure. Brother Brooks will please raise the tune, my bleeding lungs will not permit."

A ROMANCE OF THE HAREM.

AN ORIENTAL ADVENTURE.

THE bold, cunning, cruel, yet beautiful Nazly Hanein, daughter of Mehemet Ali, has been the heroine of many a romantic story. The following incident, therefore "strange," is said to be "true."

Count Luigi, a young Italian nobleman of effeminate appearance, became possessed with an intense desire to visit the interior of the Mysterious Harem at Cairo. He bribed a lady, with whom Nazly Hanein was intimate, to assist him in carrying out his mad whim. The success of the Italian's scheme was informed that a lady of rank from Europe was anxious to see her Harem, and to pay her respects to a Princess who was highly honored. An audience having been granted, Count Luigi, thoroughly disguised in female attire, proceeded alone to make his romantic visit—his fortune utterly reckless in undertaking him in so perilous an enterprise.

On reaching the palace he was received in an Oriental style, by haughty eunuchs, and beautiful slaves; and at length, after numerous ceremonies, was ushered into the presence of the Grand Princess Nazly.

The Count thus describes his visit and subsequent adventures:

"The Princess Nazly was of small stature, though beautifully made. She wore, over a pair of wide bright nansensicals, a robe of crimson silk, a large white Cashmere dress, the loose sleeves of which displayed her well-formed arms, and which, being open in front, were fastened with a pin of gold at length. A waistband of splendid large pearls, fastened with two large diamond clasps, encircled her waist. Her tiny feet were dressed in a pair of red slippers, embroidered with costly pearls. Her head-dress consisted of a large fillet of golden-colored crape Cashmere, which was twisted gracefully around her head. Her long black hair, neatly plaited, was rolled up behind and fastened with large diamond pins. Her bracelets consisted of strings of enormous pearls; her necklace was composed of some of the finest pearls imaginable, which fell negligently on her clear alabaster skin. She felt desperately in love with her at first sight. How incomparably beautiful she appeared! How haughty and tapered was her nose! How small a sweet, pouting, shell pearly white teeth; the whole of her lineaments were perfection itself! But her eyes! ah, what eyes! Large and black, the most piercing I had ever beheld; at one glance they seemed to scan me from head to foot, to read my thoughts, and cause my heart to palpitate almost violently. In fact, they shot through the very innermost recesses of my mind. Every time that her penetrating glance was fixed upon me I felt my countenance change, and I could have sunk into the earth. Is it possible, thought I, that these scrutinizing orbs can read the confession that I had framed?

"Pipes and coffee, according to custom, were served; and then I commenced conversation with my vice-regal hostess. As soon as the usual compliments had been exchanged, I conveyed to Her Highness my feelings of deep regret that my sudden indisposition had prevented her from accompanying me. I told her that she was extremely ill, almost on the last quarter of an hour's visit, and was astonished that I did not even go so far as to state that she was dead.

"What must we begin to tell lies we hardly ever know where to stop. The excuses that I made for that lady's absence were graciously accepted by the Grand Princess, and our conversation passed on to other subjects.

"'Have you any family?'

"That is always the first question which an Oriental lady asks her visitor. I answered, as a matter of course, in the negative.

"'Therefore I suppose you are journeying to Jerusalem to pray to your prophet to give you some?' added the Princess.

"'Your Highness, with singular aptitude, has guessed the object of my journey.'

"'May Allah grant you your desire! for then your husband will love you more affectionately. Does he go with you?'

"'No, your Highness, business retains him in Europe.'

"'I am sorry for that: for it must be very dull to have to travel all that long way alone. For when a woman has to endure loneliness it is almost as wretched as death!'

"The sudden remark she had mooted was a very delicate one for me; so I endeavored to turn the conversation upon some other topic.

"If very seldom happens that women in the East meddle with politics, especially Princesses; nevertheless Nuly Hanein had become quite au fait with them: and what she said showed clearly how well and deeply she had studied the art of government. Dearly believed by her extraordinary father, possessing his unlimited confidence, she had, literally speaking, been the companion of his misfortunes and active life, and therefore had become quite a politician. Still it was evident that I ought not to appear to take much interest in politics, seeing that I myself was then but a woman. So I turned the conversation as skillfully as I could to topics praising the jewelry which adorned her person, and intimated that it would afford me unbounded delight to see her casket of jewels.

"A signal being given, an immense iron chest, covered over with red satin, richly spangled with gold, was brought in. It was opened, and the jewels were taken out of the cases.

"It is impossible to describe their magnificence and splendor! My light was actually dazzled by looking at them. Aladdin's wonderful lamp, I am quite sure, could never have given its fortunate possessor a sight of any thing like those precious gems. Among them were pearls as large as pigeons' eggs, topazes as big as fowls' eggs, emeralds as large as pears, rubies, diamonds, and—I really can not enumerate the names of half the other unique precious stones; but there were quite enough of them to fill a Bristol measure. The Princess Nury hardly deigned to bestow a glance upon all these priceless treasures.

"'Your Highness,' inquired I, after having greatly extolled the beauty and workmanship of those wonders of art and nature, 'does not often wear them?'

"'Never,' replied she, very curtly. 'No, never; they are too heavy, and of what use would it be for me to adorn my person with them?'

"Then there was a long pause: the silence at length became so painful that my perplexity almost was extreme, more especially as the Princess never removed her eyes from off my face.

"And in order to premune to look the silence, I endeavored to conceal my perplexity by smoking a little, and drinking coffee.

"'I perceive,' said Her Highness, at length, 'that you have a great desire to visit my Harem; your request shall be gratified.'

"Accordingly the Mother of the Harem and half a dozen pretty slaves took me with them on a tour of inspection. The Princess did not accompany me; and having satisfied my curiosity by walking through one of the splendid suits of apartments, I was conducted back to Her Highness. Coffee and pipes were again served; and these Circassian slaves, according to Oriental musical instruments, produced some discordant sounds, which, however, were not wholly unpleasing. Meanwhile Her Highness reclined indolently on her divan, placing her red lips from time to time to the beautiful amber mouth-piece of her chibouk, from which she puffed forth the clouds of perfumed smoke. Occasionally she seemed as if lost in deep thought; but those piercing dark orbs of hers never left their glance off my face, even when they were withdrawn, I still felt their fascinating influence upon me, for the very murrow in my bones appeared to become frozen by their power.

"At length the hour of departure arrived. Accordingly I submitted with the best grace the most impassible manner possible, and thus anointed with strong perfumes I slightly touched with the tips of my fingers the Princess's hand, and retired from her respectfully to my lips; which is the mode in which persons of rank take leave of distinguished Orientals. The Princess bowed gracefully as I was rising up all at once, just as I had reached the door, she advanced toward me.

"'Come,' she to me, 'I must show you my garden. And I will accompany you myself.'

"Then we passed into the garden, accompanied by a whole host of attendants. Then, taking hold of my hand as we descended the staircase, and lucky was it for me that I had a very small hand, totally unlike that of a man, or else it would have betrayed me.

"The guard who followed us kept at such a respectful distance from us that it was not impossible for them to overhear our conversation; we, however, maintained an interminable silence, but it would have been all the same if we had been conversing with each other.

"The gardens into which we had entered were undoubtedly very beautiful; but I remember that I was so dreadfully agitated that I am quite unable to give any description of them. I did not bestow the slightest attention upon the trees, flowers, beds, or fountains. All that I remember is, that we walked for some time along, very slowly, under a very long avenue of sycamore-trees, from where I must have been least noticed.

"The silence that both I and the Princess observed toward each other at length became unbearable. So at last I took upon myself to break it, and began to praise, in as pure Turkish as I was master of, the perfume of the flowers, which I had neither noticed nor smelled; the gentle murmuring of the waters, that I had not listened to; and the proceeding in the same strain when the Princess interrupted me rather sharply, without the least allusion to the subjects of my position and dignity.

"'I hope that you do not for a moment imagine I am your dupe?' said she, in a curt manner, at the same time letting fall my hand, which she had held in hers up to that moment. 'If my husband, Defterdar, whose anger knows no bounds, had seen you, and had but the slightest inkling of your intrigue in thus presenting yourself before me, he would have had you impaled upon the spot, and most assuredly you would have deserved it.'

"'I flatter myself,' said I, 'that I have shown you, and I will prove to you again shortly, that I possess no fear, and that I am no coward.'

"Nevertheless I can not but confess that those words gave me such an electric shock that the whole of my limbs shivered and trembled violently. The bare idea of impalement is one perhaps less agreeable at any time. I was so thunder-struck that I remained speechless. Fortunately the Princess gave me no time to offer any reply.

"'But luckily for you,' replied she, in a more subdued voice, 'my husband Defterdar is not at home, and I am as much mistress of my own actions as a woman can possibly be in any Mussulman's country. Adventures sometimes have a very pleasing beginning to me; I admire courage, no matter what form it takes; even if it borders on temerity or rashness. If, then, you are as brave as you say you are, and even which you have now undertaken makes me give you credit for, you will come to the Mogrob to-morrow, to the Elfy Gate; a tall negro, dressed in red, will pass you, touch you on the left shoulder, as he walks along. Follow that slave if you wish to know any thing more.'

"Saying which, she again took hold of my hand as if nothing had happened, and led me on without uttering another syllable to the end of the staircase. There she took leave of me in the most cordial and graceful manner imaginable, saying in a loud tone, so that all present could overhear her, that she was exceedingly grateful at having had the pleasure of conversing with one of the most learned of my countrymen, all of whom she trusted resembled me both in manners and habits.

"I proceeded to the entrance hall, followed by the slaves, I was led to the outer gate of the palace, with the same ceremony as had been observed on my arrival. Entering my carriage, I express a little more hastily than ladies generally do, I was driven to a place of safety, where I exchanged my Mussulman suit for my own dress.

"As I was then only twenty years of age, it will not be regarded as surprising that I never closed my eyes the whole day, which gave such a fine brain kept thinking of all the good and bad reports which I had heard about the Princess Nuly, and my mind became exhausted by it. Was it really a meeting or a snare that she had proposed? Was I to be the hero of an adventure or the victim of treachery?

"The next morning I purchased an excellent Damascus cimeter, as fine as a hair, and which was so highly tempered that it would have cut in a sider-down pillow in half. This I concealed beneath my cloak—for I now wore my male habiliments—this was my first step; and placing a six-barreled revolver in my pocket, I walked up and down the Mogrob in front of the Elfy Gate.

"It was not long before the tall negro in red made his appearance, and touched me on the shoulder as he passed. At that gate of Cairo is one of the most frequented in the city, and the number of any of the passers-by as I turned round and followed him. My guide soon proceeded along a path to the left, and after having passed through the rings which always led nearer to the banks of the Nile, he stopped short, which I did also, at the foot of a high wall which seemed to block up my further progress.

"As night had suddenly closed in I did not at first perceive the small low door, which had all the appearance of being the postern gate of some old castle, of which the remainder was in ruins. But as he was in the act of stooping down, for he was full six feet high, I scanned the height of the wall, thinking whether it would be an easy matter for me to scale it by dint of a gigantic feat. While measuring it as accurately as possible with my eye, the tall slave touched me on the shoulder, to beg me on the shoulder as a token that the door was open. I crossed the threshold with a firm step, at the same time drawing, but my revolver was not in my pocket and my Damascus blade by my side. The slave quickly shut the door after me, and I continued to follow him. He passed through a dark garden, which I shall not stop to describe, for the best of all reasons that the darkness of the night prevented me from being able to observe how it was laid out. My guide maintained an imperturbable silence.

"I really believe that he was a mute, and I will not swear but that he was deaf also, for he did not reply to a single question which I put to him. The sharing of our footsteps upon the hard sandy paths of the avenues as we passed along. After making several detours, we at length came to the door of a large building, beneath some large trees, which must have formed a most grateful retreat in the daytime. My guide of a sudden left me, but thereby, but passed me rather than introduced me into it, and there I was within that mysterious retreat alone in the dark with my cimeter in my hand, or prope my way. My first care was to find out my position as best I could. All that I was enabled to discover was that I trod on a wide space, strewn with the softest cushions, and that the hangings were of silk. It was surrounded with a large divan. I had just discovered the modus operandi of the penates when I felt something clasp my neck. It was not, however, the classic silken cord of the ancients of the Seraglio: it was only the two soft arms of a lovely woman.

"This mode of reception was adopted to banish all surprise. I returned the embrace as any young man would naturally have done, without waiting to identify the person of the individual who had thus honored me with her caresses, and one of the approaches were returned with corresponding alacrity. It was not long before I knew perfectly well by my unknown visitor was.

"The night passed away as rapidly as if it had been but a few seconds: the stars were still shining most brilliantly, when that awful word, 'Farewell,' was pronounced by the sweetest lips I had ever pressed, and by a woman who was much more mistress of her own actions than I was myself. I felt half inclined to have translated for her edification that beautiful balcony scene in Shakespeare's Tale of Love and Life into the purest Turkish that I could command; but she appeased my regrets by breathing into my ear the fond hope that I would come again to-morrow, at the same hour, and in the same manner; and then, embracing me, the lovely phantom vanished, in the twinkling of an eye, like an ethereal being.

"I did not remain long alone: a heavy hand was placed upon my shoulder, and I hastily retreated. My safety, however, was not yet secured. I was not long in discovering that, instead of returning by the way he had conducted me, my guide, still the same black-skinned fiend, took me in a very different direction. He walked straight toward the Nile, which lay before us, as the creaking of waterwheels confirmed.

"'Good,' said I, as my heart beat with its usual promptitude. 'This is like having passed a quarter of an hour on a Rahdah ride. Now comes the forfeit. I am doomed to pay for the happiness I have enjoyed.' And all the dreadful tales which I had heard of the lascivious treachery of the Princess Nuly presented themselves to my imagination.

"Remembering that I was in Egypt, I began to consider how and by what means I was to escape from the snare into which the beautiful but perfidious Princess had entrapped me. My black guide was six feet high, his frame Herculean, and I should have stood but little chance had I wrestled with such an antagonist. That Gellah would have brained me with his tomah, and I possessed not the prowess of David.

"It is true that I was armed with one of the keenest of Damascus blades ever made, and a six-barreled revolver; but then the report of fire-arms would have brought hundreds of enemies to his rescue, and as to the cimeter, well-tempered as it was said to be, I placed no confidence in it, as I had never used one before. I remembered that at a sabre blow mad missed I was a dead man; and yet I was obliged to adopt some plan; time pressed, or else in a few short moments I should be over the Nile.

"The creaking of the water-wheels became more distinct; the Nile was evidently not far from us. The first dawn of the day, which gives such a very indistinct light in the East, hardly allowed me to distinguish any more than the lofty wall beyond the trees, which appeared as well as on the other sides encircled the garden. Soon afterward I saw the gate which opened on to the river, and you may rest assured that I was taken aback thereat. I saw that it was guarded by three tall phantoms, three devils of blacks, placed there most unquestionably to cut off my retreat. I sent my pilot to the devil like a kitten, as they had done many a European before.

"At the sight of those formidable opponents I resolved to put into execution the project I had been meditating. Approaching my pace, I had recourse to an angle of masonry-work, which concealed me from observation, to rush upon my guide with the delight of a mad bull-dog ripe for his prey. I then plunge my Damascus blade up to its very hilt into his body. My trial strokes proved a chef-d'œuvre. I must have pierced his heart, for the poor devil dropped down dead instantaneously without uttering a groan. I then rifled his pockets, expecting to find there the key of the door by which I had entered the grounds. I was fortunate enough to put my hand upon it, and, leaving others to bury his body, I turned about quickly and ran along as fast as my legs could carry me.

"In a few minutes I reached the opposite wall: the same height of which I had taken the precaution to measure. On arriving there I found to my dismay that I had overrated my gymnastic abilities, and was baffled. A squirrel could not have bounded over it. I was then obliged to seek for the gate, which I was not long discover. Was it on the right hand or the left? I could not tell. By mere chance I proceeded to the right, that side appearing the most likely; and, fortune to praise! I had hardly gone thirty steps before I found the gate which had been anxiously sought for.

"Scarcely, however, had I put the key into the lock when three tall black eunuchs came suddenly upon me from different directions. They were the same whom I had seen entering guard at the door to which the defluent negro was proceeding. The first one who approached me brandished a tremendous large club, with the view which would have cleft my body in twain, but the first ball from my revolver laid him prostrate on the ground. It had, however, only broken his arm, but that was quite enough for the moment, as it was his right arm, and his sabre fell from it. That slight chastisement for his treacherous conduct in a measure effect upon his companions, who thought that they would receive a similar correction, as they were also armed with formidable cimeters. As they drew back I passed through the door, and in so doing fired at them two farewell shots, without stopping to see what mischief I did. But it is most probable that they were killed, as I proceeded quietly on my way, and reached my own house safe and sound before sunrise.

I wish you now to strike at the cause of my ailments, if it is in your power to reach it." "I shall be done," said the doctor, at the same time lifting his cane and demolishing a decanter of gin that stood on the sideboard.

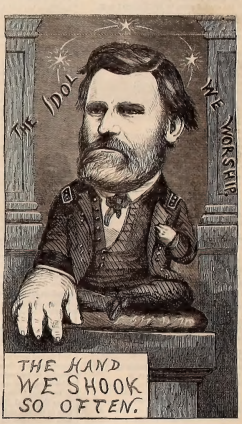
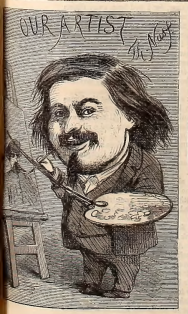
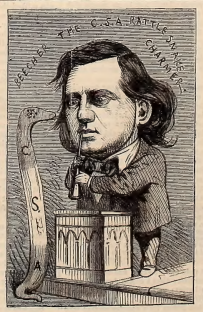
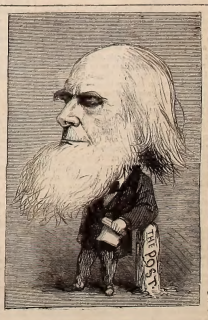
GRAND MASQUERADE BALL GIVEN BY Mr. MARETZEK AT TH









Th. Nast.

ADEMY OF MUSIC, April 5, 1866.—By Thomas Nast.—[See Page 234.]

THE BAL D'OPERA AND CARICATURE DECORATIONS.

On double page this week represents the grand Bal d'Opera which took place at the Academy of Music on Thursday night, April 5. It was undoubtedly the events of the season, and proved a great success, the committee having spared no expense to make the arrangements on as grand a scale as possible. We hope, from the title with which this one went off, that Mr. MAREZEEK may be induced to repeat the experiment annually. The picture is surrounded by representations of a few of the caricatures with which the ball-room was decorated. This new and original style of adornment emanated from the fertile brain of our own artist, THOMAS NAST, and greatly redounds to his credit. There were nearly a hundred paintings, all of them excellent caricatures, easily recognized at the first glance, and they formed the principal topic of conversation. They each of them amazingly portrayed the characteristics by which the various distinguished individuals were known, but none of them could be considered ill-natured; all parties fared alike, from the President down. The caricatures are to be sold by auction at an early day, at the Somerville Art Gallery in Broadway, near Fourteenth Street, when we hope Mr. NAST may amply realize the just reward of his talents and industry.

THE WORKERS.

CLEAN, clank, sound the hammers now!
The sturdy workmen ring;
The bellows roar, and the hot flames pour
Their ruddy light o'er the floor!
And the brawny smiths, they sing.

White, white, go the busy bones
In the factories of form and high,
Where the steel mandrels softly fall,
Through the crusted paste, on the blackened wall,
From the gaps in the industrial sky.

Stitch, stitch, go the needles bright
And the silver gleaming thread;
Women sitting cozy and late,
While the eyelids droop with a heavy weight,
To earn their daily bread.

Click, click, go the slender types,
As they fall from the printer's hand;
Scattering wide each burning thought,
As it lingers half in the mind that wrought,
For over the waiting land.

Burr, burr, go the busy planes
In the lumber-yards, and where
The stately joisters all day ply
Their noisy craft; and the shavings fly,
And make their home in the air.

Ring, ring, chime the virgin coin,
As the mighty lever falls
On the solid bar of silver and gold
By the swarthy coiners fashioned and rolled
In the great mint's vaulted halls.

Delve, delve—hear the miners at work
Far down in the hidden mines,
Toiling by day and toiling by night
Mid the sparkling ore, where no ray of light
From the warm sun ever shines.

On, on speed the sharpened pines
As they turn the heavy mill
Where the sturdy farmer guides the share
Through the hard earth's furrows, gleaming bare,
With the horny hand of toil.

These are the workers, hour by hour,
With hearts that are brave and true,
From dawn till dark, through the whole day's length,
Each gives with an earnest will his strength
To the work he finds to do.

But a grander task for all remains
Which will only end with Time;
And this grand task is "mid the ceaseless din
Of the constant struggle that hems us in
To make our lives sublime.

DIMPLE.

SHE had golden hair, black eyes, a brunette skin, and a dimple in her chin. I think I fell in love with her at once.

I wasn't any body in particular then, only a farmer's lad with a pair of strong arms, and plowing all day in an old mare Burton's field I used to see her going down into Aunty Maple's meadow joining it, with just a rail fence between, to milk the cows. I didn't know her name, and I felt shy about asking it; for who, at eighteen, likes to be laughed at? And I called her to myself, "Dimple."

I used to say when the sun began to dip behind the Camel's Hump, which, either purple or white, was always to be seen from the field on clear days, she'll be here in half an hour. And there was always was, with her stool and pail, calling to the cows by name. There were four of them: Suke, and Short-horn, and Dapple, and Crummie. One day Crummie brought us acquainted.

They had left her on the beast's calf from her, and she was like a wild thing about it; and just at milking-hour that torment of a boy, Nat Maple, hid himself behind the bushes and made a lowing sound. Crummie thought it was a calf, and when that minute Dimple opened the gate she lowered her horns and made at her.

What with the surprise and the fright together the girl stood quite still, turning white as the lilies in the pond close by; the pails dropped out of her hand and the stool flew any where, and there she was, there, there, giving herself up to her fate without a struggle.

There was a man near enough, and he was over the fence with a great oak stick in a minute, and the next Crummie was one side of the gate and Dimple on the other. Brutes with four legs, like brutes with two, are generally afraid of those they know are not afraid of them, and there is no denying Crummie's mind to toss me, I fancy.

But there was Dimple in a swoon, and the farmhouse a quarter of a mile away. So I could only fill my hat with water from the pond and sprinkle her face with it, and lift her head upon my arm and hold it there, trembling to think she might have been frightened to death, until the great black eyes opened again, and the lips parted and began to grow red again, and she would stand up all pale and trembling. I steadied her with my arm for a minute or so, and then I took the pails and went into the meadow and did the milking for her, and after that I carried the full pails home for her, for she was trembling still. By that I earned a smile and a nod when we met, and, maybe, a word over the hedge at milking time, for in the course of Camel's Hump one didn't care much, just then, about formal introductions.

Her name was not really Dimple, of course. It was Hetty Shaw; but I never thought of her by any name but that. And I never knew her mother at all for me. I think she liked it, for what girl ever had a pretty dimple in cheek or chin without knowing it? None that ever I heard of.

I'm sitting in a velvet chair just now, in a room that cost goodness knows how much so furnish. I've an account at the bank, and shares in the Passumchunk Railway Company; but I'd change in a minute if I could back to raw, awkward John Jasper, perched on a rail fence, with nothing in his pocket but a hole, talking to Dimple, milking her cows in Aunty Maple's meadows; and many a richer man than I would give more any thing you could ask to put him back into a poorer place than that, if you'd only give him youth and the girl he first loved into the bargain.

It was the sort of thing to remember in dreams, that homely courtship, under the blue sky, and I was not in love with Dimple one bit. Cut that bit out of my life and it isn't worth much, to my thinking.

"Yes, I am married, and I hadn't said it. Was not he my wife?" yet, in so many words, but words are not needed when hearts know each other. I had looked and said enough, no doubt, and I went every where with her, and had that air of proprietorship in her which every man, high or low, understands, and took the liberty of finding fault with her gowns, when I didn't like them, and of telling her she looked better in pink than in blue; and she put up with it. Just the surest sign in the world that she liked me.

Nobody found any fault with these things that I know of but Hal Maple, the widow Maple's son. It seems he had liked Dimple as well as a man could like a woman, and, perhaps, might have told her so, if it hadn't been for the pity of seeing her shy and shut, with a fondness for books (he was studying for a doctor), who let time slip through his fingers without marking it, and who never guessed Dimple for a lover until he met us, face to face, her hand in mine, in Green Lane one Sunday evening.

Dimple tried to get her fingers away, but I held them tight, and a blue lightning danced in Hal Maple's eyes, and his cheeks flushed, and I saw through his pale mother's face clear down into his heart. He was as jealous as Othello.

Not that I knew much of Othello then, seeing I had never been to a play in my life; but a few months after when I went to Boston and saw it performed, the actor—he must have been a good one—looked over the lamps into the pit at me with just Hal Maple's face, blue lightning in the eyes and all, as I saw it in Green Lane.

After that meeting he tried his best to make up for lost time, but it was too late. I don't blame the fellow for hating me; and when the hatred began to touch to himself, and never did an ungentlemanly thing. He was a gentleman by nature was Hal Maple.

How proud I was, and how glad I was, and what pyramids of little hopes I built! Not one of which could have been done by Dimple's father, Tom Jasper, the one trial of my life—the thing I had fretted and fumed over more than I can tell you—nothing more nor less than a farmer's lad who only wanted to be something more, and stopping short with a common school education when it had been in my mind to be a lawyer. Nobody had any more than Hal Maple, whose mother could send him to college and let him study for a profession; so he would some day be called to the bar, or made a gentleman's position in the world. Now the tables were turned. Hal Maple envied me. We were cool to this world, but I was the richer in my own estimation by having made myself envied.

This was my plan just then. To live along in the shadow of the Camel's Hump mountain, and bring until I could get a piece of ground. To build a little house on that, when it was bought, and marry my little Dimple. Then, a barn, a few cows, a churn, a pine table, and four chairs, and a big feather-bed, what more could mortals want to begin with? I never should have had Dimple a bit the more if one bright day—I think Satan showed him the way—my mother's Uncle Darrow had not found me out. He had quarreled with my father about before, and in his old age had grown remorseful. He told me plainly he should not rich enough to make me rich without injuring his own children, but he was ready to give me a start in life. "A respectable start," he said, looking round upon my boots and the bits of hay on my clothes, "and one your mother would approve of."

Well, I had given up all hope of such a thing, but the wish was not dead yet. It flashed up into flame at his words. I thanked him and pleased him by looking genuine and grateful, and that day got ready to go back to Boston with him. I was so busy that every cow in the meadow had been milked by the time I jumped the fence to have a talk to Dimple.

"Dimple," I said, in a hurry, "I'm going to Boston by the eight o'clock train."

"To Boston!" she cried; "for long, John?"

"For good, Dimple," said I.

If her color had been paint, and she had dipped her cheeks in the pond, all the red could not have left them faster. I saw I had frightened her, and began to comfort her.

"I have excellent prospects there," I said. "I've always hated this life," and then I told her all. She ought to have been pleased, but she cried instead.

"How lonesome it will be!" said she.

"I shall miss you, I'm sure," said I; "but I'll write twice a week and come down when I can. It won't seem much. Besides, it's not for long, you know."

At that her cheek changed to scarlet.

She talked a good while in womanish fashion about what I should do in the city, and she sat down by me on an old stump and let her head rest on my shoulder, and by-and-by grew more cheerful. But oh, how hard it was to leave her after all!

I kissed her at last, at parting, and came back again to kiss her once more; and then I stopped to wave my hand to her, and stopped again, just at the foot of the hill, to see the little figure looking after me; and once more at the top, when a flock of pink I knew to be her gown was all I could see against the green grass. And during my months of darkness set and guessed how they came so. People never die as the minute they afterward think would have been best for them. When my aunt would have gone straight to heaven if my body had dropped, a bit of clay, under the sycamore on the hill-side, then. I sat in the back seat to go back to old man Barton that minute and ask him to take me back, and refuse to accept any offer that would separate me from Dimple for a day; but in an hour or so I began to think myself an idiot for harboring any such fancy. At eight o'clock I stepped into the train, and was off for Boston.

I was three-and-twenty now, and it was hardly the thing to begin to court. My education was sufficient for a mercantile life, and into that I entered. At a low point, of course, but with a chance for rising. My salary was what would have been a small fortune to me a year before, and at first I intended to go back to —— and marry Dimple and bring her up to Boston to keep house for me in a week.

I didn't know what city life was then. In a week my resources were no more. And I need salary was not enough to dress and live alone on as I must. I must wait for Dimple. Meanwhile I wrote to her. I received letters with queer, crooked, ill-spelled notes, my name in the corner written "Mister John Jasper," and "with great love" beneath it. I kept them and put them away in my bosom at first. After a while I sent her word to have them left at the post-office until called for, because there was no need to pay postage to me. I got them. At my uncle's it was worse yet. There were three pretty girls there who teased me unmercifully about them, and screamed with fun at the crooked filling and the unnecessary caution to the postman on the back. It was very cruel of me to be ashamed of loving Dimple's dear letters, but I was. They did her such injustice. That was the way I excused myself. They did her such injustice. She was a lady when you spoke to and looked at her.

So I thought; but three months with these fashionable cousins of mine, and I went down to ——, met Dimple at the church door, and walked home with her. She was more beautiful than ever; but the rapid half-education that I noticed, after the first happiness of the meeting was over, that had also begun to show itself. She blushed, and what the Mesdames Darrow would have called "a fright." Besides, it certainly was not stylish to hang on my arm with both hands as she did, and to carry her handkerchief folded flat on her hymn-book in the bend of her elbow. But for all that I loved her, and thought the time when she should go to my wife. I knew now it could not be until I could hire a house fit for a gentleman to live in, and train Dimple through the fine ladies' wars, and have sofas and lounges and tête-a-têtes to sit on, instead of the four pine chairs which would have contented me once. I hadn't got that sofa up for me, and I paid for the lost simplicity and the ease with which I could have settled down in the poor little cottage where meeting Dimple at the church door was a surprise in my hands half the way back to Boston, with a sort of miserable desire to shut out thought along with the bright face.

It was six months before I went down again; and then I must have cut a very fine figure, for there was a sensation in the church when I went in, and I heard a whisper of "Boston store clothes."

I had a cigar-case of prime Havanas in my pocket, a watch-chain with a big locket, a diamond ring and a pin to match; but I was by no means rich enough to be married. My salary would be doubled next quarter, and I had my eye upon a estimate of "the least a young couple could live on."

Perhaps my manner was colder to Dimple than it had been. Perhaps I was then my proudest; and it was a whole fortnight before she wrote. I could kiss her letter then, for I had been anxious about it.

Oh dear, dear! what little things our tragedies and comedies on the stage of actual life are made of! Write Dimple one half the letter she must have would read them. Little things happened to me, and drove me step by step into a new road, and so it came to that letter never sheet to Dimple, to marry; that is, a poor girl, and that there was no reason in the world why I should not marry Dimple, and that, all things considered, I would not. So those queer little notes went unanswered, until, in the height, Dimple came down to Boston to see me. That ended it, for she was no fool. By the next post, after she went back, came this note to me:

"MR. JOHN JASPER,—I am not angry—only I have seen what things are in your mind. You may have been a good minister, and it is better to speak plain about it than to be all in a mist. You may be a good lawyer, and, by-some safe hand, I will send your letters. Please send me back all that you have of mine, and them now; and believe I shall always wish you well.

"HETTY SHAW."

When that note came I raved and stamped and tore my hair at first; then I cooled down. It was better—much better; and then it was her doing, not mine. (How I lied to myself!) So pretty soon I sent back her letters by a country woman who brought them, and that was all over between us, and Dimple was not my Dimple any longer.

Sitting in the close city office, in the hot summer days, I used to think sometimes of the green grass meadows and the waving grain-fields, and wonder whether she came there at sunset, as of yore, to milk the cows. That sort of thing made me wretched though; so I did as little of it as I could, and at last resolved to do what my aunt had been trying to wheedle me into all along: namely, marry Miss Graymarsh for her money. She was very rich, and wonderfully stylish, but not so young as she had been, and never in all her life pretty. I danced with her a few evenings; called on her a few mornings; sent her a bouquet and tickets for the Opera; acted as her escort—and proposed. She was accepted under cover of the music, and was married in two months.

After that I had the finest house I knew of—a wife who "shimmered i' the sun," with her fine silks and jewels, like the bride of the ballad—moved like Queen Esther on the road, and was as idle as I pleased. Was I happy? Do you suppose a bolt is happy in a gilded cage? Ever and ever again, waking on a morning, I heard the tinkle of the cow-bells, and saw Dimple looking over the farm at me—Dimple, with her golden hair and jade-black eyes. I hardly knew what the color of my wife's eyes really was.

I led a life of mental wild as life could be. I was only home once in a while. Then, after the first, it was sneer, taunt, and quarrel—quarrel, taunt, and sneer. "My" house, "my" horses, and "my" money from her from morning until night. We never had a child; so there was nothing to bind us together. Still we went through the forms of society, and nobody guessed we were not fond of each other, I suppose. At last we went to Newport, as usual, one summer, and one glowing morning she would have me go down on the beach. I wanted quiet and my cigar. She turned me fiercely.

"My money bought you," she said, "and I do not choose to spend, what I am, a neglected wife. Come, I have had enough for your attentions."

I did not go with her. I said words to her which, even with such provocation I never should have said, and she went down with a rush to her fifty room and sustained down stairs. There was a crowd at the door, another crowd down on the beach, a dreadful something in every face I turned toward, a whisper of "Keep him back!" "Stop him!" It was of me they spoke; but I forced my way forward and saw a man bearing something in his arms and dripping up the path. My wife. By what chance no one ever quite knew she had been drowned. The first thought was that she had swum out herself, and, conscience-smitten, I swooned upon the floor.

When all was over and I was free, with wealth to squander at my will, I began to think. I might have made some little happiness for myself by being more tender to her. How even her love would have been better than the contempt. The splendid empty house was a haunted place to me, and I shut it up, and went wandering here and there over the world, at last to Europe. I came back to it when I found home no happier. I tried California. I lived a month in Canada. At last I thought of the Camel's Hump, and the village in the shadow.

I longed to see the old place once again. Perhaps I wanted to know what had become of Dimple. And there, in a few days, I found myself at the hotel, quite a fashionable place by that time, with Hessels carpets and mattresses in the bedrooms, and a piano in the parlor.

The place had altered. The people were dead or scattered. A young man with a sad old name, Burton's land, all but a piece cut off by the railway. The Smiths were all in the grave-yard, and the Brown girls had changed their names to Jones. Nobody remembered me, with my great man's mustache and beard, for the smooth-faced young fellow who had lived among them and milked my cows unchanged was the widow Maple's. She lived there still, and her son with her. She had hair as white as snow now, and in the middle of his pride was a great bald spot, such as students have, nine times in ten, before they are forty.

"There was a gilded sign—"Dr. Maple"—on the side of the door, and he had a gig; that was all. I wondered whether I should find Dimple there. After a while I saw her. Down in the meadow, milking the cows, calling them by name, as she did in the long ago. I half expected to hear "Crummie" called, but looked in vain for the old cow. It was a girl who milked them now, for I had been away fifteen years, but a woman—a very handsome woman of a round, ladylike form. I had her identified, aided by a little girl who came with her and went away, not seeing me. But I had seen her glance over the fence where I stood, and I knew she knew. I used to plow, and I wondered if she thought— She had the same black eyes and the same golden hair; and I had been right about the face, it was the loveliest in the world.

It could not rest after that. I rode past the house daily; sometimes twice, sometimes oftener. At last a lucky, or unlucky chance befell me. I was thrown from my horse, broke an arm and a rib, and was carried to Dr. Maple's house.

I was in pain, and only half-conscious at first, but as I grew better I began to know that Dimple was my nurse. Her hand was smoother now and made me my medicine. Often she kept vigil at night, and her face was always gentle and her voice low. What an angel she seemed to me! and even then I could not but notice that her countrified, girlish ways were softened down, and that she was quite a lady.

She knew me, for she called me by name; but what did she think of me? I could not conjecture. I could not solve. As I grew better I knew that I must solve it somehow. I had loved Dimple once, and I loved her yet, with a sort of new love, born of the present as well as the past. And I wondered whether she had kept single for my sake.

At last I spoke to her.

"Dimple," I said, "will you come here?"

She was sewing in the fading light near the window, but she laid down her work and came to me.

"Do you want any thing, Mr. Jasper?"

"I do, a few words with you."

"And welcome," she said, smiling.

"I'm so much better now," I said, "that I shall go home soon. I want to thank you for your kindness. You have been so good to me."

"I've only done my duty, Sir."

"But to me, I am so undeserving."

"You broke your arm, and were ill. We women never think further than that."

"Ah, but you must; I proved myself such a worthless dog, long ago."

"So long ago I've quite forgotten it," said Phœbe.

"You'd better sleep now."

"I can't, Dimple. Nor can I forget. Those old times were the happiest of my life."

"These will be the unhappiest if you talk any more," she said. "I shall all the doctor. You head is cool, and I will have you in a fever next."

And in a minute in came Dr. Hal Maple, making me jealous in a moment by the bright smile he won from Dimple and how kindly he gave her.

Sleep! I slept none that night, and there was fever at my heart if not in my brain.

I found no more chance of speaking to Dimple for some days, fume as I might. By that time I was well and ready to leave the roof which had so hospitably received me. I thanked the doctor and his mother, and looked for Dimple. She was not there. It was the milking hour, and she was in the meadow.

To the meadow I went to venture all: to lose or win for life. I leaned against the same wall, and hurt arm in a sling and watched her. She was teaching the little girl to milk, and laughing at her blunders. Soon she saw me and nodded.

"I have come to bid you good-by," I said.

"Good-by, Mr. Jasper," she answered, and crossed to me and held out her hand. "I'm glad you are well. Don't break any more bones. This has been a pretty serious time with you."

"I was mad when I believe?" I said.

"Yes, but for the doctor's skill you might have died."

"And your care."

She shook her head.

"I did nothing."

"You did all, Dimple, perhaps you did more than you know. You can't tell what thoughts were in my mind. How bitterly I cursed my heartless conduct. If I thought I had grieved you, Le—"

She shook her head.

"I was a young thing of seventeen," she said, "and not to be trusted. I was a child in nature. I was shocked, and I did fret a little. I'm ashamed now that I could have grieved for such a little thing."

"A little thing, Dimple?"

"Yes, the love that could change is too small a thing to grieve over, don't think of."

I can not convey an idea of the placid way in which she spoke, not taunting me, only uttering a truth she love not a while.

But I was flushed and excited.

"My love has never changed, Dimple," I said. "I was cold to you a while. I have never loved any one but you. I never shall. My heart has been empty since we parted."

"You will soon see to fill it yet," she said. "That little romance of yours and—and mine was over long ago. As well bewail a broken toy of our childhood. Be good-by, Mr. Jasper."

"Not yet," I said, in a husky whisper—"not yet. Dimple, I love you to-day as I never did before. Do not take your hand from me; but me keep it. Dimple, you must give me a little hope, or I die."

"You insult me, Sir," she said, wrenching her fingers from me. "You have no right to speak so. I have done nothing to warrant it."

"Insult!" I repeated. "Ah, Dimple, I mean no insult. I deserve punishment, but I have been punished. Think one moment, darling—be merciful; unless you are my wife life is valueless."

"Your wife!" she repeated.

"Dimple—your wife!"

She burst into a laugh—a rippling, innocent laugh.

I thought you knew," she said. "But then he calls me Hetty, and I call him Doctor; and we kept the children away for fear of harming you. I've been engaged a whole year, John Jasper, to Hal Maple is my husband. I know what real love is now—true love—that could not change. That is my girl" (turning to the dappled cow)—"the eldest. The others are boys. I'm a very happy woman, and have been a long while, John."

Then she held me pityingly.

"I'm sorry you are not. I hope you will be some day," she said, simply, and gave me her hand. Then she turned her out of sight along the meadow. Hal Maple's wife—not mine.

I'm an old man now, and live in the grand frozen city house. I married Amanda, who eat and drink with me, and am rich, and, among business men, a little famous. But often, amidst the gayest carousal or "on 'Change," all things of the present pass away, and I see the field and the meadow and the lowing kine, and Dimple among them, and lean over the bars to kiss her before I am sure it is only an old man's dream.

BURIED ALIVE

THERE is something dreadfully uncomfortable in the feeling with which one reads the recent debate in the French Senate on the report of the commission on a petition by Dr. Cornol, for an extension of the Code Civile in the matter of ante-burial ceremonies. The French law is exceedingly strenuous in all that relates to the conveyance of corpses from one place to another, and indeed in every thing connected with death, so that if an absentee dies by any misfortune charged with conducting the last rites for a friend or relation who has chanced to die in France, he will find it about the most annoying piece of business he has ever had any thing to do with. It is nothing of this kind, however, against which Dr. Cornol's petitioner, for its all public, bility a Frenchman accustomed to paternal government may not feel its solicitudes in season and out of season to be so much a pain as a less profusely governed man does. The law requires that twenty-four hours shall elapse between death and burial, and the minimum then fixed Dr. Cornol declares to be not nearly sufficient, a declaration which he supports by numerous instances of suspended animation, showing that he has good ground for his opinion that a large number of persons are annually buried alive in France. No subject would provide a more ghastly theme for the pen than this, and there is a fascination about it against which men like Edgar Poe have not been proof.

The matter is brought to a sufficiently striking, but a dramatic effect was produced in the Senate when the matter was brought before that body. Among a very numerous audience in the hall was an opportunity of witnessing—an effect which might have appeared in one of the elder Dumas's more shocking and improbable tales—the Senate suddenly up to this time have been held to be scarcely legitimate in ordinary words of fiction. M. M. Troplong, president, presiding over the debate, argued against the petition, and proposed to absolve it by the technical motion to proceed with the order of the day. Thereupon his Excellence the Cardinal Archbishop of Bordeaux rose and expressed his dissent from the Viscomte's conclusion. In the first place, he declared that the precautionary regulations of the law were very frequently evaded in practice, but the strength of the law would be much weakened if strictly carried out they were wholly insufficient. He had himself, while yet a curé, saved several lives about to be interred by the hasty precipitation of survivors. He had seen a man taken from his coffin and restored to perfect health. Another man, of strong constitution, had struggled with the coffin and yet lived for twelve hours after. Moreover, he had performed in his own person a miracle such as seems to belong to a good chapter of a romance, using a canonized saint had he lived in the Middle Ages, when people believed in the continuance of miraculous powers. Having been called to a young lady laid out for dead, the attendants covering the face on he entered, but allowing him to observe the patient as closely as he chose, the coffin was not dead but slept. Thereupon, with a loud voice (how Scriptturally it runs!), he cried out that he came to raise the dead. The young lady was convinced that by an effort she could shake off the lethargy which oppressed her, and could return to life. His Excellency, with natural sensitiveness, he made the effort, and has lived to be a wife and mother. This very remarkable account of himself brought the miracles of early times. Thus when Empedocles, the philosopher, got the credit of restoring to life a deceased woman, by the aid of Dr. Diemerbroeck, Bodin, and others), there can be little doubt that the person whom he saved was suffering under one of the various forms of catalepsy, but of which names have given so many different names, and to which we ourselves in common parlance, rightly or wrongly, apply the term of fits. It is worth passing, that although this remark might apply equally well to the case of the damned whom Dr. Watts "cursed in sleep," and to that of Lazarus, in that miracle was only one out of a very large number, to the majority of which no miracle was attributed.

But his Eminence had a more striking instance to adduce. A young priest fell down dead, as it appeared, while preaching one of the Lenten sermons on a sultry day, about forty years ago. The funeral bell was tolled, the doctor came and examined him as he reposed peacefully in his coffin, in the usual way as the two inspectors at Hull examined the fatal 600 head of diseased cattle in three hours and a half, and certified that he was dead, all in the dead man's full hearing. Then came the measuring for the coffin, the De Profundis recited by episcopal clergy, accompanied by the usual solemnities, and he was conscious of the preparations that were being made for his own burial. At length some one present spoke, which was the first sign that he knew and loved from very early years. A chord was touched which galvanized the frozen heart, and once more the blood became a living soul. Such stories are to be found in many story-books, and probably few of the Archbishop's hearers could call to mind a parallel instance of the kind as the result of their reading at an age when the marvelous and the horrible have a peculiar attraction for the mind. But there was something in the speaker's manner which led them to suppose that it was no ordinary tale that was being told. His Excellency, with a lump upon his further words: "That young priest, gentlemen, is the same who is now speaking before you, and who, now that he has attained the years of retirement, implores those in authority not merely to watch vigilantly over the careful execution of the legal prescriptions with regard to interments, but to enact fresh ones in order to prevent the recurrence of irreparable misfortunes."

It is sufficient, then, to run such a story to earth. We have never felt quite clear about the truth of the dreadful stories that are told of facts observed by Swedenborg, Cardanus, and other seers, terrors to which these facts give rise. Every one has heard of the lady whose ring tempted a servant to violate her body, and, even after having been cut off the finger from which it refused to be drawn, the shock of which brought back the dead woman to life and consciousness. But there is that ghastly scene where corpses are laid out in full dress, with wires in their hands connected with bells, so that the smallest motion of the deceased will bring down an attendant. And a tale is told of a corpse suddenly rising up from the bed on which it was laid out, terrifying the watcher so that she fled half-fainting, and the reanimated body was left without assistance and once more died for want of succor.

The horrors of being buried alive are so manifest and manifold that it is almost unnecessary to point out how such a death fear offenses only. Vestal virgins with broken vows and nuns convicted of unchastity are among the most conspicuous victims of offense. Being held to be the most heinous conceivable under the peculiar circumstances of their position. At Ensbury, in Dorset, there is a tradition that many years ago a man was put quick into the earth as a punishment, buried up to the neck, a guard preventing any from rescuing or feeding him till death relieved him. The Irish rebel, Shane O'Neil, used to get right after drinking himself drunk with sequebaugh by a like process, being placed upright in a pit and covered with earth to his shoulders, by which means, says Holinshed, his body, being "extremely inflamed and distempered, was recovered to some temperature."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

SOME sarcastic critic—evidently a novice in the ways and arts of fashionable society—has hits off the effected admiration temporarily excited by a young lady's manner in sing at an evening party:

"On being led to the piano the young lady first throws a timid glance round the room, ostensibly to show a gentle confusion, in reality to see who is looking at her. She then moves to the side of the piano, "That she is not in very good voice, having a slight cold, which she confirms by a faint cough, something between a sigh, a sniffle, and a single-knock cough. "Oh! but you always sing so delightfully," declares the hostess, encouragingly. The young lady is certain she can not this evening"—in consequence which opinion she makes some young gentleman exceedingly proud by begging her forthwith to hold; and during the ogling of her glasses the most approved style, lays them, together with her fleecy handkerchief, conspicuously upon the piano. An entire gentleman volunteers to shut down the top of the piano, which has been opened for quadrilles, and then the young lady, with a slight cough, commences, form a series of disturbing views; and the young lady at once begins to sing. As she plays the chords of the left hand she is about to luxuriate in every body is not prepared silent, in order that the music may be heard, or too low, or something of the kind. At length all being still she plays the symphony again, and then smiling at the hostess, and with a slight gesture she shall break down," she brings out the opening notes of a recitative, which makes the drop of the chandelier vibrate slightly and silences even a couple who are whispering all sorts of things to a timid-looking girl in the back drawing-room."

It is no wonder that such ridiculous affectation—of which the above is no overdrawn picture—should be rather disagreeing to sensible persons. It is a vice but to be teaching right to see a lady without apology comply with the request to sing, and to assume grace and ease that would contribute to the enjoyment of her friends in other ways.

Another feuill is lamentably common. Many a time have we listened to a song trilled forth in a most artistic manner, every note and word of which, whether it was French, Italian, or what foreign tongue, and have been surprised to find that it was not English; but that the artist could not have detected a word or syllable amiss if he or she had been singing in their native tongue. As a school exhibition not long ago, the first music performed was, "Teach me, O Lord," etc. It was sung thus: "Tee-ach me, O-ee-ee Lo-ee-ee-ord," etc. Ay ess-ay-ee-ee, ah shall lee-ee git vaste thi-ee-ee, dun di shall lee-ee pit vaste thi-ee-ee," etc. An audience was naturally overcome—exclaiming, "Wha, I declare, it turn away." It was rendered, "Teahrn, no Lor de" before much study.

Nothing is more delightful than good singing and good music—in the family, in the social gathering, in the church. But nothing is more vile than vocal ability or artistic skill is necessary to profane good music—the "spirit and the understanding" must be given into the performance. Let the children in the family be trained to sing—not merely the art of singing, but to sing "with spirit" and "correct ear," but all. How many look back regretfully to their childish days, remembering how they were told, "you have no ear for music" or "you're not correct," "you never make a singer," until it seemed a fixed fact. Some have been laughed out of song. Let not parents help their children to bury the one. All may not become Jenny Linds—but there are few of the family circle—with, at least, pleasure to themselves.

Some of our readers may do not seem to have much confidence in the knowledge possessed by their readers of the first principles of Numeration. The following item recently appeared:

"Leavenworth, Kansas, exhibits great mercantile activity for so young a city. The daily average of deposits at one of the banking houses of that city during the month of February was $1,000,000 over all business and investment stock dividends."

Yes, just ninety-one cents over! as any New York school-boy of ten years old would be able to tell from the numerals alone. However, such a double statement of amounts by the banking house seems queer. Few call to mind a certain fashionable dressed lady, sitting stately in her new carriage before the door of a certain Turkey-bound hymn-book. The clergyman gave out the hymn, number 1076. The lady looked over and the hymn, and then leaned over to her neighbor, and the hymn being pointed out to her, was heard to mutter, "one, 0, seven, one!" with which memoranda she succeeded in finding the place.

Burglars in New York continue to perform midnight breaks. In one recently no citizens understood this, that we do not believe it possible for the most devout believer in spiritual manifestations in this city to be "taken in" as was a servant in another city:

He was in his first comfortable snooze when a clicking noise in the hall awoke him. He listened. He listened intently; the noise was still going on—very like the rage of a mouse at the foot of the bed.

"Who's there?"

There was no answer, and the noise stopped.

"Any body there?"

No answer.

"I must have been a spirit," he said to himself. "I must be a medium. I'll try." He rose. A spirit is always in the room, it will signify the same by saying 'Ay'—so, that's one knock. Now, if there is a spirit in the room will it please to rap three times?"

There was a tremendous rap given in the direction of the bureau.

"Is it the spirit of my sister?"

No answer.

"Is it the spirit of my mother?"

Three taps.

"Are you happy?"

Nine taps.

"Do you want any thing?"

A succession of very loud raps.

"Will you let me have possession if I get up?"

No answer.

"Shall I rise from you to-morrow?"

Raps very loud again; this time in the direction of the hall. Then he knew that he was never to see his bed quilts, but once came. The spirit had gone; and after thinking the matter all night he left the bureau where it was.

On getting up in the morning he found that the spirit of his mother had carried off his watch and pins, left pants down into the hall, and his great-coat off altogether.

It is said that a Massachusetts man has invented a perpetual motion machine, which will do the work of twenty men, gathering cotton as clean as the most expert hand can possibly do it, taking it only from the pod as it ripens, and will pick the undeveloped pods unripened, and well open pods, leaving the cotton on the stalk to rot and not harming the plant. If this really proves to be a success—and there is nothing in Massachusetts genius it—it will materially aid in reducing the price of cotton.

To see a person in church nodding—apparently (from a back view) in approbation of the minister's opinions—is not such a very rare sight in the city, though more common, perhaps, in the country. If seats in church were constructed after the pattern of those in St. Philip's Chapel, England, built long before the time of Henry VIII, sleeping in church would be attended with difficulty, not to say danger. These seats are so fixed upon hinges that those who sit on them can only maintain their position by balancing themselves with care, and resting their elbows on the seat arms; so that if the old monks who sat there dropped asleep during the service the seat came forward and pitched them headlong on the floor. Thus, if they only dozed and nodded the least in the world, the hard oaken seat clapped against the oaken back, and made noise enough to attract the attention of the whole congregation. In our day, the more comfortable seats may be retained, provided we have little-like fastenings to the arrangement. In relation to the above, the cathedral nods are generated on one Sunday is carefully set up by the magistrates on the occasion of Sunday, of course the congregation will experience the natural somniferous effects, and the minister himself will most likely be unconsciously soporific.

We may laugh at the quaintness of speech in the little sentence given below, but there is an underlying lesson in it which we all might well learn and practice:

A black minister was closing up his prayer, when some little boys in the street had the ill-manners to laugh, so that the sable supplicant heard them. He had said but a moment before, and very earnestly, "Lord, if dat is business," when the laugh occurred; and commencing again, said, before that "business" was out of sight—"Lord, I see we not in de habit of askin' postscripts to our prayers; but I'se forgot something, Lord, I'se forgot, and can't take in dese wicked white fellers, den we pray dat de Lord will bress some dat ain't human also besides. Amen!"

The pronunciation of words declares that we shall have fonetic spelling before long, as all the world will, very soon, be either-killed. Perhaps this is really true at last. But the following list shows how many names are the example of the boy in the fable, who cried out, "A wolf! a wolf!" that we shall not be fooled, and expect to cut peaches in their season just as usual.

It is said that there is a plague of mice this spring in Ohio. They destroy the wheat, corn, potatoes, clover, and destroyed over five thousand trees. They are so thick that in passing through the fields in some places they scatter before you in every direction.

A London correspondent of The Queen gives the following inedited epigram of the cattle plague:

I was one morning surprised by a conversation I overheard the other day between two dancing acquaintances. "Do you know the last new play?" "What, the Tinsel Series?" "No." "The Eclipse?" "No." "The Croquet?" "No." "The Opera?" "No." "The Russian Loan-scrum?" "No." "The Donats?" "No." "Why, my good fellow, these are all old pieces. Do tell me if there's any thing else than any of them; haven't you heard the Bishopric Gaiety?" "Why, yes, I think I have heard of that piece, but I don't like it." "Pon my word they have though: it's a capital piece to hear."

The greatest crusade against natural hair was in the time of William the Third. It is recorded that a bather drove the fashion before him, and about then with a pudding of Absalom outside his door:

"Oh, Absalom, oh Absalom,
Oh Absalom, my son,
Would I had been torn a gobbling,
Before that hour been undone!"

Another record is that the barbers, having quarrelled, appeared in court. The complaint was, by the first barber, that he had a sign of a man, artistically painted, hanging to it by the hair, by which he had caught the bought. Under the picture were these words of similar import to those:

"Passenger, here you may behold
The fate of all those who scold;
If he had wisely worn a wig,
He'd not have hung upon this twig."

The rival barber and most thorough had a sign painted of a man drowning, and another man seeking to rescue him, but in vain, as the latter had clutched only a wig to a wig, and away the drowning man floated. Underneath is this verse:

"Even if you are paid for it,
Do not put a wig on your pate.
Or else, you'll be quite unaware
To false hair this great owes his fate.

The judges and the counsellors laughed so much at the discomfiture of the possessor of the first sign, the judge declared he could not see any wrong done, and dismissed the case.

There seem to be matrimonial difficulties in other parts of the country as well as in America, but instances are most cruel trials, not domestic ones—strange therefore. In a case which has recently been brought into the London courts a wife deposed that her husband pushed out her hair an omnibus on October 16, 1863, saying that he "should have it some day," and that he had not yet returned. This reminds us of a bit of dialogue in a novel now in course of publication in one of the French journals: "Where is your husband?" says a gossiping lady. "He's out to buy a cigar," replies the lady. "Has he been gone long?" asks the gentleman. "Only three months," replies the lady. "He is quite right," remarks the gentleman, philosophically. "He wants to choose a good one."

Telegraphic mistakes are not altogether sectional, as may be seen by the following incident:

Some time ago a functionary in Algeria applied to the Minister of the Interior for permission to build some fountains in the town placed under his enlightened rule. The answer was received by telegraph as follows: "Construisez q. q. fontaines." The initial letters stood, of course, for quelques fontaines, but the ignorance of the people read them as numerical figures, and accordingly the order was carried out with 99 fountains. Never was there a place so well supplied with water.

A singular instance is on record of a family of five persons who have all died within upon a Berry, by Hampshire, for a period of fifty-three years, during which time he was succeeded by a son, daughter, grandson, and his family. Neither did they during the time put a letter into the post-office, take one out, or take a newspaper. This was apparently a case of total stagnation.

A Richmond paper says that young men are scarce in that city, and maidens and widows plenty. The editor then relieves his mind:

"We do not think, in view of the great scarcity of men, that it is fair for widows to marry so many. Every old will the young maidens have secured husbands. The Lexington widow ought to be ashamed of herself, and respect the interests of young ladies, for without the aid of legal enactments she will soon secure to the 4th grade of husbands."

Now in China the customs of society are such that it is considered a disgrace to marry a widow, no matter how intelligent, interesting, and handsome she may be, as well as a disgraceful or shameful step on the part of the widow to consent to marry again. No rich and desirable family ever marries a son to a widow. Four families out of every five are unable to marry one of their sons in wife, when they find themselves unable to procure a girl of their own class, the chances are that they cannot do it. Occurred in such a case. The expense attendant on marrying a widow is comparatively small.

ELEPHANT-HUNTING IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

WE give on this page an illustration of a characteristic scene in Central African life as witnessed by the well-known traveler, Mr. S. W. BAKER, in his expedition to the source of the White Nile and the shores of Lake Albert, Nyassa. The subject of the sketch is elephant-hunting with the sabre, as practiced by the Hamran Arabs on the frontiers of Abyssinia, along the Settite River. Mr. BAKER hunted with these Arabs for some months in 1862. So dextrous are they as riders that they can pick up a stone from the ground at full gallop, and both dismount and remount at the same pace. They hunt all kinds of animals with no other weapon than the sabre, including the lion, the rhinoceros, and the elephant. The great art is to divert the attention of the elephant when hunted to bay; the enraged animal then follows one man with great fury, and at this opportunity a hunter gallops up behind him and, swiftly dismounting, severs the "tendon of Achilles" with one blow of the sabre, used with two hands. This at once disables the huge beast, and, the blow being repeated on the other leg, he quickly bleeds to death, being thus actually killed with the saber.

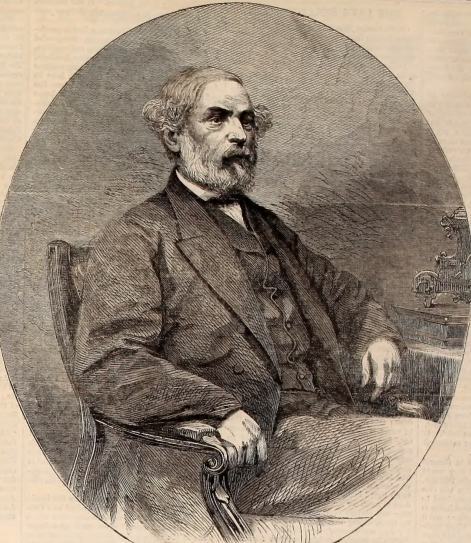
No other tribe but the Hamran Arabs hunt in this way. The danger is exceedingly great, and many hunters lose their lives. Having shared in these hunts, Mr. BAKER has been an eye-witness to what might otherwise have seemed, even to an old elephant-hunter like himself, quite incredible.

ROBERT EDMUND LEE.

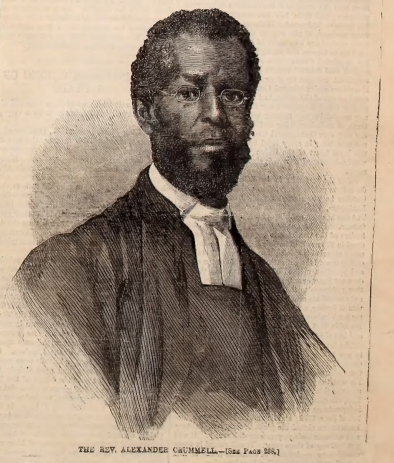


ROBERT EDMUND LEE was undoubtedly the most popular of the conspicuous Confederate leaders. The political chiefs had all excited special animosities, but a certain passivity of temperament and mildness of manner conciliated all who came personally in contact with LEE, and his military career had separated him from local intrigue and consequent calumny. It pleased the imagination of his section, also, that he was of a noted Virginian family sprung of English Cavaliers. His father was "Light Horse" or "Legion Harry" of the Revolution, who had been warmly praised by WASHINGTON and GREENE, and was known as one of the most dashing officers of that war. LEE himself was the owner of the White House estate and of Arlington House, and, as second in his class at West Point, as a brave soldier in Mexico, where he was brevetted as Colonel, as Superintendent of the Military Academy, and Chief of Staff to Lieutenant-General SCOTT, he added individual distinction to that which he had inherited, and completed the spell which charmed the Southern fancy. It was not difficult for that fancy to see in such a man, when placed at the head of an army, a "great Captain," and to describe a leader whose life was correct as a "Christian soldier and gentleman."

General LEE was born in 1808, and graduated at West Point in 1829. He was First Lieutenant of Engineers in 1836, and Captain in 1838. He was Chief Engineer with General WOOL in Mexico, served gallantly in the chief actions there, was severely wounded, and finally brevetted Colonel. In 1852 he was Superintendent at West Point. In 1855 he was relieved and made Lieutenant-Colonel of the Second Cavalry. On the 16th March, 1861, he was made Colonel of the First Cavalry. From the time that he left Mexico until he drew his sword against the United States he had seen no active service, except that, during the night of the 18th October, 1858, following the failure of old JOHN BROWN's enterprise at Harper's Ferry, Lieutenant-Colonel LEE arrived with ninety United States marines and two pieces of artillery, and occupied the Armory guard, very near the engine-house.

Colonel LEE remained attached to the military family of General SCOTT, and in intimate personal and official relations with him, until the 20th of April, 1861, the day after the massacre in Baltimore, and six days after the fall of Fort Sumter. On that day he wrote to General SCOTT from Arlington House, resigning his commission. He had already received overtures from the rebel authorities in Virginia, and no one knew better than Colonel LEE that resignation in the face of the enemy, with the intention of joining him, is treated as desertion by the military custom of all nations. But bred in the political school of his section, which made the flag under which he had always served an unmeaning rag, a sincere sophistry doubtless saved Colonel LEE from the sense of dishonor. In his letter of resignation he spoke with unquestionable sincerity of "the struggle it has cost me to separate myself from a service to which I have devoted all the best years of my life and all the ability I possessed....Save in defense of my native State I never desire again to draw my sword." It was not the letter of a conscious conspirator, but of a man deluded and confused by a conflict which he could not comprehend. On the same day he wrote to his sister: "Though I recognize no necessity for this state of things, and would have fortorne and pleaded to the end for redress of grievances real or supposed, yet in my own person I had to meet the question whether I should take part against my native State. With all my devotion to the Union and the feeling of loyalty and duty of an American citizen I have not been able to make up my mind to raise my hand against my relatives, my children, my home." After speaking of his resignation and his hope that his State may never need his services, he concludes: "I know you will blame me, but you must think as kindly of me as you can, and believe that I have endeavored to do what I thought right."

These letters were written on the 20th of April. Three days before, on the 17th, the Virginia Convention had secretly voted to secede. On the 25th Governor LETCHER proclaimed that the State had joined the Confederacy, although the question had not yet been submitted to the people, and he placed the whole military force of Virginia under the supreme command of JEFFERSON DAVIS of Mississippi. Yet such was the confusion of Colonel LEE's mind as to the actual situation, that on the 6th of May he accepted the chief command of all the secession forces in Virginia, seventeen days before the State voted to secede, which she did, under the advice of JAMES M. MASON that every one who offered to vote against secession should be shot. In his late testimony General LEE says that he undoubtedly took the oath to the Confederacy if it were required, but he does not recall the fact. He was soon afterward appointed General, and finally Generalissimo of the Confederate forces, but, remained in Virginia throughout the war, personally directing the operations in defense of Richmond.



It is remarkable that the fate of the Confederacy should have been intrusted to one who recognized "no necessity for this state of things," and who acted from what may be called a mechanical sense of duty. General LEE, according to his own testimony, had none of the ardent conviction of his associates, and his career is an interesting illustration of the moral confusion so often produced by a merely military training. For granting Virginia to be the supreme authority to which he owed allegiance, was all that Virginia did to be approved and personally supported by him merely because she did it? Is the moral duty of a man abrogated because his government commits a crime—for surely a revolution involving the misery of war, if it be of "no necessity," is a crime. Taking General LEE's own view, if Virginia fired upon a foreign government without necessity, was the foreign government to submit; or if it resisted did its resistance make the assault necessary? Such questions, of course, were not asked by General Lee. He was a Virginian, Virginia commanded, or he thought she did, and he obeyed, but with more alacrity than might have been expected of a reluctant an adherent of State sovereignty. Such conduct may show the discipline of the soldier, but it certainly proves the moral confusion of the man.

Mexico had proved the personal gallantry of General Lee, and Virginia as the late commander of an army was yet to be proved. In the opening of the campaign in West Virginia the honors was the late war his strategy in the Confederates, but it was collected among the Confederates, but it failed to win victories. He was defeated there by General Reynolds at Greenbrier, and his military capacity was fully tested in the Peninsula campaign. He was already called a great captain; he stood upon his own ground in the army regarded that of his antagonist, and that antagonist was M'Clellan. Here certainly was an opportunity. A candid writer in Harper's admirably "Pictorial History of the Great Rebellion," who has thoroughly studied in the reports of both sides the Peninsular Campaign and the Seven Days' Battles, says that "never in history was better fighting and never worse generalship on both sides;" and he attributes Lee's success in making the siege to the fact that he committed fewer errors than M'Clellan.

Lee's two aggressive movements were fatal victories. The first called Asbestos, which the rebels claimed as a victory—a claim which is ostensibly confirmed by M'Clellan's permission to Lee to withdraw across the river unmolested. The second ended at Gettysburg, which, with the fall of Vicksburg was the turning-point of the war. General Lee could not, however, to show a brave front in Virginia, although he doubtless foresaw the final catastrophe of his cause. The country was defended entirely. It was extremely difficult for an invading force, and Lee, taught by sharp experience, remained upon the defensive to the end. General Grant's first campaign against him was masterly. His task was simple, but it was tremendous: for it was to hurl the enemy back upon his town and, by steady hint on the way, if possible; and failing that, after he was securely intrenched in his citadel. It was done; and General Lee's surrender to General Grant was the virtual end of the war.

The confidence of the Confederates in General Lee was unabated to the last, and their affection doubtless has only gleamed upon him made Dexterous. No word of censure or of harsh criticism was ever spoken against him, and when he surrendered he was more trusted than ever. His portrait hangs in all the houses of the late insurgent section; and it is one of the most touching incidents of the whole reaction that a man doubtless of an amiable character, but of no more remarkable qualities than General Lee has displayed, should be the idol of a people.

The strongest feeling against General Lee among loyal citizens arose, first, from his preceding directly from the military presidency of General Scott to the direction of the enemy's operations; and then from his total inaction during the sufferings of Union men in Libby, the Libby, Andersonville, and Salisbury. In his late testimony he states distinctly that he knew of no cruelty, and has no reason to believe that it was practiced. But the cries of suffering was made to him; that he knew, of course, in a general way, that prisoners on both sides suffered somewhat; but the care of prisoners was entirely in the hands of the War Department, and he had heard vaguely that it had done what it could for relief. But General Lee could also have been ignorant of the horrible reports. He must have known from the papers that Congress had appointed a Committee of Investigation. He must have seen the accounts of the condition of returned prisoners; and Belle Isle was almost in sight of his home in Richmond. If the circumstances had been reversed, if the cry of the whole Confederacy against one section of their population had gone up to heaven and through the world, if they had appointed Commissions of Investigation, and we had read their reports in the brief pauses of the treatment endured by their captive soldiers—and if a prison under General Grant's very eye were noted as one of the worst, and General Grant had neither asked a question nor expressed a wonder, nor sought in any manner whatever to test the truth of such harrowing and incredible stories are very sure that General Grant's portrait would not now hang in every loyal home as it does, and the loyal heart of the Union would not be so severely denounced as now it sincerely applauds his name.

After the surrender in April General Lee withdrew from public observation, and in the following October he was elected President of a college at Lexington, Virginia, where he has since resided. The war has stripped him of his considerable private fortune. He has, undoubtedly, like all the chief leaders of the Confederate movement, fully acquiesced in the result of forcible Secession. His testimony upon the question that "property and generality toward the entire South" would be the surest and speediest method of conciliation, and that he does not at present suspect any intimation here of further resistance to the Government. Yet he does not conceal his conviction of a present total alienation of feeling, nor his opinion that it would be better for Virginia to be rid of the colored population. He adds that he has always been of that opinion, and has never favored gradual emancipation.

The family name of Lee has a certain prominence in our history. Thomas Lee, the grandfather of General Lee, was acting President and Governor of the Colony of Virginia more than a century ago. He was the grandson of the first emigrant of his name to this country. His son, Richard Henry Lee, the celebrated orator, moved the resolution of Independence in the Continental Congress, on the 7th of June, 1776; and he and his brother Francis Lightfoot signed the great Declaration. History will estimate their powers very differently. It will not call any of them great. It will record in them conspicuous weaknesses of character; but it will doubtless acquit them all of base intention.

THE LATE SENATOR FOOT.

On Wednesday, March 28, Solomon Foot, United States Senator from Vermont, died in Washington. He was the oldest member of the Senate in continuous service. He was, as Senator Doolittle said in Rutland the other day, "revered as the Father of the Senate."

Senator Foot was born in 1802, at Cornwall, Addison County, Vermont, graduated at Middlebury College in 1826; became Principal of Castleton Seminary in 1826; was a tutor in the University of Vermont in 1827; studied from 1828 to 1831 was Professor of Natural Philosophy in the Vermont Academy of Medicine in Castleton. He studied and practiced law always loved the legal profession, directed him toward the bar, which he entered in 1831, and, settling at Rutland, which city has been his home, he commenced practice, and was at once successful. The appreciation of his fellow citizens of his long ability long allow him to remain in a chosen sphere of action; for in 1833, 1836, 1837, 1838, and again in 1847, he was sent to the Legislature as Representative from Rutland, and his professional ability in that assemblage afterward, in 1837, raised him to the Speaker's chair, which he occupied during his last three terms of service. After this a wider sphere of duty demanded his presence, and he entered Congress in 1842, being re-elected in 1844. Returning to Rutland in 1845, after having declined re-election, he resumed his legal practice, but was suffered to retain it for only four years, being elected United States Senator in 1850. He held this position ever after. His present term of office would have expired in 1867. The Senatorial office would have expired in 1867. The Senatorial office would have expired in 1867. The Senatorial

The London Times of the 17th announces that a British war vessel will be sent out to be done notice, to exclude American fishermen from the British Fisheries. St. Patrick's Day passed off quietly in Ireland. No disturbance whatever occurred, and the customary festivities passed off as usual.

In the House of Commons on the 12th, Mr. Gladstone, in a lengthy speech, explained the Reform Bill. The main features are a reduction of the qualification of county voters from fifty pounds to fourteen pounds sterling, and for boroughs to seven pounds rental, and to lodgers paying ten pounds or upward for apartments. The measure adds about 400,000 to the number of voters. The bill deals also with the redistribution of seats, and enlargement of representation for another session.

The election is said to have made its appearance in some of the districts of Germany. In that case the danger to universal is somewhat imminent, on account of the continuous stream of emigration to the United States from that country.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

TYLER, TEXAS, VA., January 24, 1865.

T. ALLCOCK & CO.—Seeing your notice in the Police Gazette, I got four of your Porous Plasters, and placed them on the veins where the pains were severest, and in less than twelve hours could walk as well as ever. I could hardly believe it, I was so well pleased. I wanted to see if the lameness would come back on me or not, so I did more walking that day than I had done in a week. The next day I had some pain in my hip; but I put on a plaster there, and in two hours the pain was all gone; nor have I felt it since. Certainly they are the best application for the relief and cure of pains in the joints and back, and for varicose or enlarged veins. I have our known; and I would not be without them on any account.

Yours, truly, JOSEPH GATEWOOD.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. I was one of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for some time past been thought that a preparation, having for its basis the inside bark of white pine, would be found valuable as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in such cases, I procured a quantity of the inside bark of the Medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. Relief was almost unwillingly gratifying. In 24 hours in two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a permanent cure effected. From that time I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been afflicted with a severe cough with a bad cough, contained by a sudden cold, and her relief means stranded with bad. She was very much relieved, and for more, she took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1855, I first commenced to make the same with WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having stood the test of the last of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known. It cures all throat, lungs, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a specific for diabetes, healing from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and scurvy, and all blood diseases. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

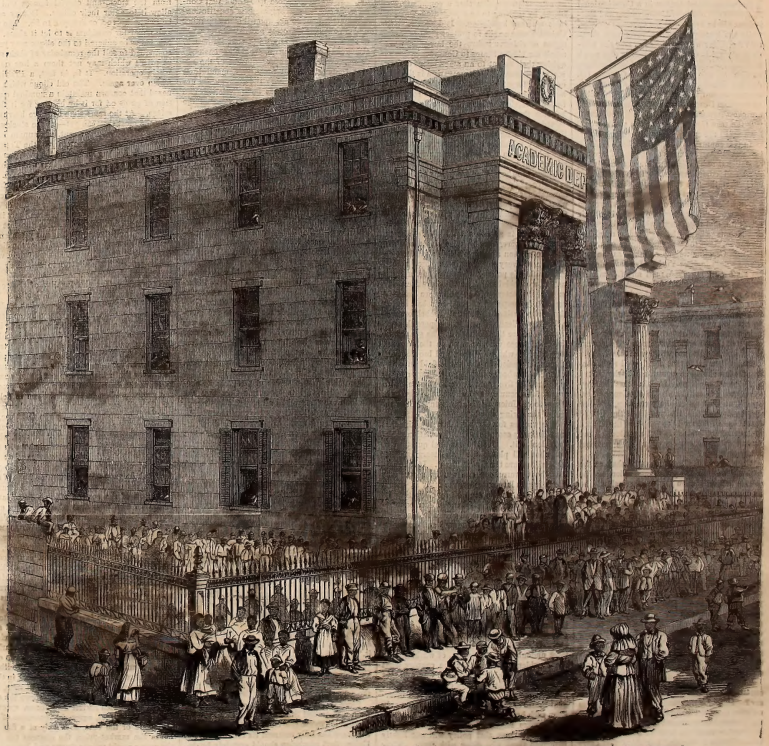
SCHOOL FOR FREEDMEN.

THE "ABRAHAM LINCOLN SCHOOL" for freedmen, NEW ORLEANS, was opened on the third day of October, 1865, in one of the buildings belonging to the University of Louisiana. Rev. THOMAS W. CONWAY, then Assistant Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, obtained it of Governor WELLES, on condition that another building, known as the "School of Medicine," and held by the Bureau for the use of the freedmen, should be released. Soon after this school was opened it had over eight hundred pupils, and an average attendance of seven hundred and fifty, with fourteen teachers, being the largest freedmen's school in the United States. From seventy to eighty per cent. of the pupils are of mixed blood. Up to the first of February Mr. EDWIN F. WAYES, a native of New York State and graduate of Yale College, was principal. His successor is Mr. M. A. WARREN.

Owing to the recent change in the school system which Brevet Major-General BAIRD, Assistant Commissioner, has been compelled to adopt from a free system to one in which the tuition is paid by the pupil, the number of pupils has decreased to about four hundred, with eight teachers. The tuition required is $1.50 per month.



The building on the left is a part of the Medical College which has been closed during the war, but is now opened and patronized by a large number of students. In front, between the two pillars, are the teachers, while in front, and on the steps, are the pupils just dismissed from their studies.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, CHICAGO.

THE Chamber of Commerce building, of which we give an illustration on page 253, is one of the latest of the many new and handsome public edifices erected of late years in Chicago. It is located at the southeast corner of La Salle and Washington streets, and fronts the Court-house Square.

The style of architecture is decidedly composite, the beauty and majesty of art having been made subordinate to the amount of capital stock and the prospect of future dividends. The dimensions of the main building are ninety-three by one hundred and eighty-one feet, and one hundred feet in height.

From the main door the entrance leads up a short flight of stairs to a hall which extends the whole length of the building, each side being apportioned into handsome business rooms, all of which are occupied by merchants, banks, and insurance companies. The sides of the building face respectively on

THE "ABRAHAM LINCOLN SCHOOL" FOR FREEDMEN, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY LEE&WILLIAMS, NEW ORLEANS.]

La Salle Street and Exchange Place. From this floor the ascent to the grand hall is by a double flight of stairs. This hall is the finest, in all its details, erected in the West. Eighteen windows throw their colored rays upon the room. Its loftiness, the harmony of the coloring, and the general character of the design are very imposing. It is elaborately adorned with frescoes, paintings, and appropriate designs. The hall is one hundred and forty-three feet by eighty-nine, and forty-four feet from floor to ceiling.

The building was erected and the site purchased by an incorporated company, known as the "Chamber of Commerce," composed of members of the Board of Trade. It cost about four hundred thousand dollars.

On Wednesday, August 30, 1865, this grand edifice was dedicated, with imposing ceremonies, to Commerce. The dedication of the building was followed by a series of festivities covering three or four days.

The Board of Trade of Chicago, to whose enterprise the city owes the successful completion of this handsome edifice, is composed of about fifteen hundred members. It was organized in 1848, and then numbered less than one hundred members.

For the illustration of this building, as also for the description above given, we are indebted to the courtesy of JEVNE & ALMINI, of Chicago, who have recently completed the publication of a beautiful work (issued monthly, and to consist of 25 Parts), entitled "Chicago Illustrated." Chicago has made more rapid strides of progress during the last dozen years than is recorded of any city in the world. History, and the enterprise of the city itself, prove that of other cities of equal and even larger population.

RADICALISM AND CONSERVATISM.

IN every political contest in a Constitutional system the names of Conservatism and Radicalism will be applied to the opposing policies. The history of such governments shows that the policy which truly conserves the principle and spirit of a free system is that which is called Radicalism. In the conflict of opinion in England upon our Revolution Burke, Fox, and Dr. JOHNSON were the stiffest of Tory Conservatives, and saw in the doctrines and policy of Essex and Hyde nothing but Radicalism and the overthrow of the monarchy. But BURKE was the true Conservative. His policy would have saved the empire upon its own principles.

In this country at this moment both the Radicalism and Conservatism, as the names of a policy of national reorganization, are very easily defined and comprehended. Thus Radicalism holds that the late rebel States should not be suffered to take part in the government of the Union which they have so zealously striven to destroy except after searching inquiry into their condition, and upon terms which shall prevent any advantage having been gained by rebellion. By the result of the war the suffrage of a voter in South Carolina weighs as much as the vote of two voters in New York. Is that a desirable state of things? Would any fair-minded voter in South Carolina claim that it ought to have a preference in the Union because, however honestly, he has rebelled against it? Radicalism, therefore, favors an equalization of representation as a condition precedent to the full recognition of the disturbed States, and every citizen of those States who sincerely desires national unity and peace will favor it.

Radicalism holds that equal civil rights before the law should be guaranteed by the United States to every citizen. It claims that the Government which commands the obedience of every citizen shall afford him protection, and that the freedom which the people of the United States have conferred the people of the United States shall maintain. Is that a perilous claim? Is any other course consistent with national safety or honor?

Once more: Radicalism asserts that, as the national welfare and permanent union can be established only upon justice, there should be no surrender of political distinctions based on any part of the people. It denies that complexion, or weight, or height are reasonable political qualifications, and it refers to the history of the country to show that they have not always been so regarded even in some of the late slave States, and remembers that both President LINCOLN and his predecessor were friends of impartial suffrage. Holding this faith, Radicalism urges that while we may honestly differ as to the wisest means of securing political equality, yet that all our efforts should constantly tend, with due respect for the proper and subordinate functions of the States in our constitutional system, to protect the political rights of man with whose assertion our Government began, and in consequence of whose denial that Government has just escaped the most appalling fate.

This is Radicalism. Is it unfair? Is it unconstitutional? Is it anarchical or revolutionary? It denies no man's rights. It deprives no man of power or privilege. It claims for the National Government nothing which is not inseparable from the idea of such a Government. Does it demand any thing that every prudent and patriotic man ought not to be willing to concede? The views of Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS and of Mr. SUMNER, sincerely entertained and ingeniously defended as they are, are not the Radical policy. Mr. STEVENS holds that the disturbed States are conquered provinces in which the land should be confiscated, as that of Ireland has been three times over without giving Ireland peace. Does any body suppose that even the House, which respects Mr. STEVENS's sturdy fidelity in his own sphere, agrees with him, or that the National Union party holds his view? Mr. SUMNER holds that equal suffrage should be required of the absent States as a condition of representation, and in a Radical Senate which passed the Civil Rights Bill over the veto by a vote of 33 to 15, Mr. SUMNER's proposition obtained 3 votes. The two gentlemen, of course, support the Radical policy, but they do not shape it. The opinions of the Union party are to be found in the Resolutions adopted by its party platform. The policy of the Radicals is to be seen in the measures they adopt; and of the forty-two bills which at the time of the last veto they had presented to the President, he had signed forty.

In our present political situation Conservatism is the theory which maintains that the late rebel States are already in a condition to resume their full functions in the Union, and which denounces Congress for presuming to inquire whether they are entitled to be well founded. It denies to Congress—that is, to the representatives of the loyal people who have maintained the Government—the right even to look behind the credentials of any man who comes from a State still panting with rebellion, and ascertain the origin and validity of the authority that invested the credentials. To object to the legislation of Congress while eleven States are unrepresented, without reference to the reason of their absence, thus virtually recognizing the monstrous proposition that a combination of States, by refusing to be represented, may prohibit national legislation. It denies that the United States ought to secure the equal civil rights of citizens before the law, and would admit the absent States to Congress before requiring their assent to an amendment legalizing representation. Conservatism is the policy which, forgetting that the United States are bound by every moral obligation to secure the freedom which they have guaranteed, apparently believes that that freedom will be best maintained and the national peace most truly established by leaving those States to whom we were heroically faithful to the Government during the rebellion to the exclusive mercy of those who sought to destroy it.

These are the distinctive points of the Conservative policy. Are they agreeable to an honorable and intelligent people? And of what is this policy composed? Of men who, faithful to the Union, it will of course be earnestly supported by their true and tried friends. Is it so supported? Who are the potent Conservatives? The men who all sing and fire cannon and ring bells in jubilant exultation at every measure in support of reconstruction? Who are the Conservative party, or the supporters of the policy we have described, is composed of the late rebels and of those who justified and excused their deeds, with a few Republicans. And who oppose this policy? Who are the Radicals? The great multitude of those who fought the battle of the people, of whose children and brothers and friends lie buried in the battle-field in every rebel State, whose sentiments are now as they have been for five years, echoed by the whole press of the country, and whose voice speaks in the vote of Union Legislatures and in the result of the spring elections.

It is not against Conservatism to claim that conciliation is essential to reorganization. Nobody denies it. But the cardinal question is, not what will be done, but by whom and how what will secure the Government. If it be said that the Government can not be secured by alienating its late enemies, the reply is, that it certainly can not be secured by conciliating unwavering friends. If conciliation contemplates the filling of national offices in the South by known rebels to the disregard and exclusion of Union men, thereby rewarding rebellion and discrediting loyalty—if it proposes to leave freemen of the United States to the Black Codes of Mississippi and South Carolina, to condone the fatal spirit of caste which has been our curse—then conciliation is simply a name for ignominy, and Conservatism may see its fate in that of Secession.

Radicalism has not a single vindictive feeling toward the late rebel States, but it does not propose to betray the loyal men to their destruction. It has the sincerest wish, as it had the most undoubting expectation, of working with the President to that end. For the country what the country has fairly won by the war, and that is, the equal right of every citizen before the law and the full resumption by the late insurgent States of their functions in the Union only upon such honorable and reasonable conditions as Congress might require. All reasonable men who support that policy will not lightly denounce those who differ with them. They will strive long for the harmony of those with whom during the war they have sympathized and acted. They will concede minor points of method, and bear patiently with impugnment rhetoric leveled at themselves. But they will also bear steadily in mind the words of ANDREW JOHNSON when he accepted the nomination which has placed him where he is: "While society is in this disordered state and we are seeking security, let us fix the foundations of the Government upon the principles of eternal justice which will endure for all time." The Radical policy was never more terribly expressed; and it is the policy to be maintained now, for it is founded in the plainest common sense and the profoundest conviction of the loyal American people.

THE REPRESENTATION OF THE LATE REBEL STATES.

THOSE Union men who ask impatiently why Congress does not immediately admit any member from a late insurrectionary State who can take the oath do not seem to reflect that the admission of a member is the recognition that the State from which he comes has fully resumed all its rights in the Union. It is assuming the very point which Congress appointed a special committee to investigate and determine. It is, in fact, a step in the process of reorganization. The President so understands it. He said to Governor Cox, of Ohio, that those loyal representatives were admitted "the work would be done;" for, in his judgment, the States in question "were restored in all other respects."

If there are Union men who hold that no further measures precedent to complete restoration of all their functions to the late rebel States are necessary, we will merely explain that their representatives are not admitted. If there are those who think that Congress, as at present composed, is constitutionally incompetent to act upon this or any other subject, they will protest against the absence of such States. If any think that its action, although perfectly valid, would be hastened or improved by the representation of the absent States, they will properly demand their presence. But if neither the competency nor the validity of the questions be involved, or if any thing still remains to be done in the legislative work of reorganization, why take any step that will embarrass it? If there be any thing of continued exhibition impolitic must show why, in such a situation as ours, the utmost prudence and deliberation are inexpedient. Whatever may be the feeling in loyal States, we are very sure that there is no sincere Union man in South Carolina or Alabama who is not more anxious that all possibility of peril from the Administration of Carolina to Congress should be plainly averted than that the State should be admitted.

If the disturbed States have a right to be represented at once, it can only be upon the ground that they have reorganized their local governments in a manner satisfactory to Congress. This was the condition imposed by President JOHNSON in his appointment of Provisional Governors. The Convention of the State was "to consider and adopt such form of State Government as will entitle the State to the guaranty of the United States therefor." Who was to give this guaranty? Congress, of course. Did Congress give it? Until Congress gives it what claim has the State to representation? The President, indeed, is of opinion that Congress ought to do so. He goes further, and dispenses with the action of Congress as necessary. He said to Governor Cox that the States were restored in all respects but representation, and were too late to ask Congress their right to be represented. This is the President's opinion often and strongly stated. But still the decision of the question does not rest with him. The authority of the United States can be given by Congress alone; and when President JOHNSON virtually declares that his opinion settles the question, that to differ with his view is to endanger the Union, and that he is carrying out the policy of his predecessor, he forgets that President LINCOLN in his last public speech, after stating the differences upon the subject of reorganization among Union men, said of the State Government which he had formed in Louisiana, and which was in the same authority with those that President JOHNSON has erected elsewhere, "I distinctly stated that this was not the only plan which might possibly be acceptable; and I also distinctly protested that the Executive claimed no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States. The plan was in advance submitted to the then Cabinet, and as distinctly approved by every member of it."

If Mr. SEWARD, in his letter to Mr. ADAMS relating the history of the conference with the Confederate Peace Commissioners at Fortress Monroe, tells us that President LINCOLN said the same thing to the savoys there.

Since, then, the admission of any member from a disturbed State is the final and solemn recognition by the sole competent authority that the State has fully resumed its relations in the Union, that admission should certainly be delayed until every reasonable precaution has been taken against the inevitable risks of the situation. We can not see upon what grounds those who hold that some preferred measures are still necessary urge the immediate admission of representatives from those States.

THE MICHIGAN SOUTHERN AFFAIR.

IT was only last week that we took occasion to relate the misadventures of the leading Wall Street operators in the Michigan Southern stock of the Erie Railway. Since then a much more striking corner than any he ever attempted has been successfully accomplished. A party of speculators, comprising by no means the most reputable and solvent operators of the street, have cornered Michigan Southern, and done it so effectually that the losers of the Bears have been almost without precedent. It was the old story. The corners bought up the whole stock of the Company. Parties who wanted to buy were offered stock seller's option—that is to say, after three days. "Regular" or "cash" stock—that is to say, stock deliverable on the day of the purchase or on the following day—was not to be had. All stock lent out was called in. On 5th inst. 5 per cent. was paid for the use of stock for a single day. On 6th inst. 9 per cent. was paid in one single hour. The cornering clique was willing to supply the stock at 84 seller three, while the cash price was 104 @ 107. Not even in the famous Hudson River and Harlem corners was such severe punishment inflicted on the Bears.

It is not certain that the corners have made any thing by the operation. It is understood that they have still on hand over $5,000,000 of the stock of the Michigan Southern, and no one is likely to want to buy the property at present prices. A flavor of roguery exudes from the stock, and careful houses will not allow it to enter their offices. It may again be twisted to 100, or dropped to 10. The only safe policy for outsiders is to let it alone. If this policy be adhered to the clique may yet be compelled to sell the remainder of their stock at prices which may be less than 50 on the whole operation. It is, in fact, a Prairie du Chien over again. The old clique which cornered that company left a nominal quotation of 92 @ 94 for it by bidding for it themselves. At the same time they are borrowing £—the most they can get—on the stock at an interest of 15 per cent. per annum for interest. Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury offers new funding loans, the money-markets are convulsed once more, they are forced to sell, and may not realize over 30 @ 35. It will be the same with the Michigan Southern. If sales be forced it may fall below 50 per cent. in a couple of days. No, no, keep out of Wall Street, believes in its value. In ten years it has paid three dividends. Of these the last was recovered, and the money has not yet been repaid. A general belief prevails that the directors are speculators, and that they would withhold or declare a dividend to suit their own purposes.

It is likely that the legality of the recent corner will be tested in a court of justice. The leading director of the Erie, who has made or lost so much money in manipulating the cornering Bears in that stock, was outraged at being himself cornered by the speculators in Michigan Southern, and has appealed to the courts for redress. To Wall Street eyes his appeal is ridiculous. A man who sells and undertakes to deliver that which he has not got, necessarily takes the chances of being able to procure the property when he is called upon to deliver it. But the matter may be differently viewed by the courts. In the case of Prairie du Chien, of which some account was given in these columns a few months since, the courts held that, where the price of a stock was advanced above its natural value by the illegal combinations of a managing or cornering clique, parties dealing in the stock in good faith and in ignorance of said manœuvres could recover any losses incurred by reason of the corner. The case of Erie is clear: he who buys that which does not exist buys nothing, and can not insist upon a delivery of the thing bought. If Mr. WILLIAM B. ASTOR buys of Commodore VANDERBILT the New York City Hall, which is not for sale, the contract is void, and Mr. ASTOR can recover nothing by way of damages. If he sells to SMITH the church and church-yard of Trinity there is no sale, and nothing can be recovered by way of damages. If SMITH, who owns all the land on the west side of Avenue B, buys of ROBINSON—who is unaware of the state of the case—ten lots on said west side of said Avenue, the contract will find that the purchase is void, the thing sold not being in the market. In like manner, if BROWN and WILLIAMS club together and buy up all the Michigan Southern in existence; then, having all the stock in their trunk, or due to them from solvent men, bid for a quantity of stock over and above the actual capital, which SMITH and JONES, speculators in Wall Street, agree, in ignorance of the real state of the case, to supply at a fraction above the market-price, the chances are that the courts would relieve SMITH and JONES from their contract on the ground that the purchase was void, and that the purchasers were fraudulently minded.

If the commission brokers of Wall Street were wise they would put an end to this cornering business at once. For it is fatal to their business. No man can tell how to advise his customers, or how to save them from loss. To buy railway stocks, in view of the coming depression in business, is wild; to sell them in view of the probability of corners in active service stock, is insane. The only safe policy is to let stocks entirely alone, and to leave the brokers to feed upon each other. To other words, the inevitable effect of these corners is to destroy the business of Wall Street. It may be a question whether this is an unmitigated evil. Those brokers who will regard it as an event not devoid of advantage to the public at large. But the brokers, whose living depends upon the activity of trade in stocks, will not share this opinion, and it is a little curious that both boards should have suffered these corners to be accomplished without even an attempt to protect themselves.

Some ten years ago, before the crisis of 1857, when European were investing freely in United States railway securities, it was proposed to place our leading railway stocks upon the list of the London Stock Exchange. To the astonishment of most people here, the application was denied—on the ground that the capital of most of our companies was so small that in the event of a Bear movement it would be easy for any one of a score of rich operators in London to corner the Bears and force them to settle on their own terms. Experience proves that the Englishmen were right. It would be to the interest of New York brokers to unite to strike from their list every stock that is cornered, and to establish for other stocks a clearing day, on which contracts might be settled at the price of the day without regard to the supply of stock on the street.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

The Civil Rights bill declares that all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are citizens of the United States, and that such citizens, of everyrace and color, "shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, to be sued, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property, and to be entitled to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishments, pains and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

The bill then defines the method of protecting these rights, the details of which, if imperfect, can readily be corrected. It leaves the adjustment of political privilege to the States. It does not say that a citizen shall be a voter: it says only that he shall have the equal rights of a man.

This law, which was passed by an imposing vote in both Houses, 33 to 15 in the Senate, and 122 to 41 in the House, unquestionably expresses the fixed determination of the loyal people of the United States. They conferred freedom, and they have now defined what they mean by freedom. If a man can not own property and enjoy the right that appertains to that its possession he is not free. This truth is fully recognized by ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, at whose instance, and against the wishes of many leaders, the Georgia Legislature has passed a bill legalizing equal civil rights to the freedmen. What Georgia has wisely done for itself the United States has done for the whole country. In doing it Congress has secured one of the most legitimate results of the war, and has laid the corner-stone of enduring peace and Union.

THE CASE OF IRELAND.

Although Fenianism may not be a very imposing phenomenon, yet it is not to be forgotten that the wrongs of Ireland are not a trifle, but a very tragical truth. We do not need to explore history to know so much. We have only to consider the general condition of the vast numbers of emigrants from that country to this to be very sure that there must be a radical but vital defect in the system to which they are subject, and which makes them what they are. "The Anglo-Saxon race," bitterly says the French Opinion Nationale, alluding to the national fear of the cattle pest, "will pray for the salvation of bulls and scourge poor Ireland." The accusation is tremendous, but to every plea of England the actual condition of Ireland must be sternly and constantly alleged.

A hundred and fifty years ago MOLYNEUX published his "Case of Ireland Stated," and DEAN SWIFT his "Drapier's Letters." Mr. JAMES GOUDEN, a writer in the London Fortnightly Review, reminds us that the House of Commons could not answer MOLYNEUX's book, so they had it burned by the common hangman, while SWIFT's publisher, for refusing to give the author's name, was thrown into prison. These events are typical of the English system in Ireland, and Mr. GOUDEN submits the case of Ireland anew.

It must be remembered that the Irish population is not of one race or faith. The pure Celts are few and feeble. The Roman Catholics, the Episcopalians and Presbyterians, the professional and mercantile classes, with most of the land-owners, belong to the British connection. The "dangerous class" is not the original Celt, it is the Catholic peasantry in the better part of the country who are of mixed race. It is in the most Irish counties—the pale—that the chief discontent is found, and if the quarrel were to be settled among the Irish themselves, the Irish British race, according to our author, would remain masters. It was these English counties, where Irish had not been spoken for ages, that the rebellion of 98 against the British connection was most fiercely forced. The population is energetic, self-reliant, and asks only for just government and fair play for industry.

The Irish priests spring from the people. Their interests are those of their flocks. Educated upon the Continent, which is covered with the monuments of their Church, or at Maynooth upon the ancient power of their faith, the priests point to the present weakness of their Church, which is proscribed and persecuted. Before the eyes of those people are the palatial convent of Rome and the cathedrals with the modern Episcopal chapel and its well-endowed rector preaching to his congregation of empty benches, while a thousand of the faithful and traditional Church kneel upon earthen floors in their rude house beyond. These contrasts are deepened in effect by the traditions of splendid estates, of martyred bishops, of the long, desperate struggle for freedom, and the black penal code. The passionate power of political appeals upon such points to such people can be imagined.

Most of the land in Ireland has been confiscated three times, and as joint rights of ownership were disregarded the titles are hopelessly confused. As the tenant farmer by his own outlay increases the yield of the ground the landlord increases his rent and refuses long leases. Small farms are rapidly absorbed the struggle. Large farmers throw land out of cultivation because of the greater profit of grazing. Then the cry is raised for delay of agricultural labor; in large districts there are no resident gentry or capitalists; and the mass of the agricultural and laboring classes are hurried to the ports. Ireland is represented to them by noble absentee proprietors, who make attorneys their agents, and pay them a per-centage upon what they can extort.

The hostility of races and of religions has never been fiercer than in Ireland, but it is not greater than that of the native septs or clans before the Reformation. The Pope supported the King of England and the King's Irish against the rest of the Irish population until the King turned Protestant, when the Pope went over to the "Irish enemy." The terrible civil wars continued, and hatred, suspicion, and contempt were embodied in the English view of Ireland, until the Lord Lieutenant, HUSSEY, the Tory Chancellor, described the Irish Catholics as "aliens in blood, language, and religion." Mr. GOUDEN's statement truly have expressed the Conservative feeling of Ireland's own time and the last generation had he said enemies instead of aliens.

But during the last half century England has been trying slowly to atone for the melancholy misgovernment of Ireland. The Tory or Conservative party, which never forgets and never learns, which thinks that the Divine mission of Ireland is to be a law is reformed which hangs a starving man for stealing a hen, which has brought England to the verge of civil war more than once in this century, of course resisted and resists. The safety of the British empire, as of every constitutional government, lies in the defeat of the Conservative party. That party in Opposition such a party is useful; as a Government it is perilous. It opposed Catholic Emancipation, the Reform Bill, and the Corn Law repeal. It has opposed every vital reform demanded by the condition of England. The problem in Ireland will be solved by the English liberals. An equal religious and political equality and a change in the land tenure must be achieved before Ireland can rest, or any English party. The key-note of English as of American liberalism—the secret of peace and welfare—is Justice.

AMNESTY.

Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, who held quite as firmly to the Southern doctrine of State Sovereignty as Jefferson Davis, was released from Fort Warren during the last autumn, and was lately elected Senator in Congress by the Georgia Legislature. On the 22d of February he made a speech accepting the office and exhorting his neighbors to patient acquiescence in the results of the war. It unquestionably wise to release him, to suffer him to live at home, and to give good advice to the Georgians. But equally wise it is a whimsical injustice to deprive his late associate executive officer of "the Confederacy" of the same opportunities. Why should not Jefferson Davis be allowed to acquiesce and to urge acquiescence? His offense was no greater, if more conspicuous, than that of Stephens; and treason, if they were guilty of it, can not be made "odious" by imprisoning the one and countenancing the other.

Mr. Raphael Semmes, also, who commanded the Alabama, and who made war upon the United States after his surrender, has been unconditionally released by the President of the United States. Mr. Semmes was very successful in his raids by sea upon the ships of loyal merchants. He must have destroyed property to the amount of many millions of dollars.

C. C. Clay, on the other hand, was very unsuccessful. His raids by land were generally abortive, although planned upon the most comprehensive scale. We do not complain, under the circumstances, so far as they are known, that Mr. Semmes goes free, but why is Mr. Clay kept in jail?

We presume that these facts foretell a general amnesty.

To hold Davis and Clay while Stephens and Semmes are released is unjustifiable. To undertake to try Davis is folly. It would be the trial of the Government. Does any loyal man believe that he admit the validity of the war to the verdict of twelve chance men in Richmond? If Davis should be convicted of treason, nothing is settled. If he should be acquitted, the Administration becomes ridiculous and the war is condemned. No trial can affect the public judgment of his course. Whatever the result, loyal men would retain their opinion and disloyal men theirs. If convicted, he would not be hung, for if there were any danger of the execution of such a sentence the most loyal men in the country would be the most earnest intercessors for his pardon. No constitutional Government was ever strengthened by hanging its enemies after a war in which it was victorious, and no blood shed upon the scaffold for political offenses has ever yet stained the purity of our national garments.

But while the most conspicuous individual leaders in the great rebellion, like Davis, Stephens, Lee, Semmes, Clay, and others, instead of being punished with rigor, are suffered, and wisely suffered, to go with no other penalty than the feeling with which the authors of so much misery will always be regarded by patriotic men, it is even more important that every reasonable step should be taken to destroy the conditions which so fatally favored their conspiracy. Where a war in which Congress is engaged, and in which it is supported by the sympathy and prayers of those who have saved the country,

"CONSERVATIVE" WISDOM.

The last suggestion of the "Conservatives" is worthy of those who denied the authority of the United States to "call out" rebels, and who declared the war a failure. It is simply that the President is not bound to execute a law which he considers unconstitutional—in other words, that the President may dispense with the laws.

The simple truth is, that the President takes an oath to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." The Constitution provides that when the President objects to a law which he considers unconstitutional or other grounds, he is to return it to the House in which it originated, and that House shall proceed to reconsider it. "If," says the Constitution, "after such reconsideration, two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law."

If the President's conscience forbids him to fulfill his oath and execute the law, he may do what some Commissioners did under the Fugitive Slave Law—he may resign his office.

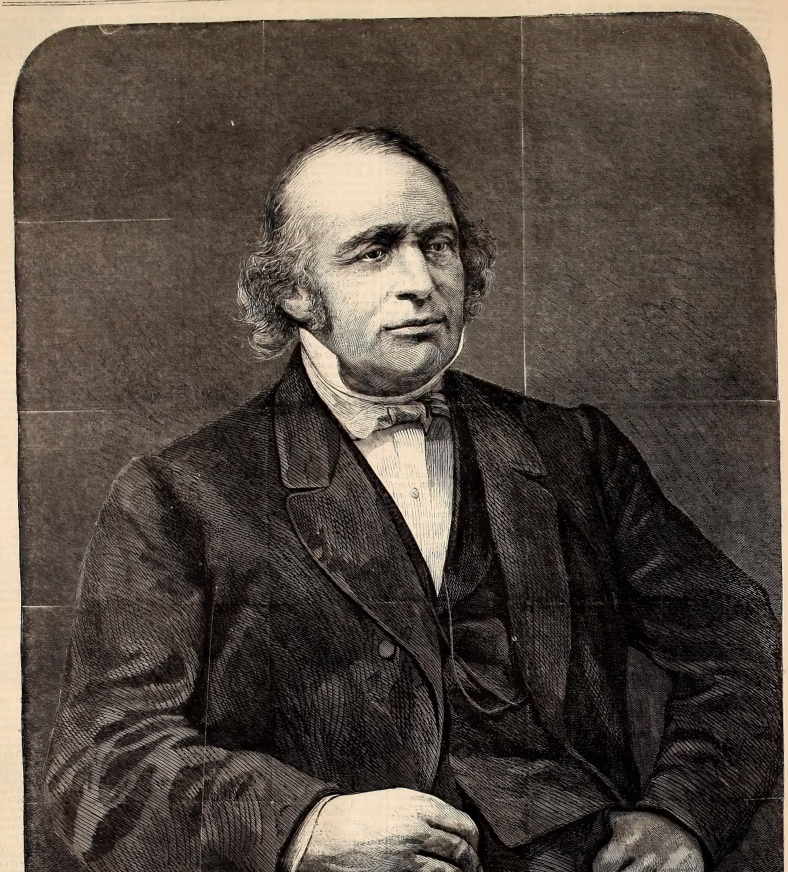
The "Conservatism," which, by the mouth of Mr. Garrett Davis, suggests to the President to refuse to recognize the Senate of the United States, and by the Chicago Times exhorts him to treat Congress out of the Capital, naturally proposes, by the New York World, that he shall disregard his oath. A "Conservation" which considers Congress "a Rump" easily discovers in the law an impertinence, and the will of the President the sole government of the country, without perceiving that if Congress be a Rump, the President, who was elected by exactly the same votes, is no less a fragment.

And these are the oracles who roll up their eyes at "revolutionary" radicals.

MR. JAMES M. SCOVEL.

As the name of Mr. James M. Scovel will probably never be heard of again, it is incurrent to note why it was ever heard of at all. He was a Union Senator in the New Jersey Senate. The Union Senators were clever in number, and the Opposition ten. When the seat of Mr. Stockton in the United States Senate was vacated, a proposition was made in the New Jersey Senate to go into joint convention for an election. Mr. Scovel voted with the friends of Mr. Stockton against it, and refused to vote for a Convention, unless the Convention would agree to nominate a person whom he should propose. Why the whole body of Unionists in the Legislature should yield their preference to Mr. James M. Scovel that gentleman failed to state. He declared with great solemnity that he was very honest, while nobody doubted that the others were so. The passage of the Civil Rights Bill over the veto apparently depended upon the Senator to be elected in New Jersey, but Mr. Scovel declined to yield, and reiterated that his honesty was truly phenomenal. Fortunately the vote of New Jersey was not necessary to pass the bill, but that State has lost one of the finest fruits of her noble victory of the autumn—a Union Senator of the United States—because Mr. James M. Scovel, elected as a Unionist, refused to vote for the candidate selected by the whole body of Union men. He was not bound to vote for a man whom he did not approve, but he was bound not to defeat others from voting for their chosen candidate. He had no right to insist that every Union Senator and Representative in New Jersey should submit to his sole dictation; and it is because of his betrayal of an honorable political trust that Mr. James M. Scovel is not now a Senator for a week, and will not be heard of again.

HOW MUCH SHALL WE EAT?



One of the most important items in the relation of food to health is the regulation of its quantity. Each seems to be a very well done, for the most part, where it is left entirely to the instinct of the animal and the amount of supply furnished by nature; for we have no evidence that wild animals commit excess as to the quantity of their food. It is otherwise with domesticated animals, for their habits are modified more or less by man and by their time, and the supply of their food is not regulated by nature. Errors of diet are often committed by them, and we have many complaints of over-feeding of dogs with too much of rich food; your horse may be injured by eating from a grain-bin, or your cattle by getting into a corn-field. In the case of man himself the indications of nature are very apt to be overruled by his inclinations and notions—shall we say his judgment? It is, but his judgment is often at fault.

What prompts us to eat? It is what we call hunger—a sensation about the stomach, the seat of which there has been much speculation. Its seat is certainly in the nerves of the great part at least, in the stomach; and its cause is the want of nutrition-matter in the system, this want being expressed by the sensation which we call hunger. The greater, therefore, is the want the more intense is the sensation, because in the imperative hunger which sometimes appears in convalescence who have been much emaciated by disease. This sensation is often removed by other things besides food. Sudden and new things, by the influence on the stomach through the nervous system, destroy it. Filling the stomach with indigestible substances will remove it, or rather overpower it by producing another sensation there, as is done by the dirt-eaters, and sometimes in experiments on animals.

When this removes hunger it is not by the supply of the want of the system, for the effect comes long before the nutritive part of the food can be conveyed to where it is wanted. It is the effect the sensation occasioned by the presence of the food and the consequences of the process of digestion. What is this sensation? It is a sense of fullness! Many eat till there is even an oppressive sensation of the head, and then come other ones has passed clear beyond the sensation that betokens a sufficiency of food—the sensation of satiety, as we may term it. This is quite as definite as the appetite, hunger, and it is a reliable indication. It is not a mere extinguishment of hunger, but it is a positive sensation of a more or less compound character. There is a feeling of satisfaction, with sense, but slight, sense of fullness. It is sometimes claimed that we should eat short of this point, and not absolutely satisfy our hunger; but this would be a disobedience of an obvious indication of nature, and the result would be insufficient supply of the system, and consequent feebleness and disease.

This sensation is not an adequate guide in regard to the amount of food, unless the circumstances under which we take it are properly regulated. It may fail as if we eat too rapidly. The feeling of satiety will not come at the proper moment. Ease of food be thrown into the stomach partially masticated and unmoistened with saliva, it will not. The bare sense of fullness would then be our chief guide, and there is danger of eating too much. It may fail as after the eye has made full of the pleasure of the palat, by variety of dishes and courses, although we do not decry a due regard to gratification in taking our food.

There should be more attention paid to the cultivation of correct tastes in regard to food. There should not be the alternation which we often see between poor living and such provision as presents extraordinary temptations to gormandizing. The fruits of the different seasons should more commonly make a portion of our daily meals. There should be more uniformly good cooking of ordinary articles, and not the usual making of the best delicacy in this by a variety of luxuriously prepared food. Good bread and well-cooked meats are much less common than is supposed, even where there is a profuse display of the nick-nacks of cookery, which serve both to deprave the tastes and produce dyspepsia. Richness—the richness of nature—with plainness and simplicity, should be the main object in the appropriation of food. Under such regulation we avoided, for this leads to going beyond the sensation of satiety, and a more or less oppressive fullness is apt to be the limit of eating.

PROFESSOR LOUIS AGASSIZ.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. SONREL, BOSTON.]

PROFESSOR AGASSIZ.

THE President of the United States referred in his inaugural to the warm reception, by the monarch of Brazil, of the scientific party now exploring that portion of South America. It is believed that this is the first time that a Chief Magistrate of our nation has called attention to any exploration of a nature so purely private in its inception and in its execution. Professor AGASSIZ is the head of that expedition, and such is the remarkable career and character of the man that his new researches have not only merited mention by the President of the United States, the enthusiastic co-operation of the Emperor of Brazil, and the deepest interest of scientific men in Europe and America, but the general public manifests in his movements as great solicitude as if he were engaged in enterprises of great official as well as national importance. His discoveries on the Amazon have called renewed attention to the man who belongs to both continents. Born in Switzerland, he is an adopted son of the United States. Several cantons have claimed him in his native land, and our own LONGFELLOW has added not a little to the confusion in the popular mind when, in his beautiful "Ode to AGASSIZ on his Fiftieth Birthday," written in 1857, he says:

> "It was fifty years ago,
> In the pleasant month of May,
> In the beautiful Pays de Vaud
> A child in its cradle lay."

The fact is, that LOUIS JOHN RUDOLPH AGASSIZ was born on the 28th of May, 1807, in a little corner of the Canton Fribourg, Switzerland, not far away from the cantons of Neufchâtel, Berne, and Vaud. His father and five immediate ancestors were clergymen of the Protestant faith. His mother, who still lives, was remarkable for her talent and acquirements. His education was of that complete kind which is open to every one in the excellent schools of Switzerland; but his tastes, influenced by Rev. Mr. FIVAS (now a resident of New York), turned in the direction of natural science. The colleges of Bienne, Lausanne, and Zurich in Switzerland, witnessed his early triumphs in the classics, in general scientific attainments, and in the particular study of medicine—his early chosen profession. He completed his academic course in the Universities of Heidelberg and Munich. Later, in Vienna and Paris, he enjoyed the association and friendship of Humboldt, Cuvier, Hyrtle, and others.

While he was yet in his teens the first Emperor of Brazil took the Austrian Archduchess LEOPOLDINA, the sister of MARIA LOUISA (the first NAPOLEON'S second bride), to share with him the throne at Rio de Janeiro. Then it was that the monarch of Bavaria sent a corps of scientific men to Brazil, chiefly directed by MARTIUS and SPIX. AGASSIZ was not yet of age when this expedition returned; but when SPIX, to whom was intrusted the zoological portion, suddenly died, there was no one in Europe whom MARTIUS found capable of classifying the fishes of Brazil except the young Swiss, who had devoted more close attention to ichthyology than any other man living. The work was published in Latin, and it instantly placed AGASSIZ in the first rank of authorities. From that time to this the scientific world has been surprised and overjoyed at contributions to science on a variety of the most difficult questions in nature, which required years of the most fervent study merely to arrange preliminaries before publication. The most varied as well as the most accurate knowledge and study are displayed in these works. The late Professor AGASSIZ, of the Sorbonne, Paris, wrote in 18-1 that Professor AGASSIZ was the only man living, and one of the few who have ever existed, who had "made himself master of four sciences." Dr. MANUEL PACHECO DA SILVA, President of the Public Library at Rio de Janiro, recently made, in the Jornal do Commercio, a resumé of the works of AGASSIZ, with copious extracts thereon; stating that any one who reads "The Fishes of Brazil" will find that it is a work upon which any one might rest his reputation; that a close examination of the second publication of AGASSIZ—"The Natural History of the Fresh-water Fishes of Europe"—is a work so complete that any other man would have considered it his magnum opus; that his third great treatise—"Fossil Fishes"—for which his preliminary studies were for seven years of most laborious study, and which were ten years in publication, is a monument of research and genius such as the world has rarely seen, leading through the most abstruse and intricate regions of zoology, geology, and paleontology, to a new classification, which is recognized in all the leading schools of the world; that his minor works on the Echini, on living and fossil shells, and several other subjects, were enough to satisfy the ambition of ordinary men; that his "Studies on the Glaciers," and his Système Glaciaire, results of years of arduous investigation and long exposure on the highest Alps, and on the great glaciers of the Oberland and Mont Blanc, did more than any other of his works to consolidate the former theories concerning the remote period of our globe when the great snow-storm covered from as well as arctic zones. "Surely," says DR. PACHECO DA SILVA, "no one would have looked for other volumes from this great and prolific man; but sooner soon he read, the United States than the New World calls forth new efforts, and we looked upon his contributions to the Natural History of the United States as the final and monumental work of this capacious mind; but now we see him investigating the rich field of Brazil, and we find that he has not yet been written to the efforts of his genius."

Professor AGASSIZ came to our country in 1846. He was then Professor in the College of Neuchâtel, and visited the United States to study the aspects of nature here. He remember the wonderful interest excited by his lectures. Two years later, duty indicated plainly to the Professor that the New World was to be the field of his labors. The Professorship of Zoology and Geology in the scientific school in Cambridge is filled by AGASSIZ. The magnificent Museum of Comparative Zoology is wholly his creation in its inception, plan, and execution, and has excited the envy of Europe. It has a national importance, and its completeness and extent is the first in the world.

In March, 1865, Professor AGASSIZ left our shores with a corps of accomplished men to explore the virgin fields of Brazil. Already this expedition, endowed by the munificence of NATHANIEL THAYER, Esq., of Boston, has produced abundant fruits. The enthusiastic reception by the Emperor of Brazil, and by the people of that Empire, and the co-operation of the Brazilian Government, are gratifying to our nation, which is now more closely united to the most stable Government in South America. The results of Professor AGASSIZ's expedition will, like all his works, redound to the advancement of science and to the promotion of a truthful understanding of the great phenomena of tropical nature.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XV.

AT the same hour in which Brother Barker is preaching the Gospel—according to Jefferson Davis—at the Pines, Edward Arthur is preaching another Gospel—that according to the Lord Jesus Christ—in his church in Somerville. And he and his comparatively few hearers know that he has got such a grasp upon the very substance and essence of that good news to men as he never had before. Yes, he, and multitudes like him at the South, in ever deepening despair of things human in these days, are looking to the Gospel and to the living God, of whom that sacred page is but the transparent drapery, with an ever-increasing singleness and intensity to which all previous experience is tame indeed.

"It's the last time, the very last time, you catch me a-hearing him," Mrs. Warner said, as she marked a few Sabbaths ago as she walked her portly husband home from church. "Yes, I know it, I did say before this I never would go again, and I haven't been, you well know, for ever so long. But I thought that to-day, Thanksgiving Day for our glorious victories over McClellan, he certainly would come out for the Confederacy, and be down at last upon the Yankees. And look at it. All that sermon of his to-day only a-trying to prove what terrible sinners we are instead, telling over all our sins. Not one word about the vile wickedness of the Yankees."

"Why he said, Helen," ventured the Doctor, "that, whatever were the human instruments of chastisement employed, the Almighty would deal in strictest justice with them as with us. You see he wants us to look more at this for which we are being punished than at the punishment itself; he says that if we do not we will be more and more punished by Him until we do.

GOING HOME FROM CHURCH.

For one," added the Doctor, rashly, "I agree with Mr. Arthur entirely."

But the Doctor never would have said this save from the warmth of just having heard the sermon.

"It's his influence has ruined you; he's a traitor, a Yankee, a vile Abolitionist!" says Mrs. Warner, and so decidedly that Alice Bowles, walking home alone from church, can not choose but hear. "Always insisting and insisting upon our sins," says Mrs. Warner, "as if we are not a million times better than the Yankees. Talking, too, about the Almighty, as if He had any hand in this wicked war upon us—it's awful! Look here, Dr. Warner," adds his wife in a sudden change of tone, as a light breaks on her, "I've got it now! The one great sin the South is being punished for is Slavery. That's his idea. Ah, hah, I've got it, yes, I see! The Almighty is so angry with us because we own slaves he is using the Yankees to chastise us—chastise us, as if they could do it!—for that."

"Has he ever said so?" begins the Doctor.

"Hah, I remember now. That's why he has never preached a sermon—never on the Bible command to us to hold slaves. Brother Barker—why there's not one preacher I know of but has done so often. Even you—"

"I am astonished at you, Helen," says Dr. Warner, a new light, of somewhat different hue, breaking on him also. "I am astonished at his often urged on us—taking the institution for granted—to instruct our negroes—"

"Warn us to see that they are actually married and all that—as if a negro ever does more than take up with a husband or wife for a while; and as if virtuous white ladies were going to meddle in such things! Catch me! Something about the duties of negro masters to their children too. Parents! I tell you, Dr. Warner," adds his clear-spoken partner, "all such stuff is inconsistent with the institution. To preach it is to preach Abolitionism, that's all. It may deceive you, but it can't deceive me, so I tell you. And that he, a Southern man, that has lived here so long—"

Dr. Warner walks with drooped head beside his wife while she is exhausting herself upon the subject. Not that he hears a word she says. That Sunday morning when his pastor announced his settled purpose to confine himself exclusively to his Spiritual duties comes up before him. People agreed that was a pastor's only true course then—now it is disloyal. Mr. Arthur's is a peculiar position. Once, at least, during the week, the bell of every other church in Somerville summons the congregation to a special prayer-meeting for the success of the Confederacy; alone of the churches Mr. Arthur's remains closed, the bell silent. The only exception to the preachers in and around Somerville, and there are a great many of them, one ever sees him on the streets laughing and shaking hands over the last glorious news, or clapping and stamping at the public meetings. All the "putting down, O Lord," Brother Barker claims for these days is the "putting down of our three fiendish foes," the "saving" he supplicates is the "saving our new, our young, our great, our glorious Confederacy, even thine own peculiar people, O our God!"

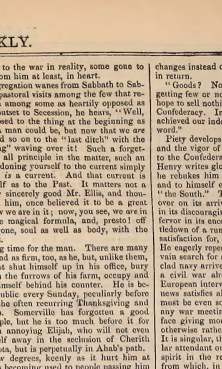
Yes, it is a trying time for Mr. Arthur, these days.

"He's a lie, it isn't a political matter at all," Sam Peters says in reference to this speckled bird in the flock. "the very existence of Christianity at all on this continent is involved in the success of the Confederacy!" and that is the first article in the Creed—"Oh, you may deny it now; you know it was then—of every religious Secessionist at the South. But, in the rising tide of the times, friend after friend has been swept away from Mr. Arthur, some fled North, some gone to the war in reality, some gone to the war, from him at least, in heart.

His congregation wanes from Sabbath to Sabbath. In pastoral visits among the few that remain, even among some as heartily opposed as he at the outset to Secession, he hears, "Well, I was opposed to the thing at the beginning as much as a man could be, but now that we are in it"—and so on to the "last ditch" with the "black flag" waving over it! Such a forgetfulness of all principle in the matter, such an utter abandoning yourself to the current simply because it is a current. And that current is Lethe itself as to the Past. It matters not a groan how sincerely Mr. Ellis, and many thousands like him, once believed it to be a great sin; "now we are in it; now, you see, we are in it!" is the magical formula, and, presto! off you are gone, soul as well as body, with the movement.

A trying time for the man. There are many as clear and as firm, too, as he, but, unlike them, he can not shut himself up in his office, bury himself in the furrows of his farm, occupy and conceal himself behind his counter. He is before the public every Sunday, peculiarly before them on that often recurring Thanksgiving and Fast days. Somerville has forgotten a good many people, but he is too much before it for that. An unloving Elijah, who will not even hie himself away in the seclusion of Cherith and Sarepta, but is perpetually in Ahab's path.

By slow degrees, keenly as it hurt him at first, he is becoming used to people passing him without speaking, to the cold words and colder manner of those who were once his friends. On what pretext resign? Where go if he should? What occupation can he, a man under ban, follow? He has no capital to become a merchant, no farm to be a farmer, as objectionable a teacher as he is a preacher. Let him resign to-day, before to-morrow Brother Barker will himself see to it that he is conscripted. All he can do is to continue in his present line of duty. He wonders, Is the delusion in myself or in the mass around me! Ignorant and educated, sanguine and phlegmatic, silent and talkative, violent and mild, the avowedly wicked and the devotedly pious—the fermentation is seething all men into oneness of opinion, feeling, speech. Alas! for Edward Arthur, he is only petrifying in his isolation.



Look at good Mr. Ellis. There is almost nothing left in his store these days for sale. His last calicoes went off at two dollars a yard. Mrs. Bowles bought his last bolt of domestic at one dollar and seventy-five cents. He did have shoes at ten dollars, some now. His shelves display only empty boxes, bottles of hair oil, stone jugs, patent medicines, and an amazing number of mouse-traps. Any quantity of coffee mills, but they are only a mockery, coffee selling at two dollars a pound. But not a cent have Mr. Ellis. His main object in opening his store in the morning is to hear what people—dropping in during the day to ask for articles they won't get—have to say upon the one topic, while, leaning against his empty shelves, he exchanges instead of goods his own freshest hopes in return.

"Goods? No, Sir; and, for one, I intend getting few or none from abroad hereafter. I hope to sell nothing that is not made within the Confederacy. In a short time, Sir, we will have achieved our independence in every sense of the word."

Piety develops in a man the faculty of hope, and the vigor of Mr. Ellis's hope has references to the Confederacy, and is amazing. His son Henry writes gloomy letters from the army and he rebukes him therefor, ignoring to every one and to himself every thing not encouraging to the South. The paper he reads several times over on its arrival, with what heated unbelief in its discouraging items, with what magnifying fervor in its encouraging ones. The least thickledown of a rumor of the latter kind is a solid satisfaction for, at least, the passing moment. He eagerly repeats it to customers calling in on rain search for axes or nails or pins. An ironclad navy arrived at Wilmington for the South, a civil war suddenly broke out in the North, European intervention—his sincere belief in the news satisfies all who hear it from him that it must be true even so. Whoever else is absent from any war meeting Mr. Ellis is not; his sincere face giving moral sanction to the proceedings otherwise rather vindictive, not to say profane. It is singular, though, that he is not a more regular attendant on the prayer meetings; there is a spirit in the remarks and the prayers thereat from which, in spite of himself, he winces and shrinks. The unpiousness of Mr. Ellis's belief in the Confederacy disquiets his pastor more than any thing else—all Mr. Ellis's piety running so swiftly in that one channel in these days.

But the two rarely meet now. "He knows my sentiments perfectly well; how can he be so cordial with me—not cordial—no! cordial of a struggling respect and esteem for me still?" the pastor asks himself, wondering whether he will see his former friend at church next Sunday or no. Is it possible deep down in his soul he knows I am right? Mr. Arthur muses upon it, till one Sabbath Mr. Ellis disappears with his family from church.

Perhaps Robby Sorel may have had an unconscious share in this last step. Not a more modest, quiet, sober little fellow than Robby; but, to say nothing of his mother, he has by this time become exceedingly attached to Mr. Arthur, who teaches him at home, and makes a companion of him in all his excursions, to his heart yearning doubly over Robby in his state of banishment, and being repulsed from almost every one else. As with the children of all Union people, Robby has a great deal to bear in the way of abuse. That his mother and Mr. Arthur are Yankees, Abolitionists, and traitors he is told almost every time he is sent into Somerville on an errand. But when Charley Ellis, about his own age, as a "widowshaid negro," with a great deal more in reference to Mr. Arthur and his mother, Robby's wrath bursts forth, and, as much to his own surprise as that of Charley's, he gives this latter a sound drubbing. Of course Mr. Ellis hears only his son's, or rather his son's mother's version of the matter; that, with Charley's blackened eyes, settles the matter. Only he will not put it on that ground with Mr. Arthur.

"The prayers he offers are precisely those he might put up in a Boston pulpit: I can not stand it," says Mr. Ellis. "Not that he has not more in his way Mr. Barker and the like for all that. For the present Mr. Ellis and family, his children without from Sabbath School, are strictly upon the world.

I wonder whether I would be as dumb upon political matters if the political pipes of my head could speak?" said Mr. Arthur to himself, next morning as he rode home from his bath, feeling fresh and strong. "And is it in human nature for me to put my position on the ground that it is the duty of ministers to silence their political pipes?

"You and your fellow-preachers of the same sentiments are in somewhat the same case here at the South that the preachers of the Democratic party are at the North," says Mr. Ferguson, to whom, in Gry Brooks's office the same day, Mr. Arthur propounds his case. "Were you and your like at the North they at the South, to say the least, the temptation upon you as upon them to speak out would be somewhat dous. Eh? Now say you would be among the loudest, most violent of them all—a perfect Barker. It is only human nature, man," says the Scot.

"My conviction," moans the minister, "are the very reverse and strong: we may say that many is at stake; and, then, the question is so largely a moral, in fact a religious, one!" Yet surely a moral can not be exclusively—"

"Oh, never mind about that," breaks in the lawyer. "You are occupying the only position you can and do. Gay Brooks continues to be interrupted denunciation of the new Stay Law.

"And there is conscription," begins the Scotchman.

"The most awful violation of State Rights—the most unconstitutional thing!" burst out the lawyer.

"You must not say that; you know our Supreme Court is unanimous against you," says the Scot. "Ferguson, I'll not. I had a visit last night from a man on land business—wanted to buy land—as if I would exchange my property now! He was telling me about a District Judge in our sister State, now away. Being a Democrat and in office he decides instantly, eagerly, that conscription is constitutional. They wanted to argue before him the question of which they are now existing in every village over the State.

"Not one syllable, gentlemen, he said; 'my mind is already made up—Martial Law is constitutional also.' And if that gang at Richmond had enacted Polygamy it would have been the same. Power! Power! I know all about it. In the beginning of Secession, too thoroughly informed in head and heart not to know its diabolical nature and consequences, he winced and writhed.

In, however, he went at last, under the terrible pressure, desperately; now he stops at nothing, of course. My hand-sucker told me of a poor fellow is thinned to a ghost—you can read his misery in his face—he can not sit still a moment —in and out of every group he comes, ever seeking consolation and finding none. Like Milton's Satan he can not fly to himself, however. I've put my information in my collection, adds he, laying his broad palm on the vast volume in question to bring on the table before him, "and you mark my words, Sirs," continues the grim Scot, "if I do not have to complete that personality with an account of his death and his more mistaken than I was ever before in my life."

"I suppose you have that printed list of those who have not paid their War tax," asks the lawyer—"the one pasted up in the Court-house?"

"Yes, you collector," Yes, Sir, my valuable listing the list. There has not been a matter relating to Secession in my reach that is not noted. That other thing, I, nothing to do with it—the material of profound philosophical study. The regular steps of Secession toward despotism are perfectly illustrating. Illustrating the natural working of moral law as the rainbow does the natural laws of light. Stay law, exemption of the rich from military service, martial law, conscription, prostituted press, terrorism—we will soon get on to currency utterly depreciated, then impressment of property and wagons, general military executions to prevent desertion, State militia passed into the hands of the Richmond gang—"

"What raving madness!" breaks in the lawyer, rising from his seat in desperation. "Are seceded for what?"

"For our share of the Territories, and they are gone," for States Rights, and they are gone."

"For Slavery, and it will soon be gone, too. Upon dem veh perdere—a hackneyed old proverb. Mr. Arthur, You cut loose from the Union," continues the Scotchman, "and sail off on the one bottom of Slavery! Beautiful experiment, experimentum crucis, as Bacon calls such: Faraday, with a bread, clean counter before him, never tried a neater, completer one in Natural Philosophy. The idea, you see, is to eliminate Slavery from all that has hitherto been mixed with it, to see how the thing itself and by itself stands. Well, not a Power in the world dare recognize your Slave Government; at home corruption and despotism and ruin until you sicken of it—to say nothing of the awful judgments of Heaven upon you by the hands of the Federals! Being from Scotland, I am impartial, of course. And such men as you two, Mr. Wanser, Paul Brooks up there at the Pines, and all like you at the South, why, born and living at the South, it is no wonder you are coming so slowly to see. But you men on the road—three years hence the Union men of the South will be the most hearty emancipationists on earth, without a spark of Northern fanaticism!"

It was an awful sentiment; but dry Mr. Ferguson stated it simply as a scientific fact. He was one Scotch enough, however, to lower his voice as he made the atrocious statement.

"And it is the hand of God," he added; "your good people said we were fighting in Slavery. Very well, Heaven is putting that very cap to your lip, pressing it there bitter and long, to see if you like the taste. The Jehovah of Moses still rules, an eye for an eye, lex talionis—retributive justice the old Jewish principle."

Neither of his friends would have endured such language a few months before. Yes, an immense change has come over the spirit of men in the South those days, and in the mind of every reasoning mortal there, Union man or Secessionist, it affects more upon them than anything else.

"And so you had to march up, too, and take your medicine?" the lawyer asks Mr. Arthur, after a long silence. And the poor gentleman needed no explanation. He had stood before the Provost Marshal, and, under oath, renounced all allegiance to the United States Government, swearing fealty to the "Confederate States of America" instead. Medicine? Yes; and the bitterest to him, as to thousands of his class, their manhood had ever taken. Certain sessions females of the Secession persuasion had even offered themselves to the Provost Marshal of Somerville as a committee to administer the same oath to every one of their own sex in the county. Unfortunately the Provost Marshal declined the offer; acknowledged its propriety, but pleaded absence of instructions from the Secession authorities but would have died or succeeded. Not even the feeblest of the Union ladies but would have undergone the Secession formula. Who can conjecture the issue? And, alas for Poesy, Bellona, dread goddess of war, being the mean, that such an Iliad should not have been enacted!

"Tim Lannum Provost Marshal? Oh, come now, not Tim Lannum!" Mr. Arthur's personal remark in Somerville when that fact was announced.

Not one instant. For it takes very little expenditure of colors—water colors—to paint Tim Lannum. A suddenly shot up youth of fourteen years ago, with a little down on the mustache, feeble as to stamina, profane as to speech, loose as to morals, good as to only one thing on earth—and that is playing poker. All the rest of Tim's full length is on the canvas when it is added that Tim had "plenty of money," and is now in the prime of life. An exceedingly vaporous existence had Tim led up to Secession. With his hat perched, tilted well forward, upon the back of his head, and in the corner of his languid mouth, nothing on the surface of this planet had Tim to do. And he did it; that is, when he was not at night it was poker.

Tim was out to the war from the first, was in a big fight in which a bridge was much mixed up, and came back. Forever on the point of leaving to "rejoin his command," Somerville never got rid of. But as a private? No. No man readier than he to go as an officer. Examining the list, Lannum, elder uncle, discovers that he can not dispense with Tim from the office of the Snr. So Tim is compelled to make his bow to Somerville, and, with one foot in that dreary and very dirty den until his uncle can get him something as Commissary, Quartermaster, Lieutenant-Colonel, perhaps.

So, when Martial Law is established in Somerville, Somerville finds it embodied in Tim, ripe in temper for the task, sitting at the little table before him, ready to perform all the duties of Provost Marshal in the empty store employed for the purpose. And, as Tim took the oath to Bob Withers acted for the time as his clerk on the duty counter next by, entering the names and administering the oath to Tim, Tim was to do at present is to smooth down his incipient mustache in the hallowed fore-finger of his left hand whenever he can keep eight fingers steady with his right. Medicine? Ay, the bitterest on earth.

"Ah oath under duress has not the least obligation," reasons Guy Brooks and hundreds of thousands at the South. Ye who seriously reckon an oath at the mere mercy of the Deity, God, is a or is not the taking of an oath on the basis of such reasoning about as cool, as deliberate a taking the name of God in vain as ever man can be guilty of? If the whole moral law, in every possible infraction thereof, were less explicit and less tenurable as the Multiplication Table now!

A pitiful sight it was to see old, white-headed men, who had not had time yet to realize the possibility of secession, the very imagination of which they had abhorred all their lives, suddenly hurried in from their homes, stood like children before this beardless puppet of the hour, driven there to do so under pain of property and life, calling on God to witness they renounced the Government they had up till that instant regarded as the best that existed on earth! Solemnly pledging themselves to what? To the noblest and wildest and windiest—

Strong nerves cannot stand this. Hurriedly Brown help us! not a man in Somerville failed to come. Many swearing, as they took the oath —oh, how solemnly!—by the God that made them, to take full vengeance for this their deep humiliation. Yes, it was an oath—not to Secessionists—it left them as it found them; to Union men it was the awful pledge and sacrament of hatred and vengeance. Before that last they impose was merely a resolve: henceforth it was a vow.

In the establishment of Martial Law and Conscription Secession rolled into its zenith, subsiding thereafter—but oh, how slowly!—to its nadir.

"I call you to witness, Mr. Lannum, and you, Mr. Withers," Edward Arthur, as he stands before Tim's boot-soles displayed on the little red table, remarks, "that I take this oath on the one ground. Were it not for that I would perish first."

"Ah, and what ground is that?" asks Tim, with languid curiosity, clasping both hands together behind his head and tilting his chair further back on its hind legs. He manages to ask the question, too, with his cigar in his mouth.

"Solely because I am commanded to obey, by Scripture, every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake. I obey as part of my submission to the Powers that be, yielding not to those Powers but to the Power that permits them to possess might, and to the express command of God in such a case as this. I submit to this as I would endeavor to do to every affliction He please to send, however painful. I have nothing more to say."

"I'm afraid you do not like my Government," says the Provost Marshal, with pitying dignity. And if Tim could the expression once during his official career he used it—shall we venture to say?—one thousand times. He had met with it in the corner of some room and in the lamentings of some other high and distinguished official in diplomatic correspondence. "I have no choice in the matter. The Government intends to those whose houses he has searched for conscripts, or who are up before him for using disloyal language: it is my Government which directs me to act as I do. If my Government did not consider it necessary they would not have made it my duty." Tim has heard every one attempts to argue the matter of passports from county to county. It is something, as peculiarly pleasing to the Provost Marshal as it is distasteful to Mr. Ellis, in hearing just such an individual as Tim Lannum mention the Confederacy as "my Government."

"I regarded the act of Secession as a wicked-ness, from voting for which I abstained exactly as I would abstain from whatever will and in a steady tone and looking his beardless hero in the eyes—" from the wickedness of swearing, gambling, or lying. "On my honor I live I more firmly regard it as part of the great crime against God and man for which we are enduring and will continue to endure the awful punishment. I am submitting to it, meanwhile, only as to the afflictive Providence of Heaven, in obedience to the express command of God. Sir—"

The old store is full when he says it. Of course he ought no more to have said it than ought irate Saul to have said to the peasant remark about a whited wall when on his trial. His own ideal Minister would have quietly taken the oath and spoken both Tim's and Bob Withers's mind by feeling as much as he pleased, but breathing no syllable aloud. He was surprised at himself for the hot intention of saying a word. But he felt more deeply than he knew, and in the anguish of the moment could not refrain from bearing testimony against the Baal of the hour if he died for it.

At that no other man in Somerville did any thing of the kind. It would have been a too dangerous experiment in the case, say, of Guy Brooks, Ferguson, Mr. Warner, and the like. But Edward Arthur was so well known in Somerville, had married so many of the couples there, buried so many of the children there, his pastorlife, his acknowledged piety, the evident sincerity of the man, as he stood there before Tim Lannum, every one, however fearless, took the crowd too much by surprise. Besides, just then, it was Tim who presented the majesty of Secession in his person—the contrast between the two was too striking.

"Oh, said he hated and despised the Confederacy with his whole heart! Said he owed it only because the Bible made him. Acknowledging, you see, the Bible is on our side. Said the Secessionists were a set of damn adulterers, liars, and thieves, and murderers! Got so mad he was white with rage. Had his right hand in his mouth all the time, to convince them he was in dead earnest. Would have ever thought such a thing of him, Mrs. Bowles? I used, myself, to think the world of Mr. Arthur, have said a thousand times Brother Barker was not to be compared to him. Now just look at those two men! Brother Barker, a true patriot, a strong Secessionist, and Barker a Northern man, you know, while he was born at the South and lived all his life there. I tell you what, Mrs. Bowles's—Mrs. Warner it is, she has been in Mrs. Bowles's parlor for the last hour or so, her eyeborrow wide apart at the inner ends—" if we only knew we'd find out he's a bad, bad man. There's hardly a bit of him that is all of a piece but if we only knew! I always was doubtful about him, there's a sort of pride— My little Ella is a child of God, and she was all sweetly and I but imagined Mr. Arthur had any idea of her—"

I can not imagine what you mean, Madam," says Mrs. Bowles, more in reference to Mrs. Warner's mysterious manner than to her words.

"I mean, my Ella was as old as your Alice —I say it as a friend—"

"You will excuse me, Mrs. Warner," Mrs. Bowles looks at Mrs. Warner in her stateliest manner—some ten inches lower, forty pounds lighter than Mrs. Warner; but it is South Carolina in contrast with Mississippi, and she towers above her as did Marie Antoinette above the canaille—"we will not allude, if you please, to my daughter, Alice Bowles, in this connection."

How the said Alice managed to bring in Mrs. Warner's name that same evening, as mother and daughter sat together at tea, and her perpetual hyerasticks, is not known, but Alice suspended her needle and looked up surprised at the vehemence of her usually quiet and refined little mother.

"I do not mention her name to me again, Alice. I did suppose our acquaintance with her was ended by my reply to her impertinence in reference to Lieutenant Ravenel's visit. It is not so much her boisterous snuff-dipping, that she should bring her filthy yellow bottle with her into my very parlor, actually converse with me, her filthy snuff-stick in the corner of her mouth. It is her quick eyes and her incessant tongue. I do believe the poor creature is a sincere Southern woman as much as I am myself. Nothing else can explain her incessant tongue.

"Now, you know, I'm not given to slander, my child, and those poor Union chaps are so frightened, I don't have as much to do as I supposed I would," says Alice.

"It is such a new thing among us, Mr. Lannum. Did you mean that the duties of a Provost Marshal are?" asks Alice.

"Not a bit proud these days. It is really amazing how the girls are taken by a fellow's having a fine position. Isn't Lannum handsome as well as fine-looking, Miss Alice. Joe Staples, the hotel-keeper's son, you know, he has that South Pocket-piece, you know, that Lannum chap —oh, you know him—up before me, you see. Ferguson had lent Staples some thousand dollars gold over the bar, you know, or maybe Staples was fixing up his hotel, you see. Staples has a trunk full of Confederate money, taken in, you know, from Yankee prisoners with him. Staples wants Ferguson to take it in payment. Ferguson refuses. However, he says he may do it in the end, and steps out to consult Guy Brooks as his lawyer. Just as he steps out in comes Colonel Jaggins, owes him a couple of Confederate money—he had heard, you see, that Staples was up at my office, and had followed him—outs, you know, with a bundle of Confederate money as big as a small baby, and wants to pay Staples some—well, I don't know how many—hundreds. Tom Ferguson hasn't left you know he used to lord a good deal about the hotel before he went to the war. What do you think? Staples said he would take it and he order protest; steps out to see his lawyer if ever that would secure him."

"And what did Mr. Ferguson decide to do?" asks Alice, with interest.

"Came back with Guy Brooks; said he would not take the money in that shape at all. Fact is, people don't like, you know, to take the money. We have the case under advisement. If I could only," adds Miss Bowles, with the dignity of an embassador, "what my Government would have me do—"

"You have assistance in determining?"

"Assistance? Oh yes; plenty of them. My uncle, Dr. Peel, Captain Simmons when he is sober enough, as for that, and when he is not sober, never is, you know. Fact is, I leave it pretty much to them. I only sit there, you see. I do not have a detail of a dozen or so of soldiers to haul up people. The worst bore is making out passports. We let no man go out of the county, and it is so all over the State, but we have him to tell where he is going, what for, how long, and all. However, we have blank forms. Bob Withers fills them up; all I have to do is to sign my name."

But that was just what frightened Mr. Neely. After incredible exertions for office that gentleman had been offered the post of Provost Marshal before Tim. At first he was immensely flattered. But the Yankee, though sternly smothered and trampled down in him by his own hands and feet, was too strong there for that. One night's sleep over it, rather one night's tossing wide awake over it, and Mr. Neely, with a thousand reasons, declined, exactly as he would have done any other speculation in which he might make hundreds perhaps, possibly, might lose thousands; for the inner Mr. Neely was exactly as confident of the certain success as was the outer Mr. Neely. His instinctore to bills for tuition, in other days, was not so glorious, but safer.

"Mr. Lamum," says Alice, after a while, in lower tones and playing with her fan, "you know how curious we ladies are; there is one thing I would like you to tell me: you have seen some of the worst of the Union men out of the country, have you not?"

Government official as Tim is, he could no more refuse those eyes! Besides, he has an increasing spice of his new importance, and does not care to diminish it.

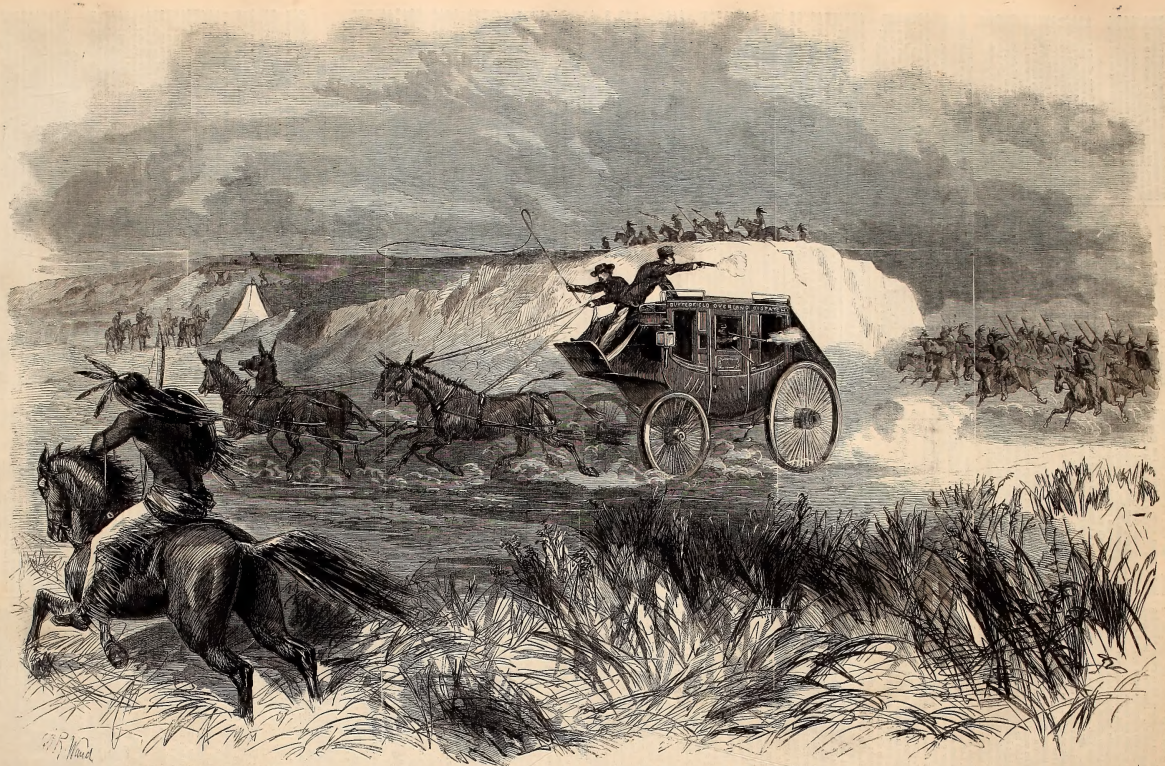
"I ought not, perhaps, officially, you know, o tell it, Miss Bowles; but you will not mention it, we have. My Government—"

"And in every case they were hung by the middle?" Alice is paler, but more erect, too, she asks.

"Pan Barker? I don't remember."

"I'll have mistaken. That is—" Alice says, with stammer and a blush.

"It m have been Mr. Arthur I spoke of," says Tim and adds: "But it is this conscript business is gaining to make us very ill. would look, you'll se, as if it will take all the volunteers were e to hunt up the conscripts. In hiding, you know. And when one does catch them, their yes and sisters and old fathers and mothers spring there in my office, you know—"



"However, believes you that no one refuses to take the oath—"

"Oath? Oh ! Who cares for an oath, you know? There's no Mr. Arthur—but of course you've heard about—"

"Not clearly. Mr. Arthur? What was it?"

It is amazing, considering their long acquaintance, how indifferent Alice is. Tim tells the whole story very nearly as it occurred—truthful fellow, Tim, except as poker. Besides, he likes to talk, and it is a pather in his way op to be seen by the company passing and repassing around them talking with her.

"Spunky chap, Miss Alice," he adds at last. "I haven't much use for preachers myself; but one can see him liking that man. He seems really to believe our revolution a worse mockshakes his head over us as if we were all on a spree. Doesn't but he really believes so! You won't mention it, Miss Alice, but fact is, of the two men, Mr. Arthur and Brother Barker, as they call him, I can't stand Barker. As by being a good Secessionist, that is all right, you know; as the same time we outsiders don't like to see a preacher mixing himself up in things of the sort too much. It's like a woman outside her sphere. It's that distinguishes us from the Yankees. One's a lady, I mean to say, or rather a religious—oh! I don't know what you call it," says Tim, making vague gestures with both hands, "a sort of Sabbath-day something one likes to have in a person. The hardest case among us don't like to see a preacher leaving his sermons to look up— Mem must, you know, a good deal of cursing and swearing and worse these days; and a parson hail-fellow in that sort of way, you know— Why, these days, you know, and in churches, too. For one, I hate—we all do—to have Brother Barker everlastingly in with us, discussing and mixing up in things he don't understand

ON THE PLAINS.

We give on this page and on page 248 some interesting illustrations of life on the Plains. In No. 474 of the Weekly we alluded to the attack made last winter on BUTTERFIELD'S Overland Dispatch Coach. Our artist, Mr. DAVIS, was one of the party attacked, and has furnished on page 248 a sketch of the occurrence, together with other illustrations, of which he gives the following descriptions:

ATTACK OF INDIANS ON AN OVERLAND COACH.

Leaving Atchison we journeyed out into the vast plains, that never can be other than the vast wilderness that they are. We had, or thought we had, a journey of six or seven days before us. But circumstances alter cases: at least they did ours.

Two hundred and fifty miles from Atchison we became aware that Indians were more plenty than usual along the route. This gave us no uneasiness; but soon after the discovery of the bodies of murdered men—some of whom had been captured alive, and undergone the most awful torture, such as the cutting out of tongues and other parts of their persons, then burning them alive—caused us to be continually on our guard. At this part of the journey Colonel TAMBLYN, an able officer and a good Indian fighter, when he has the men, furnished us with a small escort.

Soon after this we discovered the bodies of two more men, from which we drove the wolves, and buried them. These men had fought and been killed; their bodies were covered with arrow-wounds. Brave men as they were, we could only cover them with so thin a blanket of prairie sod that would hide them from sight but not from the wolves.

Still further on we buried three more bodies that the Indians had left most barbarously mutilated. These discoveries, following each other so rapidly, caused us to be ever on the alert for an attack, which came about two o'clock one bright day, when one would have thought that the Indians would have been busy hunting the buffalo.

We had nearly reached a station known as Smoky Hill Spring when we discovered a party of fully sixty Indians within short pistol-shot of the coach. Our escort had reached the station and dismounted, leaving our little party to fight the affair out alone, which we did in the most determined style—arrows and pistol-balls penetrating the coach every moment, stunga to say, without any thing more serious resulting than a couple of arrow scratches!

The Indians, beaten off, were joined by parties that seemed to come from every bluff. Thinking to drive us from the shelter of the station, which we had by this time reached, they set fire to the tall grass to the windward of us. The strong breeze brought the smoke and flame rapidly down, nearly reaching the adobe before we could check the fire by beating it down and out with our blankets. This we finally succeeded in doing. Then, so far as fire was concerned, we were safe; for prairie grass will not burn twice on the same day, and an Indian is too careful of his life to come within rifle range. If he is sure that the party that points said rifle is used to the weapon.

No attack was made until nightfall, when an unlimited quantity of arrows were distributed among us. Dawn found us ready, and the Indians perceiving this, no attack was made. About ten o'clock a company of Colonel Tanner's regiment came to our rescue, at the sight of whom the Indians mounted their ponies, and we saw no more of them except at a great distance.

STREET SCENE IN SANTA FE.

The little city of Santa Fé has about it an ancient appearance that is so different from the more American cities of the neighboring Territories, that one scarcely realizes that he is still in the United States. The Spanish population is almost exclusively Mexican, and the people so lazy that no excitement can urge them to a faster pace than a slow walk.

Water and rain are a rare and modern innovation for the Mexican, who uses instead the "Burro"—or, in good English, a diminutive specimen of donkey. This "Burro" is raised in the family, among the children, and is the most peaceful and domestic animal that I have yet seen; it has, too, the faculty of being able to live in pasture that a goat would starve on.

The houses of Santa Fé are built entirely of adobe brick, which is to all appearance the same style of brick that the Israelites were engaged in making for the Egyptians. The effects of these houses are of a dismal, unrelenting infrequence of rain making this roof practicable.

The only thing that the New Mexican does really well is the manufacture of jewelry; this he makes after the most curious pattern, and very beautifully. Some of the specimens would put to shame some of the best designs of our leading jewelers.

OLD LEVERT'S GRAVE.

"WARDE! O my God, how I suffer!" groaned the wounded man, and rolled his bloodshot eyes over the pitiless blue sky and the whispering forest, and then closed them, perhaps as he thought, never to open them again.

Open they did, however, for a heavy footfall came through the wood, heralded by a rough voice singing,

"——The kingdom coming
In the year of Jubilee!"

"Just so, year of jubilee sure 'nough. Lordy how them years come so tarnationly—most like as they'd heard the blood-hounds after 'em! Well, turn and turn about's fair play, and— Hi dere!"

With the exclamation the speaker, a powerful negro dressed in the uniform of the United States, and carrying a musket over his shoulder, stopped short, and looked down at the wounded and dying man, who, slowly opening his eyes, looked up at him.

"Clare to gracious if it ain't Mas'r Winch—Leftenant Winch, of the rebel army, I'd ought to say."

The grave sarcasm of the amendment so tickled the speaker's fancy that he was fain to indulge in a brief chuckle, even while kneeling down to relieve the dying man.

"I 'spect, Mas'r, I's got to take you prisoner into our camp, hain't I?" asked he, cheerfully.

"I'm dying, Scip, dying, for God's sake!" gasped the wounded man.

"Sho! Dying be you? Oh no, Mas'r, I reckon not. When I get cut up so awful last year, 'long of you telling old Mas'r what I said 'bout him to your Sam, I thought I was dying sure 'nough, but I didn't. I reckon, too, how had I wanted a drink, and I kin guess just how you wants one now. Mas'r and you laughed mighty hard when I axed one of you for de Lord's sake to git me some water. Reckon dat, Mas'r Winch?

The wounded man raised his dim eyes to the dark face in one piteous appeal, groaned, and closed them hopelessly. The negro's quick perception translated look, and tone, and groan, and question.

"Yes, yes, Mas'r Winch, you reckon 'well 'nough, and you's thinking dat you turn's come now, and I'll pay you back. Well, I'se got dat time, for you's taken. Dat kind o' talk may do for white folks, but I'se a nigger, and scorns it. Wait a bit now."

Unslinging his canteen as he spoke, the negro filled it at the running brook, raised the head of his enemy tenderly upon his arm, and held to his lips what seemed to them a draught of Paradise.

"Ah!" sighed Lieutenant Winch, "that's life."

"That's all you'll see in de shade, Mas'r. Dis yer July sun's 'nough to melt de marrow out of your bones. Kin yer help yourse'f any?"

"No! my back's broken I believe—my way both legs are. Oh! No, no, Scip, don't stir me!"

The negro carefully cut away the rebel uniform and examined the wounded. Covered. Their ghastly nature told more plainly than words what the end must be, and how soon it must come. The rich brown of Scip's complexion faded to that of yellow as he stood upright, and looking down into those dim eyes, said, solemnly,

"Mas'r Winch, if you feels like you want to hear me say it, I forgit you, an' I pray God to forgib you all de wrong you has eber done. For you's got to die, Mas'r, dat's clar."

"I know it, Scip, I know it. Scip—"

"What, Mas'r?"

"I'm glad you said that, Scip. It was mighty mean of me to get you into that scrape. I'm glad you forgive me."

"'Nough said, Mas'r. Now seein' you can't be moved, I is going to try to make you more comf'able w'hat you be. Here's a blanket; reckon de feller dat t'rowed it away won't want it no more, and here's a soudder, and ober dere's a soudder wid a dead man strapped onter it. Now you see, Mas'r, I jes pices dem soudder wid a bagynet, and fix 'em ober dis yer limb ob de chestnut-tree, an'—dare you be."

The shade of the chestnut then formed fell gratefully across the figure of the dying man, and he smiled faintly.

"That's it, Scip. Some more water, boy?"

"Here yer be, Mas'r. Is you head comf'able?"

"Yes, thank you, Scip; you shall's lose by this."

"Don't 'spect to lose nothin but little time, Mas'r; and I kin't in a particular hurry. We's out buryin' de dead dis morning, and there's 'nough 'sides me."

"No, but wait, and listen carefully," interrupted the other impatiently. "I'll make you my heir, Scip. I'll make you the richest nigger in the States, ay, richer than half the white men."

Scip's countenance fell again, and assumed blankly at the speaker, remembering that Lieutenant Winch had not been known in New Orleans as a man of principle, or even credit, having been, rather a loose and disreputable character, his only avowed pursuit being that of marker at a billiard and gambling saloon, while he was also shrewdly suspected of other and far less respectable avocations.

"Reckon, Mas'r, you'd better be making up yer 'counts for de nex' world, and quit foolin' wid such talk," said he, dryly.

"I ain't fooling, Scip, not a bit of it. You've been good to me, and I reward you as an honest man; and you're a good fellow, and—and maybe I'll do better where I'm going, for making it up to you. Some water, Scip."

The negro silently held the canteen to the parched lips, and then squatting grotesquely upon the ground, fixed his eyes upon the face of the rebel, and waited his further revelation.

"We kept a bank, Scip, you know."

"Farrable dey called it, Mas'r."

"Well, no matter. I'd made up my mind to quit when the shooting began, for I didn't want to go empty-handed. I got another key to the safe, and waited for a pile. One night we had an uncommon run of luck, and made a heap of money, and put, to the tune of near half a million dollars. That night I made my haul, but I couldn't leave the city, for I didn't want to. I wanted to save my name, and leave it respectable."

A slight sarcastic twitch of Scipio's wide mouth emphasized the period.

"It wasn't so much for myself," pursued the exbilliard-marker, hastily; "but I've got a little girl —the only creature in the world that cared for me, and I was in hopes we'd go off somewhere, and live handsome and genteel, and I'd see her marry a gentleman, and never know all the hell I've been in."

He paused, and his white mouth quivered with the last pang of defeated hope. The quick sympathies of the negro were touched.

"What's yer little gal now, Mas'r?" asked he.

At school with Mrs. Lemond, 16 Grand Street. Her name is Rosine Dubrow."

"Dubrose? Ain't it Winch, Mas'r?"

"No. I didn't want her nor any one to know who was my child. My name was well very nearly as in Orleans I'm afraid. I called her Dubrowe when I took her there five years ago, and I haven't seen her or Rosine's self-styled aunt, Mrs. Lemond twelve years old now, and mighty pretty, Scip."

The negro looked with wonder at the face, but now so deeply and repentantly lined with sorrow. "Dat's mighty pretty, Mas'r."

"What's yer little gal now, Mas'r?" asked he.

"Yes, but you must get leave or it must be got for you. I'll see the Colonel—he's my uncle, you know— Stop! I've got an idea, Scip! Secret service—that's the enemy's camp! Hurrah, my boy, I'll go too! See if I don't!"

Snatching his cap Lieutenant Vane dashed out of the tent without further explanation, leaving Scip open-mouthed with astonishment, and utterly bewildered by his companion's parting assurance.

"He go, too," muttered he. "De Lord he's mercy if's got to take him, for de gal he'd put out o' Egypt. Reckn my han's 'll be eber full."

He was still shaking his head in disapprobation of the idea that Lieutenant Vane officer re-entered his tent, his face glowing, and his figure dilated with animation and importance.

"All right, Scip," he exclaimed he, breathlessly. "I've seen the Colonel, and we'll be off to-night. He wants to communicate with some one inside, and the secret service men are all off. You're to go and speak to him directly."

"To de Kunnel, Mas'r?"

"Yes, come along; I'll go with you."

It was in the dusk of an autumn evening, some days after the death of Lieutenant Winch, that a Confederate officer, pale, travel-stained, wearing his arm in a sling and bound by a bandage, slowly mounted the steps of the St. Charles Hotel, in New Orleans, leaning heavily as he did so upon the shoulder of his companion. A sharp-eyed and morose-looking individual, who had patiently followed them in their slow progress through the city, hastened to relieve the latter them, and into the office, where the wounded officer was already inscribing his name.

"A bed-room, if you please, and supper," said he to the clerk as he threw down the pen.

"Yes, Sir. Jim, show the gent to 46. Gong will sound in half an hour, Sir."

"Very well. Come, Joe."

The officer left the room, followed by his servant, and the clerk turned to the book he had read, meantime, staring out at the window and picking his teeth in an abstracted manner, sauntered up to the desk and laid his disengaged hand upon the book the clerk had been about to close.

"William Sewall, Captain C.S.A., and servant," read he. "Ah! Sewall, one of escaping from the Yanks and making his way down here from Corinth wounded, hope to see, though it may be. It suited the Colonel, it seems, but I'll be hanged if I would have let him pass so easy. Any way, a little watching won't hurt any body, and I'll keep an eye on him and that sly-looking nigger of his."

Captain William Sewall, C.S.A., with his servant Joe, had meantime installed himself comfortably in No. 46, and closed the door. No sooner was this done, however, than he opened it again, and thrusting out his head, watched the retreating figure of the white-jacketed waiter until it disappeared down the stairs, then glanced warily through the corridor; and finally reclosing and locking the door, mounted a chair to shut the blind above it, open for the sake of the air. This done he again skipped to the floor, relaxed his arm from the sling, and used it to flourish above his head the C.S.A. cap, somewhat incongruously accompanying the gesture with the whispered apostrophe—

"Three cheers for the Red, White, and Blue! And three more for Tom Vane and Scip— What's your name, boy?"

"Scip, Mas'r; nuffin more," returned the negro, with a broad grin and a look of acute apprehension cleverly done into one.

"Scip, Scipio, then; that shall be it. Now, Scip, don't be scared, nor tell your big eyes at that door any more. Every thing is as safe as possible on our side, and I've calmed down now. But I'd got to rid myself of the patriotism bottled in all day, somehow or another, and I should have burst before. Mighty mean trash, I reck'n. Nobber seemed much 'count, though he's alles hangin' roun' wid gen'lemen tryin' for look at he's fingernail wid 'em."

"Just the fellow for a spy, I dare say, and we must look out for him," said Lieutenant Vane, more thoughtfully than he had yet spoken. "I'll see, Scip, it is my opinion that the sooner we're out of the the country the better. I'll write a letter for us to be found at home if any gentleman should take a fancy to call upon us this evening. So, before we have our supper, I will go out and transact Colonel's business, while you call at the school, shoot the written order I have given you from the father of Miss Rosine Dubrow, and the young lady, and bring her here. Then about midnight we'll visit the church-yard and wake the ghost of old Levert, whoever he is, have been [illegible] for ourselves if all seems tranquil, or sooner if there's any fuss, we'll shake off the dust of this charming sink of iniquity and go where we can breathe."

"Wouldn't it be better, Mas'r, fer ter make shore ob de money first, and get de pick'nainey arter wards?" queried Scip, cunningly.

"No, my boy; for we may have to leave without any time for putting calls, and I'd rather risk the child and the money, than get the money and abandon the child."

"Dat so, Mas'r. But what I call real bon'able sentiment. It call'd to a called person, Mas'r, dat idee."

Captain Sewall, C.S.A., strolled leisurely down the stairs, followed by his servant, who waited in the office to light a cigar, and to audaciously inform the clerk that if any one asked for him he should say he had gone to the city, and would not return until late; and then passed down the steps and up the street.

"He's a coming arter, Mas'r," muttered Scip, closing up to his master's side after a few minutes.

"All right. Let him strike off down this road, and let him follow me. He'll be none the wiser for seeing where I go," was the equally cautious reply, and a moment after the negro was suddenly lost into a black alley, and, hitting himself in a doorway, saw that the musketard, only pausing to cast one long glance after him, hurried on in pursuit of his more important game.

"Go 'long, you fool! an' I should tink de debbil fed 'bout you. You'd have found such sich a mean specimen ob a chile!" muttered Scip, wrathfully, as he stole to the head of the alley and watched the retreating figure dogging his master's steps. When both were out of sight the negro cautiously emerged, and after following in the same direction for a short distance, struck off into a side street, and presently ran up the steps of a handsome square house whose front door-plate bore the inscription :

MADAME LEMOND.
SEMINARY FOR YOUNG LADIES.

To the servant who opened the door Scipio announced his errand, and committed his credentials, in the form of an order from the Colonel to Madame Lemond, to commit to the negro Joe, handing her the paper, the custody of his daughter Fanny, with the property belonging to her.

After ten minutes of the door-mat, Scip was desired to walk up stairs, and being presently ushered into the sewing-room, found Madame Lemond—a little, nervous-looking Frenchwoman—standing in the centre of the room, the order in her hand.

"Your name, boy?" asked she, rapidly, as Scipio peered inside the door, bowing humbly.

"Joe, Mist's."

"And who sent you?"

"Mas'r Mist's, Mist's Mas'r Dishrowe axed him ter fetch de lilly miss's outer dis place 'fore de Yankees git in, kase dey's gone ter kill obery livin' soul dey find, an' gemman an' chillun an' all."

"Mon Dieu! mon Dieu?" exclaimed the Frenchwoman, clasping her hands and turning deadly pale. "They will be here, then?"

"Course dey will, Mist's, an' dey's like ter hab de chance mighty soon. Mas'r Dishrowe said fer ter tell de lilly gal away fore ter-morrow mornin'."

"I shall go myself. Recalle must stay and send off the children. I must go—but—why not?" muttered Madame Lemond, rising from the chair where she had sunk, and tottering toward the door.

"Will Missy Fanny be done got ready 'fore sun?" interposed Scip, seeing that both he and his errand were forgotten.

"Oh!"—and Madame Lemond paused to violently ring the bell. A pretty mulatto girl answered it immediately.

"Put up Miss Disbrowe's clothes, dress her for walking, and bring her down to this man, who is to take her home. Then come to my room," ordered the mistress; and, with a slight nod by way of adieu to Scip, glided from the room and ran hastily up stairs. The servant follow:.., back to Scip, finding himself alone, allowed the funereal gravity of his sable visage to relax into a grin, becoming by degrees so broad as to reveal nearly the whole of a magnificent set of teeth.

"Golly! scared she poote well!" muttered he, and cast an admiring eye about the room, thickly strewn with these articles de luxe so utterly useless, and yet so seductive, in the way of loot, to the rapt and fine of feeling army.

"Berry pooty pickin's here," continued Scip; "an' seein's our folks 'll be here 'morrer or nex' day, reckn 'll take my share now."

As he spoke, Scipio's black paw descended upon an elegant paper-weight of ebony and silver, with a golden Cupid and pin-holder lying beside it. These he rapidly transferred to one of his pockets, and rolled his eyes upon a silver card basket and gold-stopped cut-glass bottle a little farther on. But even as the great black fingers closed upon the basket, Scipio paused and drew back.

"Dat no fashion for robbin in de Fed'ral Army he cuttin' up," muttered he. "Do well 'nough for sarvent, or mean white trash; but mahbe some day I'se sarvin' an' a gen'leman."

More rapidly than they had disappeared, the papier-weight, the holder, and the pen-handle emerged from the pocket of the future "ossifer;" and although in the half hour ensuing between that moment and Mrs. Hollowe's appearance Scipio's keen eyes examined and admired every article in the room, not the point of his smallest finger was allowed to join any one of them ; and when Mrs. Allie, the pretty maltato, opened the door for the young lady to enter, she found him waiting in the very attitude and very spot where she had left him.

"Here's Miss Bloxsome, Joe, and her trunk's in the hall. Miss's is calling—good-by, Miss Fanny."

"Good-by, Joe. Joe, are you going to Richmond?"

"No, Miss, I's Cap'n Sewall's boy. But your pappy sent for you by us."

Mrs. Hollowe's flushed her dark eyes to rest upon the face of her strange guide for a moment, and then, straightening her graceful figure, with an involuntary movement of self-reliance and decision, said,

"Very well, Joe. I am quite ready."

In the hall, as Rosalie had said, stood the young lady's modest trunk, and Scipio, shouldering it easily, led the way into the street, closely followed by his little charge.

"Where is papa?" asked she, as they slowly walked up the newly-lighted street.

"He was 'bout twenty mild from here, missy, las' time I heerd from him," said Scip, congratulating himself upon his evasion that yet was true, "an' I 'spect he pretty well?" asked the child, raising her great eyes curiously to the negro's face.

"Fus'-rate, missy. He nebber war so well in his life."

Scip spoke confidently and even cheerfully; but glancing down at the delicate little face upturned to his he found there a solemn doubt, a dawning suspicion, impossible to meet or combat.

"Reckn 'll be well 'bout twenty up a lilly bit. Mas'r Sewall will be waitin' for us," said he, hurriedly ; and the rest of the walk was performed with silent rapidity.

Arrived at the St. Charles, Scip led his little charge directly to the room retained by his master, and, placing the trunk upon the floor, asked, with even a tender accent in his rough voice,

"Kin I do sumfin for you, lilly missy? or does you want to be 'lone a-mos'-ded for to help you endress? Has you had some supper, missy?"

Miss Fanny Dibrowe seated herself upon her trunk, laid her pretty hands in her lap, looked up again upon the negro those dark and searching eyes beneath whose glance he had already quailed. A pale and delicate child, with slender figure and fragile face, colorless save for the curved crimson of the lips, and the dark depths of those great eyes ; with a self-contained and resolute expression, so wonderful to see upon a face so young and fresh, so childlike in its purity and dreamy innocence. Very self-possessed was this little maid, and she quietly finished her survey of the coarse face and uncouth figure before she replied,

"No, I don't want any supper, Joe. I don't want any supper nor the chamber-maid, but I want to see Captain Sewall. I like you very well, but I want to see Sam."

As if in answer to her wish, a rapid step sounded down the corridor, and the next moment the door of the bed-room was thrown open.

"Back, Scip! Oh!"

And Lieutenant Vane, who had for a moment forgotten the claims of his sable ally, turned and looked cautiously through the hall. All was safe there, but as he entered the room and closed the door he encountered a gaze that showed him the error had been noticed and commented upon by at least one listener.

"Miss Dibrowe, I presume," said the Lieutenant, taking off his cap and advancing smilingly with outstretched hand. But the child shrank back, and so tightly upon Miss Dibrowe's lap were stirred, and it was with a yet more earnest look into his face than had searched the negro's that she asked,

"Did my father send you for me, Sir?"

"Certainly, my dear young lady—that is to say, he sent his man, and I came with him," replied the Lieutenant.

"And what made you call him Scip when my name is Joe?" pursued the little inquisitor.

"Oh, I forgot just then," stammered Lieutenant Vane, more discomposed than he would have acknowledged.

"I think I will go back to Madame Lemond's and wait until papa can come for me himself."

She rose as she spoke and walked toward the door, but her self-made guardian threw himself in the way.

"Stop, child!" cried he, eagerly, "I will tell you the whole truth if you will only wait, and you will see that it was in kindness that I wished to deceive you."

The little girl turned even paler than she had been before, but paused, and by her inquiring look demanded his meaning.

"Sit down, my dear, and don't imagine for a moment that I have any wish to harm or deceive you," said the young man, placing a chair and motioning her toward it with even a beseeching look.

The child seated herself, but with a queenly air that said she did but defer her decision, and the young officer, standing before her, proceeded with his defence, telling as tenderly as he might of her father's death upon the battle-field, Scip's care and kindness toward him, of the father's dying wishes and bequest, and finally of the negro's infatuation with himself, his own connection with the matter, and the consequent deception or rather stratagem he had found necessary to practise.

The young girl listened attentively, shedding not a tear at news of her father's death, although the look of dread desolation which had settled over her deep the blow had struck to her orphaned heart.

At the close she came and put her hand in that of the speaker.

"You will be the same as my father now, won't you?" asked she, simply.

A half smile mingled with the quiver on the young man's lips. He was twenty-five years old, and Miss Fanny about thirteen.

"I will take the same care of you as if you were my own little sister Alice," said he. "And I will take you to her, and to my mother among the pleasant hills of Vermont, if you will be willed by Scip, kindly.

"And Scip too—I see you for what you did for him," said the child, going to place her slender white hands in the great black ones of the negro, and laying her head for a moment upon his breast shoulder. "Of course Scip will be to me—your genuine African, impressible as a child, requires but one tone of pathos to bring his tears, one strain of joy to make his mirth."

"And now, Sir, what shall we do first?"

"Rest, I think you better and then start and try to get a night's rest," replied the Lieutenant, a little startled by the prompt tone of the appeal.

"Scip and I have something to do to-night, and shall not have time to go to bed at all."

"Well, good-night. Good-night, Scip!"

The night was dark and tempestuous, the wind sighing and moaning through the trees of the abandoned cemetery like wails of the naked souls lamenting above their lost bodies.

"Clare to goodness, Mas'r, dis yer's a ugly sort o' job, look like," said Scip, as he drew a long pull at his whipered Scipio, clinging to his master's coat.

"Nonsense, Scip, where's old Lovett's grave?"

"Way 'bout dere, Mas'r. Dis yer great wite ting am movin' 'bout. De Lord sabe us—what be?"

It's a poplar-tree, you fool, blowing in the wind. Don't be such a coward, or at least hold your tongue," exclaimed the Lieutenant angrily, as he made his way across the mounded turf and the shimmering headstones to the tall, straight shaft of poplar.

"De debbil—what dat! De Lord fergib me say-in' dat word!" and Scip's clinging fingers clutched his master's arm like iron clamps.

"What's what, you blockhead?"

"I see somfin—don' know what he be!" gasped the negro, his teeth chattering audibly.

"Now, Scip, this won't do. Though you were more of a man. Recollect we don't have cowards in the Union army, and if you can't walk through a graveyard after dark without all this fuss, how are you going to face a rebel battery?"

The argument was final. Scip would have silently allowed himself to be shot or dive over a cliff, be pronounced unworthy of his uniform, and although his progress was still marked by an obligato accompaniment of chattering teeth, he kept the officer's arm, held his tongue, and stoutly led the way toward his ominous El Dorado.

"Dis am Mas'r. De old Lovett's grave," said he at last, in a subdued voice, as he laid his hand upon a broad granite monument standing by itself in the corner of the grounds.

"Well, you've got the spade. Begin to dig while I light the dark lantern. The sooner we're through the better."

"Dat so, Mas'r," muttered the negro, plunging his spade deep into the turf which had been carefully replaced after the burial of the Lovetts; the Lieutenant lighting his lantern and shielding it with his coat, took his place upon the other side of the grave, directing the gleam of light upon the spot where Scipio dug. For some moments the click of the shovel and rattle of the stony earth were the only sounds audible, save the moaning of the wind and the drowsy hum of the sleeping city. The shovel struck with a metallic and hollow round upon some unyielding surface. Scipio suddenly raised his head, crying, excitedly:

"Dat's it shore 'nough, Mas'r!" and in the same instant dropped his shovel, uttered a dismal yell, and turning to flee caught his foot in the long grass, fell sprawling, and lay upon his face kicking and struggling, and uttering the most appalling and maternal discipline, and between pain, rage, and fright, declines to recover his composure.

Lieutenant Vane, startled by the yell, hastily raised his own eyes in the direction Scipio had looked, saw what he had seen, and not unaptly exclaimed:

"The Devil!"

Perhaps it was. At any rate it might have been, if the devil may be supposed to present himself behind a dark repulsive face, covered with a sheet of black bread and hair, and long, greedy claws from the top of a monument with glittering eyes, and a ghastly grinning mouth, into the bowels of a wicked man's grave.

Lieutenant Vane did not run, like the poor African, away from the danger, but straight toward it, darting round the monument in fact, just in time to grasp the descending legs of the supposititious demon, finding them encased, not in flame-colored tights, but grey shoddy trowsers of Confederate cut and make. With a hearty kick and heartier curse the apparition would have freed itself, but the sinewy arms of the young Green Mountain athlete were around him, and his panting voice growled out:

"Come now! None of this. I've got you! Here, Scip—quick, you rascal!—bring the lantern!"

Encouraged by the mundane air the struggle had assumed, Scip, ceasing his lamentations, rose gingerly to his feet, and cranking his neck so as to look behind the granite shaft, beheld his master struggling fiercely with a tall, dark figure, formidable certainly, but yet of the form and proportions of a man.

A sudden grin illuminated Scipio's features, and seizing the lantern by the prolonged, he came close up, and, with no note of warning, brought down the token handle upon the stranger's head.

"Tweak 'im harm, whether he be," muttered he; and found himself justified in his conclusion as the dark form fell silent and motionless at his feet.

The Lieutenant hastily released from the now inert, serpent-like arms, staggered back a step, then darted toward the lantern, and turned it upon the face of its fallen foe.

"Ole Jarvis, shore 'nough!" exclaimed Scip, bending over the body with the same air of disgust he might have bestowed upon the crushed carcass of a reptile.

Five minutes more, and the spy, bound hand and foot, with a gag in his mouth, was recently lashed to the monument, and left to collect his scattered but returning senses at his leisure.

"Now, Scip, you run over to her and keep guard and limit getting out the box, while I return for the little girl. Don't let her be off before daylight," suggested the Lieutenant, wiping his forehead.

"No, Mas'r. You stop an' let me go. Mahbe dey's got spicket 'round, an' might want for to hang you. If my stop me taint so much matter, you see."

"I don't see any such thing, Scip. If there's danger it's for me to face it sooner than you."

"But, Mas'r, if you leave me long o' dis yer white 'ooman, I think you'll kill him fore yer git back. Pears like I couldn't help it nohow."

"Come, come, Scip; that won't do. To kill a prisoner in cold blood would disgrace us forever. Say you are afraid to stay alone among the graves, and I'll let you go."

"Well, Mas'r, I'se den. I isn' 'fraid oh all de sojers nor all de shabe-dribes in 'leens, but I is mos' powerful 'fraid oh de dead men."

"That's honest, Scip, any way. Well, go your way, and manage the best you can ; you won't mind a lie or two, I dare say, if it's necessary."

"Dat jes' de way I look at de war, Mas'r," replied Scip, gravely ; and the Lieutenant assented with a nod.

"If I doesn' get here by daylight, Mas'r, you jes take de box and put for camp. I's jine you dere somehow, I reckn."

"If you are not here by daylight I shall come and look for you, Scip," replied Tom Vane, steadily; "and now, my lad, the quicker the better."

The distance was short, and Scip, as he crept creep through the black mist that had shut in the lonely sentinel, was with a word. Through the Scipio, a huge bundle upon his shoulder, a little patient figure by his side.

The Lieutenant watched round the monument and dragged the prisoner's cap low upon his face, that the fast-increasing light might not aid him in fixing their identity, and saw that the ropes were strong and unshaken, and then, with the transcriptbox in his hand, went to meet his companions.

"Clare to goodness, Mas'r, it's been a war we went an' not you. I's lied till I war black in de face, an' you know it dou' show on me," announced Scip, with an air of conscious pride.

"All right; but let us be moving. You shall tell me as we go. Miss Fanny, can you walk fast?"

"Yes, Sir, I can walk and run any more if I were a soldier too, and you needn't call me Miss," replied the child, whose glowing eyes, steadily bent forward, seemed to outstrip her slim form.

Taking her hand in his, the young soldier led her quickly on ; and, as dawn brightened into daylight, passed the rebel sentinels consecutively safely through the rebel outposts, and a mile farther on passed at a deserted plantation to mount the horses carefully secreted there upon the preceding afternoon.

"You must ride behind me, Fanny. So—I have strapped your trunk and the box on for a pack, and you will hold tight around my waist. Can you?" asked Lieutenant Tom, merrily.

A bright color flushed over the clear, pale cheek of the little maid, but she answered calmly.

"I think so. I was never on a horse."

"Oh well, Sir, Only hold tight to me and you will do," returned the young man, hastily flinging himself into the saddle.

"Now, Scip, put her up."

The negro obeyed, and, with the precious chest safe strapped to his own saddle, mounted in turn. The spirited horses, fed with corn, and filled with the delicious air of early morning, tossed their heads with an exultant neigh, and darted forward. With the left arm of the officer about his waist, and found time to smile over his shoulder into the pale, determined little face close behind, and to say half-aloud to Scip, kindly,

"Never fear, little Fanny, only cling tight to me."

"Golly, Mas'r! dat feller's got loose a'ready! Look a' dah!" shouted Scip, as, pausing on the crest of a long-winding hill, they looked back upon the rebel camp. Confusion reigned there, and had only passed a couple of hours before. Hastening out from that very outpost, like ants hurrying from an invaded ant-hill, they now be distinguished a number of black specs moving rapidly along the white stripe of road leading toward the position of the fugitives.

"Dey's got de news, an' dey's chasin' us, Mas'r!" exclaimed Scip, his great eyes glaring with ardor and excitement.

"They are right. It is a fine morning for a ride, and I trust they will enjoy it. Let us be getting on, Scip," answered the Lieutenant, quietly : and not a word more was exchanged until fifteen good miles lay between the fugitives and the useless pursuit.

That night Lieutenant Vane reported himself to his colonel, and a few days afterward obtained a short furlough, just long enough to enable him to rush hurriedly home to the old parsonage among the Vermont hills, and to leave there the little, quiet, thoughtful companion of his travels, who shed no tear when he bade her good-by, but stood gazing from the window with such a heart-broken look in her dark eyes and pale lips, that good motherly Mrs. Vane there her arms about her and wept, as she had not done in infancy when her boy fell and bumped.

Leave her there, growing daily in grace and stature—growing too more deeply, day by day, into the hearts of those wise and kindly guardians who care for her, and into the heart of her self-made strange fortune, fostered in the hands of a wise and honest financier, grown also, and still some day make a splendid dower for the child of her adoption.

Lieutenant Vane—Captain Vane before the war was over—did not come home when peace was declared, but, becoming master of a vessel himself, applied the same energy and courage to its restoration and improvement that he had once done to the destruction and impediment of many a hundred such in rebel hands.

And Scip? Ah! what is to be the fate of Scip, and thousands, millions like him?

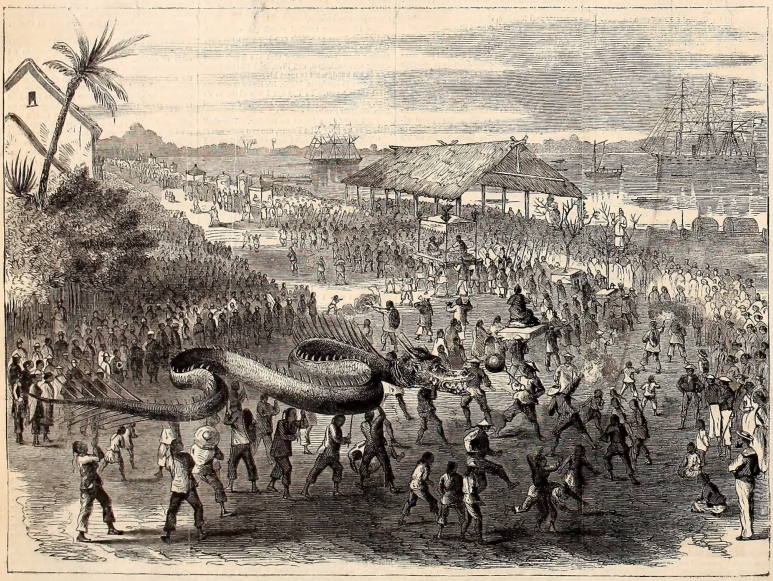
Scip waits; and also waits the fortune he has destined to the ennobling and uprising of his race.

BROADCAST THAT SEED.

Broadcast they seed!
Although some portion may be found
To fall on unexpected ground,
Where sand, or shard, or stone may stay
Its coming into light of day:
Or when it comes, some reluctant air
May make it droop and wither there—
Be not discouraged; some will find
Congenial soil, and gentle wind,
Refreshing dew, and ripening shower,
To bring it into bounteous power;
From flower to fruit, to glad thine eyes,
And fill thy soul with sweet surprise.
Go good, and God will bless thy deed—
Broadcast thy seed!

IDOL WORSHIP.

The essential features of human superstition are very much the same all the world over, only the accidental traits differ. The faith by which the Roman Catholic rejoices upon the image of his patron Saint or of the Virgin for the protection of a city, is at root, the same which led the ancients to believe in the power of an image of a patron goddess to protect the country and their cities ; and the difference being that the one is nominally Christian and the other nominally heathen. With only this difference the principle which underlies the two remarkable instances of idol worship, which we illustrate on the succeeding page, is one and the same. Under similar religious influences human nature exhibits itself in the same way in Cochin China and in Spain.



One of our illustrations represents the procession of the Dragon, which takes place annually in all parts of China. These processions—in which a monstrous image of the Dragon is paraded through the streets—are very remarkable on account of the costumes adopted, and the decorations of every description by which the Chinese seem to give éclat to their grand religious ceremony. They spare no expense. They deck themselves out in silk and gold ; and a single procession costs about ten thousand dollars of our money. To describe the musical exhibition afforded by this display would be quite impossible—the instruments all being of that sort which secures the greatest possible amount of noise. Their cymbals are half a yard in diameter, and are played with astounding vigor. At the head of the procession flaming standards are borne, followed by the mandarins of the first class loaded with great ornaments, and these by the musicians and palanquins laden with fruits of every sort. Then follows the pas d'armes armed with every kind of weapon, ancient or modern, of Chinese warfare. Then, after a long troop of gods and goddesses, represented by youths and maidens in full dress, comes the great Dragon, which measures from 30 to 40 yards in length. Those who bear the huge massage to make the idol represent the undulations and writhings of a real dragon—which Mr. Doolittle, in his interesting work on "The Social Life of the Chinese," calls "unsaucuring the Dragon."

The second illustration represents a proceeding of less apparent pomp, but which is quite as prescribed. Just before the late important event which gave another possible heir to the Spanish throne, a Royal carriage, splendidly appointed, attended by priests, soldiers, and outriders, was seen passing through the street of Atocha. Within this carriage rode an effigy of the house duties are not remarkable—no less a personage, in fact, than the mistress of the robes to the Virgin of Araujuez. To this image of the Virgin the Queen regents on every succeeding occasion like that which has just taken place; and for some months previous to the interesting event the highest of the Court officers and dress-makers are consulted as to the fashion and richness of the votive offering which shall be presented to the lady of Araujuez. This is the convenience of this magnificent robe, all bejewelled and belaced, that the Royal lady for whom the effigy was devised ; and it was believed that the object of the Queen's veneration would, when opportunity served, be efficacious in securing for her Majesty that safety and comfort which in her situation were so desirable. Our illustration represents the solemn ceremony which took place just before the accouchement, when the Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo accompanied the image into the presence of Royalty, and the Virgin of Oleido was transported for a month's visit to the palace in all the splendor of the robes and jewels with which it had been decorated. Some days before the time announced for the reeption of the little Royal stranger, the Archbishop of Toledo, Cardinal Father TIRILO, set out by special train to fetch the Virgin from the convent of San Pascual, at Aranjuez, and was accompanied by a priest, whose sacred duty it was to carry the image, as though he were bearing a doll. Our illustration is taken from a sketch representing the entrance of the Archbishop to the railway station, where, as usual, a number of the faithful had assembled to witness the deportation of the image whose presence in Madrid was expected to be so serviceable to the Queen in her hour of trouble.

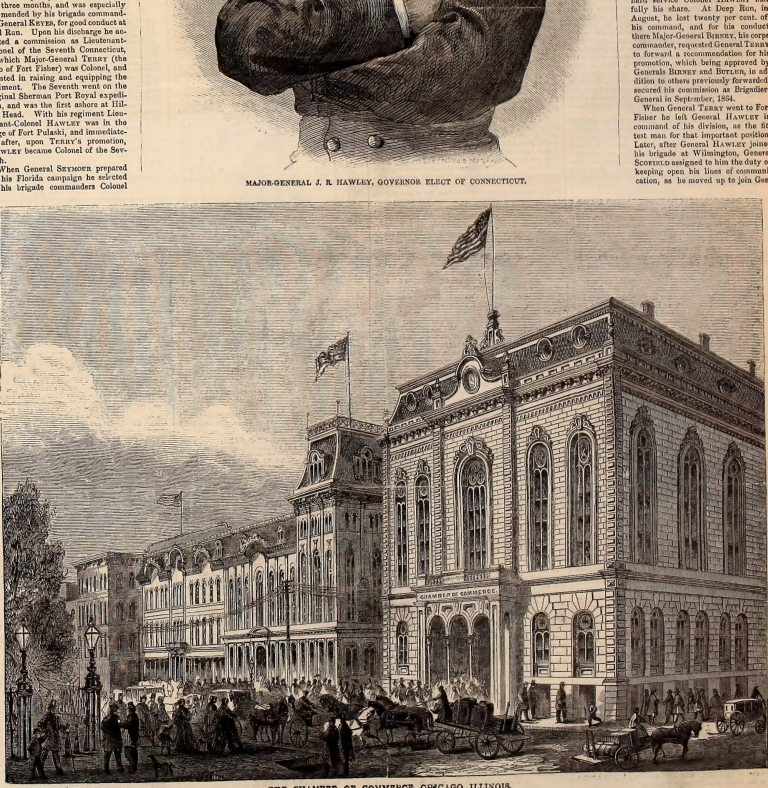
IDOL WORSHIP IN COCHIN CHINA—ANNUAL PROCESSION OF THE DRAGON AT SAIGON.

GOVERNOR HAWLEY, OF CONNECTICUT.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOSEPH R. HAWLEY, Governor elect of Connecticut, was born in Richmond County, North Carolina, October 31, 1826. His parents removed to Connecticut when he was eleven years of age. After his graduation at Hamilton College, New York, in 1847, he studied law, entering upon the practice of his profession in Hartford, 1850. In politics he acted with the Free Soil Party. After a practice of six years, becoming very deeply interested in the struggle against the extension of slavery, he became editor of the Hartford Evening Press (an organ of the new Republican Party) in 1857, and took a very active part as a speaker in the political campaigns, which were always bitterly contested in Connecticut.

On the breaking out of the rebellion and the publication of Mr. LINCOLN'S call for 75,000 men he drew up an enlistment paper, and headed the list as the first volunteer from Connecticut. Associated with him was A. W. DRAKE, a young Democratic lawyer, who afterward died as Colonel of the Tenth Connecticut. Ignorant of drill, the volunteers selected GEORGE S. BURNHAM, afterward Colonel of the Twenty-second Connecticut, as their Captain, HAWLEY being First Lieutenant and DRAKE Second. BURNHAM was immediately promoted, and HAWLEY became Captain, in which capacity he served honorably three months, and was especially commended by his brigade commander, General KEYES, for good conduct at Bull Run. Upon his discharge he accepted a commission as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Seventh Connecticut, of which Major-General TERRY (the hero of Fort Fisher) was Colonel, and assisted in raising and equipping the regiment. The Seventh went on the original Sherman Port Royal expedition, and was the first ashore at Hilton Head. With his regiment Lieutenant-Colonel HAWLEY was in the siege of Fort Pulaski, and immediately after, upon TERRY'S promotion, HAWLEY became Colonel of the Seventh.



When General SEYMOUR prepared for his Florida campaign he selected as his brigade commanders Colonel HAWLEY, Colonel JACK MONTGOMERY, of Kansas fame, and Colonel BARTON, of the Forty-Eighth New York. At the battle of Olustee, Colonel HAWLEY'S brigade commenced the fight, and the Seventh Connecticut, under his guidance, was the last regiment out. He was in the battle for three and a half hours, never once dismounting from his horse, although greatly increasing his danger by being thus conspicuous, while his men were lying down fighting with their breech-loading rifles. Of about 4700 actually engaged in that battle over 1800 were killed or wounded, Colonel HAWLEY'S brigade losing its full share, or over 38 per cent. For his gallantry on the occasion General SEYMOUR urgently requested his promotion.

In April, 1864, Colonel HAWLEY came to Virginia with his regiment, and was assigned to the command of a brigade in TERRY'S division of the Tenth Corps, in the Army of the James. In the battle of Drewry's Bluff he lost between 400 and 500 men, and his conspicuous gallantry in the three days of that fight called forth warm praise from his commanders, General STANNARD, of Vermont—a brave officer, who subsequently lost an arm at Chaffin's Farm—complimenting him on the field for his marked coolness and courage. The campaign before Richmond and Petersburg was an almost uninterrmitted series of battles and skirmishes from May to November, unequaled before in the world's history, and of all the hard service Colonel HAWLEY had fully his share. At Deep Run, in August, he lost twenty per cent. of his command, and for his conduct there Major-General BIRNEY, his corps commander, requested General TERRY to forward a recommendation for his promotion, which being approved by Generals BIRNEY and BUTLER, in addition to others previously forwarded, secured his commision as Brigadier-General in September, 1864.

When General TERRY went to Fort Fisher he left General HAWLEY in command of his division, as the fittest man for that important position. Later, after General HAWLEY joined his brigade at Wilmington, General SCOFIELD assigned to him the duty of keeping open his lines of communication, as he moved up to join Gen-

ceal SHERMAN. At Wilmington and Richmond, after hostilities had ceased, General HAWLEY was formed, in an administrative capacity, perhaps as arduous and important duties as at any time during his four years in the army. He returned to Connecticut November 1, 1865, and was soon after honorably discharged. February 14, 1866, he received a two-thirds vote on an informal ballot, and was then nominated by acclamation for Governor by the Union party. He was elected April 2, by 500 majority, after a fierce contest, in which he vigorously stumped the State.

Governor HAWLEY is most devoted to the Republican party, and abides its harmony and a continuance of its rule in the country upon its well-known liberal and thoroughly Democratic principles.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

FASHION has definitely changed, we fancy, since SIR ANDREW AGUECHEEK was pretty much a

"Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice stole in and out,
As if they feared the light."

The "little mice" have grown wonderfully bold in these latter days, and have no occasion to steal "out;" they most unmistakably "out" when "on duty" in the public thoroughfare. Perhaps the description given of Scotland, who wrote the book a hundred years earlier than Suckling, will better suit our times, in spite of the old-fashioned orthography:

"Their woven hose of silk are shawin,
Baryit about with lakels dewin,
With garten of one new mounde
To gar their contributes be knawin;
And all for mychtiegheasse of gre."

"Sometimes they will hair up their gown
To shew their wilfoot hingan down;
And sometimes both they will uplyft,
To shaw their hose of black or brown;
And all for unbridgeing of gre."

It is passing strange that American women can not adopt a sensible fashion without carrying it to ridiculous extremes. It is all a very thing pins and no sixpences: dresses must be very long or very short; very wide or very narrow—the legend being always and to "moderation."

The fashion of hanging street-dresses is unquestionably sensible, but the comfort, and health demand that the drapery should not trail through wet, dusty, or dirty streets, and that the foot should not be unduly trammeled. So also, without any wish to be unduly censorious, ladies are agreed that the much-abused crinoline is more conducive to health than the multitudinous skirts in which ladies were wont to envelop themselves previous to its modern introduction.

But when to the looped dress and short petticoats is added the extra-fashionable, bell-shaped, floor-and-a-half-yards-wide-at-the-bottom, the combination cannot be not simply inelegant, it is ridiculous and indecent. No modest woman ever yet allowed herself to be tortured into exposure and remark which such a costume causes. Better stick to the old dress, ladies, than run the risk of such exhibitions as are becoming frightfully common in our streets, and which are the occasion of many a rude jest.

A lady belonging to the Episcopal Church the other day remarked, with regard to a modest fashionable style in which she was herself attending theatres as some who brought out their best and heaviest—with a view to display—the large hoods and cloaks of the period, that "it was impossible for me not literally to be ashamed of my own sex." It was then called the "poke" style, and in those days some great ladies wore fortunes on their heads. Such exaggerations are now obsolete. Although it is scarcely possible to be too neat and particular "about the feet," simplicity is a primary principle in this portion of the toilet. For those who admire and adopt the quieter and more reasonable fashions, no boots can be better suited to spring wear than the simply made of either black kid or black poplin. The poplin, if carefully worked upon the dress to color, but it is more frequently worn either black or gray. Boots made of good French satin, and fastened with crystal buttons, are "well worn" for dress occasions.

A few June days have accidentally dropped into April. A dreamy languor steals over body and mind, and free and free are made apparent. The grass is springing, the birds are singing, and the melancholies little moth-millers is flitting about. It will do well to take reasonable care of their minks and sables.

A pair of tender lovers eloped from the vicinity of Albany a few days since. The gallant marvellous was aged eighty-five, and the fair and fickle dame had seen seventy-five summers pass by the same number of withers. Both were married and had large families, who "mourn their loss."

In olden times it was the custom to engrave mottoes upon or inside the wedding-ring. The following are specimens of popular mottoes:

"Let him never take a wife
That will not love her as his life."

"In time, my love,
All joy I prove."

"Beyond this life
We'll love, dear wife."

"Divinely knit by grace are we,
You inside one; me dwelling here one."

Some mottoes were admonitory, as—

"Should I wed, wish single Twixt man and wife."

"This ring should bind
Not mind to mind."

A Honolulu newspaper gives a tantalizing account of the luscious fruits with which spontaneously the Sandwich Islands. The most delicious oranges, it says, are in perfect drug in some districts; limes are seen rotting under the trees ankle-deep, bananas, mangoes, tamarinds, and pine-apples are abundant, to say nothing of "that splendid fruit, the chirimoya, that makes one's mouth water to think of!" Why don't somebody import a cargo of the chirimoya—whatever it may be!

At the recent 1st display at the Academy of Music there appeared a prominent citizeness of Baltimore, who for some time past has been exerting herself in behalf of the Southern Relief Fair. It was reported that she had cried and raved because her young husband would take her away from her work, and make her expend so much on a costume, when the cry for common clothes and common food came up from the desolated hearth-stones of her fair Southern homes-land. Her sister, though single, was extremely elegant; and when complimented by a friend on her appearance, the lady replied, somewhat proudly: "My husband gave me a check for a thousand dollars, with special directions and supplications that I should get myself a worthy of myself and worthy of the occasion, and he assures me I have done so, though I bought nothing but the rose my gloves and my slippers and the magnolias in my hair."

The following anecdote is good enough for a second reading, if any one has not seen it on his letter:

When Daniel Webster was delivering his memorable speech at the dedication of Bunker Hill Monument the crowd pressed forward to such an extent that some were fainting and some being crushed. Officers strove in vain to make the crowd stand back. They said that it could not be done. Some one asked Mr. Webster to make an appeal to them. The great orator stepped forward, which ceased, and said, in deep, stentorian tones, "Gentlemen, stand back," said he, without a change of voice—"It is impossible, Webster, impossible." "Impossible!" repeated Mr. Webster; "impossible! Gathering his mantle around him as Bunker Hill" and the vast crowd swayed and ruled back like a mighty wave of the ocean.

There are, it would seem, only six kinds of noses that are decidedly beautiful, and this classification is well known and of long standing, for an antique gem in the Florentine Museum gives us five out of the six. There are, however, in nature many more specimens of any class; almost all the noses one meets with are of a composite character; and six all merely accompanied with equally composite mental characteristics.

Class I. The Roman Nose.
II. The Grecian Nose.
III. The Cognitive or wide-nostriled Nose.
IV. The Snub Nose.
V. The Snub Nose.
VI. The Button-hole Nose, or Celestial.

The first three classes are the noble type of nose, the latter three are of the sordid and contemptible type. The Roman nose, which we observed yesterday, usually fixes the very earliest times, for we have them distinctly portrayed in the Hittite Terra-Cotta Heads of Carchemish. In this three-headed deity the profile of Yizhun, the "Destroyer," has a rough Greek outline; that of Sivn, "the Destroyer," has a rough and energetic Roman nose. But Brahma, "the Creator," has a broad egotistic nostril, both nostrils being of equal size, and of the Cognitive order. This is very remarkable, as showing that in the very dawn of history we must look for accuracy of mind in what we call philosophy, there was a much more accurate intuition of truth than, in these latter times, we are ready to allow.

The etiquette of Court "drawing-rooms" has been quite changed since the Queen's public appearance in mourning. A first "drawing-room" in an event long looked forward to, and much desired, by the young girl who has been "out" for a year or two, and who dates from her felicitation by the crowding and crushing of the whole room. Now, the number of presentations, empty honors and graceful young ladies' struggles for first entrance with a determination and energy that is marvellous in this life (?) an assemblage: and many are the shreds of lace, tips of feathers, dismembered flowers, and broken fans, that strew the floor, the following morning, out of the way, but the crinolines of the ladies. Having smoothed her ruffled plumes in a lobby after the crush is subsided and entered into the presence of royalty, and before she is aware of it, the long-talked courtesy is performed and the ceremony over.

A certain military officer, who, after having gone heroically through the Crimean war, was promoted by Her Majesty the Queen at a very crowded levee. Although totally prepared for what he was to perform, he felt very ill at ease as he approached the royal presence. His nasty nervousness the Duke had in his eye as he stood near by the Chamberlain, and for a moment he stood bewildered before the Queen. "Kneel down, sir," was the admonition, "kneel!" and accordingly he dropped on one knee as the Queen extended her hand. All his acquired knowledge fled from him, and instead of kissing the hand he put to shake hands with her Majesty or knew the delicate little hand, so generously extended to be kissed, in mid-air, like Monsamoth's coffin, knew not as, with his natural faculties in one hopeless whirl, he gazed as if fascinated upon it. The Duke, who stood by his side, at last impatiently whispered, so as audible utter ran round the Court circle—"Kiss the hand, sir!" when herself and he mutually compelled to join, when the gallant officer, regaining his device to do so, seized the hand, raised her hand and impressed upon it so emphatic a kiss that it resound rang through the room. Hastily rising, he was about to retire with all the decorum so difficult of attainment by retired half-pay officers, when a tone of intense irritation, "Here!" burst on the ear. It was her Majesty. The poor officer, thus admonished and baited on every side, almost lost patience as he stepped quickly backward, and in so doing trod heavily on the foot of the Lord Chamberlain, who, while swearing up his face into a horrible expression of pain, did not give vent to his feelings. The officer, meantime, made good his retreat—a wicked delight in the sufferings of the sorely perverse comforting him for his own disasters and brushes of Court etiquette.

A society has been formed in Paris for the purpose of exhuming the usually poor remains of celebrities in the Père Lachaise. In order to insure impartiality the work will be confined to learned men of the Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish persuasions.

In an Auckland (New Zealand) paper a girl advertises for a situation to take charge of a boundry or dairy. She can cook, wash, mend, wet by preference, &c., &c. "None but a respectable mistress, who wishes to leave her servant in 5 hours in the morning, need apply." What a competition there must be among mistresses for the modest servant!

Physicians in England, it seems, are liable to be called upon to do double duty in their professional visits. Not long ago a doctor residing at Putney (on Thames) had occasion to call in the bedroom of the left (as he knows she asked him to wait for a few minutes, as she wanted to write upon a particular matter. He waited, and presently the lady reappeared, followed by a domestic bearing a large piece of wood. It was down before the doctor. "Oh, Mr. ——," said the lady, "I'm so terribly afraid of this cold plague, that I've almost sfraid to cock anything in the way of meat. Will you kindly cut that shin?" Now, just look at it, and tell me whether it has had the plague or not." "Dear Madam," replied the doctor, "I don't understand that kind of patient. I'm not a veterinary surgeon, you see. I don't attend cases of beef. I could only say it was good if I tasted it." The lady was in no wise taken aback. "Then come and dine with us, doctor," she said, "and if it is bad, you'll be able to tell us."

Publish this Day:

THE TOILERS OF THE SEA.

A NOVEL.

By VICTOR HUGO.

AUTHOR OF "LES MISERABLES."

8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

The Athenæum says: "As an idyl of homely and simple heroism, we know nothing save parts of 'Enoch Arden,' that can compare in touching sweetness with the closing scenes of 'Les Travailleurs de la Mer.'"

Punch says of this work: "Those who would know with what charm, magnificence, and terror the genius of the poet has invested his ocean pictures, must consult the work itself. The romance contains minute descriptions of local manners and superstitions, which give an additional grace to the grand scenes which are unfolded in the work."

The Debats says: "'Travailleurs de la Mer,' a poem, history, and legend—an elegy, an epopee, a war-song, a great cry traversing the ocean, and which will traverse ages—such is the work of the poet."

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by Mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THE GREAT GOLD GIFT DISTRIBUTION.

We desire to caution our readers against confounding the establishment of the Cosmopolitan Manufacturers' Jewelers' Association with the "enterprises" so often advertised in daily press, and which the purchaser has no opportunity to be more catch-penny affairs, gotten up for the purpose of disposing of the big calls of worthless stocks from the second-hand establishments of the East. Not an article is sold by Messrs. CALKINS & CO. but what it is represented to be; and, indeed, the well-known character and standing of the firm is a sufficient guarantee for the responsibility of the Association they represent. Were such not the case, we should not bring their establishment in this city, at 33 and 35 Madison Square, before you, nor would they go away with from so bright with smiles of satisfaction.—Chicago Post, April 1, 1865.

We want agents in every town and county, and in every regiment, and to these acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every envelope ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every envelope, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage-stamps.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

KNOWLEDGE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we confidently invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific to cures which have no parallel in the present age.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and encountered opposition, and hesitation as were not encountered by any reformers.

SUPERIORITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanence, and think that diseases can only be cured by the slow, protracted process of Nature.

This is our reply: In health the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is required is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES DERIVED FROM PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYSIS.

It is an universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the greatest remedy for the cure of the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Nerve-Giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AF STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA.

This takes preliminary and adjutrent, filling life with untold misery, is, by the Life Syrup, made tolerable, bearable.

RHEUMATISM.

[ARTHRITIS], LUMBAGO, SCIATICA, GOUT, &c.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a specific, it is this class of diseases and kindred affections. The most intense pains are silenced instantly Alcoholic—Quinine swellings are reduced. Chronic sores, for ulceration, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by it.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the bad Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatism to which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, as remedy has ever proved its equal.

PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 22 First Premiums, gold and silver medals, at the Principal Fairs held in this country within the last ten years, and in addition thereto they were awarded a First Prize Medal at the Great International Exhibition in London, 1862, in competition with 199 Pianos from all parts of the World.

That the great superiority of these instruments is now universally conceded is abundantly proved by the FACT that Messrs. Steinway's "scales, improvements, and peculiarities of construction" have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both hemispheres (as CLOSELY AS COULD BE DONE WITHOUT INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT RIGHTS), and that their instruments are built by the most eminent pianists of Europe and America, who prefer them for their own public and private use wherever accessible.

STEINWAY & SONS direct special attention to their Patent Agraffe Arrangement, which, having been practically tested in all their Grand and higher-priced Square Pianos, and admitted to be one of the greatest improvements of modern times, will hereafter be introduced in EVERY PIANO MANUFACTURED BY THEM, WITHOUT INCREASE OF COST to the purchaser, in order that all their patrons may reap its benefit.

STREET SCENE IN CAIRO, ILLINOIS

SALE OF GOVERNMENT STORES.

Our artist at Cairo thus describes the illustration of the sale of Government stores on the levee at Cairo given on this page:

"Passing along the levee at Cairo, with its dust, filth, and obtrusive drinking-saloons, gaping wide open for victims to the trash within, it would appear to a stranger, from the great number of such places, that the people of Cairo had powers not accorded elsewhere to ordinary mortals of resisting the effects of 'tangle-leg,' 'red-eye,' 'twist-knee,' and other brands peculiar to the locality. Outside of each place are gathered a knot of hard-looking fellows. There is a suspicious air of 'lying-in-wait' common to those frequenters of the levee which is not calculated to inspire confidence in a stranger.

"At a Government warehouse an auction is in progress of such stores as appertain to the commissary department. The prominent figures are the auctioneer and a colored soldier—the former a well-known character, at one time connected with the Herald as an army correspondent. As a getter-up of sells he has few rivals; and many who knew him in the army will recognize him when they hear that he is principally indebted to his powers of ventriloquism for success. Many will remember the succeeding article of a Herald correspondent monopolizing the telegraph line at Niagara Falls and telegraphing the first chapters of Genesis to excited newspaper reporters, who were dying with anxiety to transmit their accounts of the Prince of Wales's progress to Canada. The article that must! As far as your artist knows he is the last instance of this gentleman's proficiency in practical jokes. While the sketch was being taken the auctioneer, who up to that time had ignored the artist's presence, turned upon the latter with a twinkle of recognition, the response by which was an inadvertent wink. Turning traitor at once, he went on with the sale, accepting the wink as a further bid, and knocking down to the delinquent character an old worn-out copying press at the liberal sum of $1 75."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.

IN a free constitutional system of government the executive branch becomes most prominent during a war. The frequent necessity of summary measures, which the common sense of the country concedes, accustoms it to the contemplation of the arbitrary use of extraordinary power. And if, as with us during the late war, the exercise of that power is in the hands of a magistrate entirely beloved and trusted, its essential and normal peril becomes obscured to the public eye.

To our fathers who made the Constitution, however, there was no such obscurity. They had emerged from an exhausting war with a Government in which the executive power had absorbed so much more than its rightful share, even in a monarchical system, that its success in America would have been constitutional ruin in England. When they framed our government, therefore, they defined the power of the Executive as exactly as it could be done. The President was made Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy when in actual service; but Congress alone was to declare war and raise and support armies. He was to veto any law which seemed to him objectionable; but a two-thirds vote of Congress was, upon due consideration, to overpower his veto. He was to make treaties, but only with the consent of two-thirds of the Senators present, and to appoint envoys and judges, but only with the approval of the Senate. In the imagination of the fathers, and because of their faith in a popular system, the motive power of the Government was to reside in Congress, which was the immediate representative of the people.

It was in obedience to this system and in full sympathy with the spirit from which it sprung that Mr. LINCOLN, whom circumstances compelled to assert the executive power to its utmost legitimate extent, constantly appealed to Congress to justify his acts. During the war he did not hesitate to state "to whom it might concern" the terms upon which, as Commander-in-Chief, he was ready to cease operations in the field; but he was careful to say that the question of reorganization must be finally determined by Congress. While the war was still raging he said that he was willing to recognize any rebel State a Government established and maintained by a tenth of the number of voters before the war; but he conceded that the admission to Congress of a State so constituted was a question for Congress alone to decide.

President LINCOLN died just as the work of restoration was beginning. President JOHNSON laid down by proclamation the terms upon which rebel States might proceed to reorganize, but most explicitly that the work was to be concluded only by the consent of Congress. He did his part as his sense of duty and his view of public necessity demanded. The States, summoned and directed by him, did their part as they saw fit. Congress is now cautiously considering in what way most wisely to do its work which officially completes the work. And it is just at this point that those who are utterly malignant at the overthrow of the late revolutionary movement which sought the destruction of the Government advise the President to lead a new revolution for the same purpose. Those who, in 1861, called upon "all conservative people" to withstand the "abolition frenzy" of ABRAHAM LINCOLN in undertaking "to coerce Sovereign States," now entreat the same people to call upon the Executive power to seize the Government.

This is a curious illustration of the fact that the devotees of slavery, which is a system of brute force and blood and crime, have neither the least conception of a popular government, nor the least faith in any methods but those of the sword. Congress passes a law to protect the equal rights of all citizens of every color in the United States; and GARRETT DAVIS, bred in the politics of slavery, thereupon declares—not that he will try to submit to the judgment, or to procure a repeal of the law—but that he will devote the feeble remnant of his life to overthrowing the Government. SAULSBURY of Delaware, another graduate of the same school, more or less soberly announces that his sentiments will resist the law to the last. The New York Daily News, which rejoiced at every bloody victory of rebels over loyal citizens, exhorts the President to shed the blood of loyal representatives. The New York World, whose sympathy with the rebellion was masked but not concealed, whose Presidential platform declared the war a failure, and whose fierce vituperation of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON in their letters to Mr. GREELEY is historical, begs President JOHNSON to disregard his oath; and the Chicago Times, the deadly foe of the Union and of equal rights, urges him to sweep Congress from the field.

These men and papers have no more idea of a Constitutional Government than New Zealanders. Disloyal Mr. BROOKS, a politician of their school, if they do not like an argument they are for knocking the advocate upon the head. If they do not like the laws, they are for instant revolution. If the President differs with Congress, he is to turn it out of doors; and if a Congress which they favored should differ with a President of their party, like JOHNSON, they would urge Congress to hang him without delay. This was precisely the course of the late rebels. They were displeased with the result of an election, and immediately rose in arms; and it is natural that those who either frankly or meekly defended them should invite a repetition of their folly.

But the exquisitely humorous aspect of the matter is, that those who urge revolution as a remedy for legislation which they do not like, solemnly call themselves Conservatives. Large property holders, with people of regular industry and employment, and of small means will, of course, see and appreciate the advantages of such Conservatism. They have been evident in Mexico for the last forty years. They have been revealed in the condition of our own country during the last three. They would be illustrated in England if, upon the passage of the pending Reform Bill, Lord DERBY and Mr. DISRAELI could persuade Queen to order the army to turn Parliament into the street. Reduced to a plain statement the Conservative policy, as represented by the authorities we have named, is the overthrow by violence of our Government by the absorption of the whole system in the executive branch.

Now if my difference of opinion exists between the executive and legislative authorities the Constitution provides a lawful and peaceful remedy. In case of extremity, as of the veto, the President is the judge of the will of Congress previous. The reason of this is plain. The executive power is vested in a single person, whom ambition or fanaticism might tempt to overthrow the liberties of the people. But Congress is the people by their immediate representatives, and it is not supposable that they would conspire against themselves. To say that Congress, without the representation of the late rebel States, is not the people, is simply to say that we have had no lawful government for five years past. The nature of the executive power in our system is indicated by its name. It is the power that executes the will of the people, as expressed under certain conditions and by specific instruments. If the elective agent of that power willfully opposes Congress he opposes the majority of the people upon whom the power is devised, is the rightful government of the country. The belated devotees of slavery, who call themselves Conservatives, and urge President JOHNSON to subvert the Government upon the advice of his and of the American people and of a constitutional system as they did before the war.

THE PROSPECT UNDER THE LOAN BILL.

THE "Loan Bill" has become a law, and by that law the Secretary of the Treasury is expressly prohibited from issuing any notes of a less than 7-per cent. of the currency of the country before the next meeting of Congress. It is a substantial victory for the paper-money men, whose leaders are Messrs. JOHN SHERMAN of Ohio, THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, and GEORGE BOUTWELL of Massachusetts—gentlemen whose representative ideas are doubtless, but who have done what they could, it seems to us, to postpone the resumption of specie payments, to perpetuate the degradation of the national currency, and to give a new lease of life to the speculation which is fattening at the cost of the great public of consumers. Whether we have forever or not, the market reports are there to tell.

With few exceptions, prices are as high as they were when gold was 200 and above. Roast beef sells at 28 cents against 15 before the war; veal at 27 or 29 as against 14 or 16; mutton at 18 or 20 as against 12 or 14; butter at 60 or 65 as against 22 or 27; coffee at 50 cents as against 28 or 30; dry goods at 150 @ 200 per cent. advance; woolen goods at 100 @ 150 per cent. advance; boots and other manufactures at 100 per cent. advance; and sugars, spices, and groceries generally at 100 or 150 per cent. advance. Very few of these articles are lower than they were when gold was 200. It costs just as much to live now as it did in 1864–5, when the issue of the war was uncertain, and it was a problem whether the national currency was or was not going to follow in the wake of the Confederate shinplasters and Continental money. In some places living seems even higher than it was then. In the city of New Orleans, the cabmen, and the car-drivers declare that they can not live on the wages which supported them in 1864–5, and have generally struck for an advance.

Now the cause of the prevailing high prices is the redundancy of the currency, and —to use the jargon of the street—the "ease of money." Capitalists, direct and indirect, have their effect, of course. But these exercise less influence upon prices than the condition of the money market. Money is now to be had 5 per cent. per annum in Wall Street. The consequence is that all the National Banks are begging speculators to take their money; and the next consequence is that cliques have been or are being formed in every article of merchandise for the purpose of forestalling the markets with the aid of these National Banks. Cotton, beef, pork, gold, leather, hides, groceries are all controlled by cliques, which are buying up or have bought up the entire stocks in market, and are carrying them with the assistance of the National Banks. In this city alone the bank discounts have swelled from an average of $100,000,000 @ $120,000,000 before the war to $180,000,000 now. A similar expansion has taken place in other cities. The advance represents money loaned to speculators to hold produce, merchandise, and stocks. It gives bank accommodation which enables the speculators in beef, butter, dry goods, and leather to extort from the public double the old prices, and to be unable to curtail their discounts these speculators would be forced to disgorge, and prices would fall. So long as the banks can discount freely they will be sure to be able to earn large dividends, and the speculators will succeed in keeping up prices.

It was the purpose of the Secretary of the Treasury, by holding a rod over the head of these banks, to compel them to draw in their currency and diminish their discounts. Had the necessities of business in the necessaries of life would have been compelled to abandon their forestalling scheme, and prices would again have been governed by the law of supply and demand. He failed; and the consequence is that speculators hold their property as firmly as ever, that prices rule as high as they did when GRANT was thunder-at the gates of Richmond, and that mechanics are compelled, in this hour of expected contraction, to strike for higher wages.

As for the Secretary of the Treasury, he has a plain duty to perform. He is empowered to exchange long bonds for short date securities in any quantity, and he is not restricted as to the price at which he will sell his bonds. He should act upon this authority without delay. Not an hour should be lost in funding the outstanding debt and deposit certificates, and the Treasury should be a lender. The absorption of these troublesome liabilities would place the Treasury Department in an independent position, and would speedily bring the National Banks to such a realizing sense of their danger as would compel at least some of them to initiate the policy of contraction. This measure might be followed by an exchange of long bonds for Seven-Thirties. But no time should be lost in inaugurating the policy of funding. Every hour of delay inflicts loss on the public, and enriches speculators. Every day that is lost swells the ranks of the men who are inclined to hold the dominant party responsible for the present cost of living.

Men of all parties can not too soon or too plainly perceive that hereafter political issues are to be joined on substantial and material questions—and especially on questions of taxation. The people of the United States are paying this year fully $17 per head in taxes—a heavier burden is borne by any other people. This tax is laid, indeed, to discharge a debt generously incurred for the noblest cause, and no man who understands this every hour is responsible for the debt children who secured by it, will grudge its payment. But the redundancy of the currency, the number of National Banks, the unnecessary excessive discount, have swelled the cost of living to twice the average prior to 1860. This is a burden which we all wish to shake off as soon as practicable. The longer it is borne the louder will be the demand for relief. The taxes, indeed, would weigh less heavily if the cost of living were reduced, and every party deserved of that relief presents facilities for forestalling the markets. We might perhaps agree to pay 65 cents for butter and $12 for boots if we were relieved from an income tax of 5 @ 10 per cent. But no patriotic party or statesman ought to expect or desire the country to endure for more than the shortest time the great increase in the cost of living caused by the redundance of the currency, and the necessarily heavy taxes. Even the great Union party which carried the country safely through the war and restored the flag of the Union "without the loss of a single star," could not hope to retain its present ascendency except by surely and steadily relieving the public burden.

We think Congress has made a serious mistake; and it remains for the Secretary of the Treasury to do what he can to check the expansion of the National Banks, and to bring down the cost of living. And it behooves him to lose no time in beginning the work.

A GOOD UNION VIEW.

IT was certainly a very questionable compliment to Governor Parsons offered by Democrats in Mobile when, at a late dinner, his health was drunk with that of "President DAVIS." Of course the proposer of the sentiment had been a rebel. But we desire to observe to Kentucky a Union man, Colonel B. H. BRISTOW, who was a LINCOLN and JOHNSON elector, pays no such doubtful honors to the President. He proposes to associate his name with Mr. LINCOLN'S.

At the late Soldiers' Convention Governor BRAMLETTE reported a resolution approving the policy of President JOHNSON, saying that the resolution did not commit the Convention to any man or party, nor was it "an indorsement of any Presidential, but simply supported the principles for which the soldiers had fought. He used Mr. JOHNSON'S name, he said, merely by designate a policy. Thereupon Colonel BRISTOW rose and

> "I move to amend by adding at the close, 'understanding it to be the fixed and cherished policy of his honored predecessor ABRAHAM LINCOLN.' I think this country had more of my love, respect, and veneration than Mr. JOHNSON has. If we must have Mr. JOHNSON'S name in the resolution, let us have Mr. LINCOLN'S too. If, as I understand Mr. JOHNSON, he is carrying out the policy of Mr. LINCOLN, I am for Mr. JOHNSON. With this express understanding I indorse JOHNSON, but I will not indorse him in the language of every rebel meeting in Kentucky, nor in the way of those who, while they indorse him, reassert the fundamental and original principles of the rebellion, the miserable, abominable, and infamous resolutions of '98."

It is surely a fair question whether the Mobile toast coupled President JOHNSON'S name with that of JEFFERSON DAVIS because he was supposed to be carrying out the policy of Mr. LINCOLN.

THE AUGEAN STABLE.

THE Board of Health has gone to work in earnest, and has therefore undoubtedly discovered what a task it has undertaken. When we look at the city misery and filth, disease and hopeless, and saw the cholera making ready to fall upon us, the news of the appointment of the Board was like a ray of sunlight. The commissioners appointed were excellent and satisfactory. They lost no time, and called for nuisances to abate. The nuisances have answered to the call with alacrity. They appeared in hosts and clouds. They are every where. This was the first step, and it was not difficult. In the city of New York to find a nuisance was the easiest task to which an inquirer with a nose, a pair of eyes, and a pocket could be called.

But having found the nuisance, how to abate it is a different question; and that is the one which presented itself to the Board directly upon the heels of the first. And it is the consideration of this question which has damped the expectations of the public, and prevent an unreasonable reaction against the Board in consequence of which the encouragement of their every action—a reaction which is all the more probable from the enthusiastic welcome which hailed the creation of the Board.

Indeed the chief nuisances and dangers of the city are the markets down town and the tenement-houses. Nothing is easier than for the Board to say the thing—nothing can be more plausible than a distinct order that these abominations shall be regulated or annihilated. Certainly; let the command be uttered in the most uncompromising voice. And then how is it to be done? Some of the inspectors have reported a certain range of buildings, a horrible slum in which human beings wallow. "Shut it up," says the Board. And the people who are turned out? Are they to encamp in the streets or retreat to other slums? There are hundreds and thousands of people in New York to-day whose habitations endanger the health of the city. They should be unhoused immediately for the general welfare. Where are they to go to unhouse?

So with the markets. The testimony concerning the Washington Market confirms what every man knows who has seen it. It is in every way a nuisance and a peril. Mr. A. T. STEWART said lately before the Committee at Albany, that, in his judgment, Broadway could be much relieved of its pressure if the markets were moved up town, and the great steamer piers built. There is no doubt of it. But the horrible accumulations of the Washington Market should be removed now, and how long will it take to erect new buildings up town? There is an open lot up town below the neighboring level. The surrounding region has been drained into it until it has become a cesspool offending earth and heaven. The Board order the drainage into it to cease. It is immediately stopped, but the refuse of the houses which fed it is emptied as slops into the street at each front-door.

while the line of the new sewerage which will finally relieve the difficulty lies directly through solid rock, and the work can not be finished to-morrow. In the mean time the neighborhood and the city must suffer, nor can any Board help it.

The city must suffer, for the sins of the fathers are visited upon the second and third generations, and in our case those generations make the sins three and four times as bad. The necessity for the vast work of sewerage which is now going on in the city is occasioned by the foolish and ignorant system of laying out the city, and that again is due to intrusting the municipal management to ignorant and rapacious men. Commissioners, for instance, appointed to open streets, receive three dollars for every meeting whether they attend or not. A man may be appointed upon ten or twenty such Commissions and receive payment for all. Is it surprising that there are some streets the laying out of which involves such difficulties that Commissioners have been sitting upon the subject for five years, at the rate of three dollars for every meeting at which they are absent or present, and can not yet determine how to open the streets and close their pockets?

A Health Board that undertakes to deal with a city of this kind has begun upon the top of an Stable. The City Government itself is the chief nuisance, and the horrible slums and filth and poor drainage are but secondary evils. It is a pleasant fact that the Board appears to be at work like a Hercules, for nothing but Herculean resolution and labor can insure success.

OUR ARTISTS IN THE SOUTH.

THE sketches which we give on our first page are the first of a series of illustrations which we propose to give of the characteristic scenes of life in the Southern States, whether in the city or on the plantation. We have for this purpose a corps of special artists in those States, who have had years of experience in the special class of duties which they have undertaken, and who understand the peculiarities of the region and of the people. During the war these artists have followed our armies, and have furnished the public through the pages of this paper with illustrations of the great conflict so graphic and faithful that they will be appreciated as long as our history shall be read. The battles are now; but their results remain —results how different from those contemplated by the late rebel leaders! Those leaders, indeed, have failed to revolutionize the United States Government, but they have most certainly succeeded in revolutionizing the southern part of the country.

Yet the situation which the war has created is not irretrievable. A country so purely agricultural in all its interests as the southern section of the republic can recover even from the most terrible shocks of war. There is, in such a case, no vast and complex system of commerce to be suddenly blasted, for there was no such system to be overturned or interrupted by the war. The cities which suffered were few in number, and as they were chiefly great agricultural emporiums they will speedily recover their former importance and wealth, while a single day will almost redeem the plantations from their present chaos of ruin.

But that which is irretrievable by any possible human means is the social revolution which the war has accomplished. It is a revolution both of society and political economy. With slave labor a chief element of the power of the ruling rebel classes of the Southern States has vanished. Not only has the slave been freed, but all labor in those States has risen from a position of degradation to one of honor, and therefore of power. An attempt will doubtless be made and persisted in on the part of those who have formerly monopolized profitability and power to retain so much of their feudal estate as the war seems to have left them; but this is only clinging to shadows. The new system gives to the laboring interest by its rehabilitation in the South will lead to the development of the many resources of the country, and to the establishment of commerce and manufactures on an extended scale. Gradually, but surely, the unambitious, indolent life of the laborer will reverse the passions of the wealthy planters, and there will rise to the political surface new men with new ideas of progress and give rise to their new interest. It is not in our present Congress that this great contest is to be determined, but in the Southern States themselves, and upon the very fields where the preliminary conflict of arms was fought that has made this second and more significant struggle possible.

With pen and pencil we shall follow this contest through its successive stages. For the present the elements are confused and but dimly revealed. It is like the rising of a new world from chaos. To us the late Slave States seem now almost like a newly-discovered country. For the first time we ask earnestly: What are their resources and opportunities? How has the great earthquake left them—with what marks of ruin upon their cities and fields —with what changes of a social and political character? We shall leave to our artists the task of answering these absorbing questions, but it is impossible to answer them by means of pictorial representations.

HOW MUCH SHALL WE PAY?

THE fact, so commonly observed, that some eat much less than others, and yet are equally well nourished, although performing an equal amount of both bodily and mental labor, seems to show that eating too much is a common fault. Perhaps we may say that in this country of plenty most of the well-conditioned eat too much, the question very often being, how much can the stomach and the system conveniently bear? But we would not have one go to the other extreme, and seek to know how little food the system can get along with, and be in comfortable condition. The true question is, how much does the system require to keep it in vigorous condition? And in deciding this every rational man will be governed mostly by the natural indications spoken of in a previous article. This obedience to instinct implies little thought; and the truth is that the less thought we have about the matter, provided it be properly settled, the better.

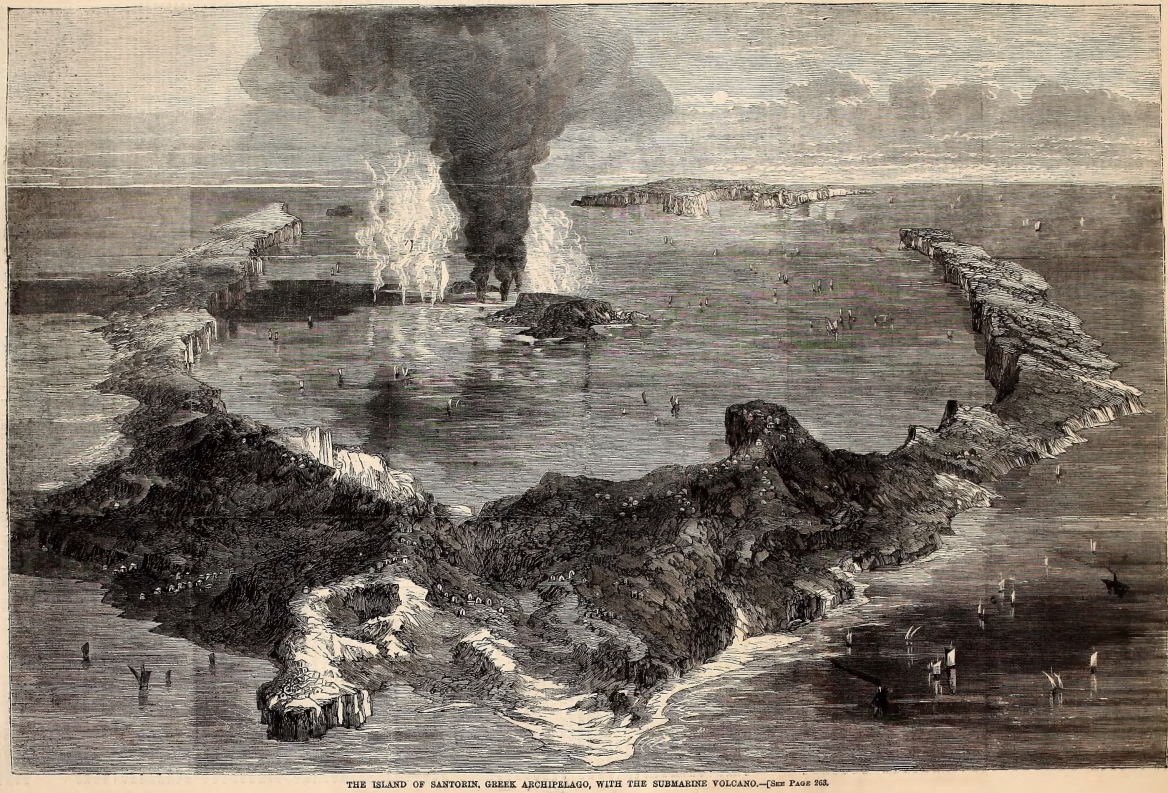
What, then, is the cause of the results of eating too much? These are seen both in the stomach itself and in the system at large. The stomach, however well it may habituate itself to do the extraordinary work put upon it, is gradually impaired in its powers, and therefore becomes liable to various derangements. The food removed for the time being by diminution of the work of the organ, assisted perhaps by some medicine. But the evil recurring sooner or later, it may be at length positive irremediable disease. If, as is perhaps more often the case, the stomach, though liable to frequent derangement, maintains tolerably well its vigor, results of a more or less marked character will be sooner or later apparent in the system. The will nevertheless appear in the system. The result may result in the supply of more material for growth and repair than is needed; that is, too much blood is made. There is, therefore, a plethoric state of the system. Various results come from this, according to concurring circumstances. The effect may be general, giving rise to obesity, or local in character. There is a certain tissue called cellular membrane, which acts every where as a sort of packing material, lying between other tissues, as between muscles, about organs, between streets of other tissues, and even between their fibres; and in those who take too much nutriment there is apt to be a deposit of this tissue, especially in some portions of the body, and the fat which is deposited in some localities in its cells is increased, sometimes very largely. Considerations of a local character may also induce enlargement, or hypertrophy, as it is called, of some organ, as the heart or liver. With the organ, or the organization—that is, local increase with partial detention of disease in the part to some extent; and with the slight or temporary, a frequent repetition will engender positive disease. With the general disturbance caused by repletion, the blood sometimes produced a degeneration of the structure of some organ, and of course an impairment of its function. There may be a fatty degeneration or change in the heart as to stop at length suddenly its action, and produce death. Very often there is a combination of disease in the various ways which we have had difficulties, or with the general derangement, all coming from the habitual overaction to which that organ is subjected. We have not the space to trace out all the results of overeating, but enough has been said to indicate in the general their nature and extent.

If now, on the other hand, too little food be taken the stomach does not perform the amount of labor for which it is naturally fitted. Not being adequately nourished, there is debility and deficient development. But besides there is depression occasioned by the lack of the stimulus of sufficient food. From all this there will arise various diseases of either a general or local character, or both combined. Positive feeding is a prolific source of disease in the abodes of poverty.

LITERARY.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S new book, "Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi and its Tributaries," published in a handsome volume by the HARPERS. The extraordinary popularity of the author's previous works is sufficient to secure to the present which its interest will justify. Of all the great African travelers of our time Dr. LIVINGSTONE chiefly displays a moral regard for the rights and religion which he sees. His story is not a dull diary, or a scientific catalogue, or a colorless narrative. It is always a delightful tale of adventure and discovery, but it is warm with the most generous humanity, and bright with the hues of a noble Christian aspiration. And there is little semblance for us in his observations and judgments upon the people themselves. The African race he considers to be of wonderful physical capability, and in constitution and temperament remarkably fortunate. But centuries of barbarism have degraded the African character. The cruelties that part of the Irish population to have been degraded which was driven back, generations ago, to the Irish Highlands and Islands. Nor does he hope for any serious improvement upon the African continent until the slave-trade of the tribes is abolished.

The sixth and last volume of CARLYLE'S "Frederick" is now published by the HARPERS. It is the completion of a work remarkable for research into the most vexatious and numerous documents and unparalleled for extraordinary analysis of narration. We have already spoken of the general scope and execution of the work; but while every "reader" will of course admire the style, the keen irony, its humor, its pathos, and its insight, he will also confess a secret pain that all this power and genius have been expended upon this subject. He will read it as the work of a master in English literature, but he will discover that even CARLYLE can not make a hero of FREDERICK the Great.



Another famous traveler, MR. BAYARD TAYLOR, is winning fresh laurels in a new field. His "Story of Kennett," just published by HURD & HOUGHTON, is the last in a long series of popular works, but none of them all is sure of a wider welcome or longer date. It is an interesting, characteristic, and delightful story. The scene is laid at the close of the war between Mexico, in and around Kennett Square, in Pennsylvania, close upon the Delaware line. It is the landscape in which the author was born. The traditions of the story were familiar to his boyhood, and in weaving them together in his book he offers a tender tribute to his home and its associations. The literary art with which the work is constructed is very striking. The characters are all active in the plot, and all the incidents move symmetrically to the end. The plot is stirring and exciting, but a soft air of rural remoteness and repose envelops the story like a tranquil atmosphere brooding over the splashed and sunburnt Kennett. The characters are strongly drawn, and the Quaker heroine is one of the truest women whom we have lately encountered in the realm of reader romances. Benjamin Thurston a little doubtful or unkindly, let him know Martha Deane, and he will learn

"How much shall a woman say be made?"

The work has evidently been a labor of love. The details are wrought with fidelity and skill, and "The Story of Kennett" is undeniably MR. TAYLOR'S best book.

The HARPERS have issued VICTOR HUGO'S new novel, the "Toilers of the Sea." It has the same peculiarities as "Les Misérables," without the discursive and baffling episodes of that book, and is full of extravagance and wild, exciting romance, and of that searching knowledge of human life which the author is famous. The tale is of the sea and shore, of love and crime, of the ideally best and the most commonplace. It is an absorbing and dramatic interest. Of course it is sensational, for it is VICTOR HUGO'S. The wonderful eye for situation, which was manifest in "Notre Dame" thirty years ago, is still as remarkable in the "Toilers of the Sea;" and the curious minuteness of knowledge, not always necessary, which was observable in "Les Misérables," is also here. To us there is no indication in it of failing fire in a talent never remarkable for the display of sobriety, and if the concluding scene is preposterous it is certainly powerful.

The April Number of the North American Review, published by TICKNOR & FIELDS, is in dimensions and in variety of contents a timely and valuable book. There is not an article in it which is not worthy of careful reading. The one which will be most widely read probably is MR. PARTON'S paper upon Journalism and the New York Herald. It is the most readable, trenchant, and thoughtful upon the whole, and with considerable modification, true. It is certainly a fine piece of criticism. The remarks upon newspapers are equally important, and it perfectly illustrates the spirit which it urges upon journalists. MR. PARTON'S paper upon Henry Clay, in the same number of the Review, was not so good that we are surprised it has not been more generally mentioned. The article upon Character is plainly the work of a man who is especially interesting as a clear and vigorous reply to the question so often asked, "What is his religious faith?" It has all the subtlety of thought and the exquisite felicity of phrase. CARLYLE'S genius and position are treated with severe insight by MR. LOWELL, and with a delicacy of thought and

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By George F. Harrington.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

TOM IS DEAD!

CHAPTER XVI.

"Weary? Yes, even unto death, but that is it. Yet, let us ride up to the Pines and spend a week or so with Paul up there. A plain, rough man is Paul, but a sincere and thoroughly sensible one. He lives in rude fashion, but will give us a hearty welcome. We will try to forget for a while there the very existence of Tim Lamum —we shall have to get a pass from him, by-the-by—Dr. Peel, Secession, and the Somerville Star."

It is Guy Brooks who makes the suggestion, to which Mr. Archer eagerly consents.

"I never was in better health in my life," he adds, standing erect as a grenadier, and slapping his hands upon his breast. "When I get fairly into my studies I take to them with keener zest than I ever did before—to get into them from Secession is the thing. If one could only get away for a while, off say among the Esquimaux, I could shout there 'Down with Davis!' till the blue icebergs rang again. Since, like the starling, I can't get out, I could roll myself up like a hedgehog and sleep for six months—such weariness, such intense anxiety, and for so long now."

"Ah, that is a weakness!" remonstrates the lawyer. "We are at our post, and must stand manfully there!" As if he himself did not require to be often rebuked by his friends—the rebels are so long, so very long in coming—for despondency and impatience.

"I know it; since I say it to myself several dozen times a day, but the flesh is weak; Country, Church of God, Civilization even, so suddenly swept from under one. Truth, Justice, Providence itself, gone. Only, all of it my own miserable lack of faith under trial. One will lapse a little when the weather is gloomy, when some special wickedness comes to mind, when Secession gains some great victory, when the North seems to halt, perhaps fail—who knows but here?—in its work, the greatest work, Guy Brooks, Esq.," adds Edward Arthur, boldly, "ever given a nation to do since the world began!"

And this is astounding language for even a Union man at the South to use at this period. I think it he may, perhaps, but say such a thing aloud? No. "If one," he continues, "was only where one could do any thing."

"You are doing something," placid Mrs. Sorel had said to him months before, when he had ventured a like remark to her over the supper-table. The truth is, one must have some one to unbosom one's self to, especially in periods of great trial, and by this time Mrs. Sorel had become to her guest as a mother.

Robby has left the table before this. They would not mind speaking before him, however, for he rarely goes to Somerville except on Sunday with his mother; and when he is there he has learned, from experience, to evade the attempts to draw information from him in regard to his friends—attempts which not only Mrs. Warner but even Dr. Ginnis and Brother Barker have not disdained to make. You can teach a child silence on a given topic sooner than you can teach him to read—try it. Besides, Mr. Arthur and Mrs. Sorel had thoroughly instructed Robby in the whole quarrel. No more devoted Union man in the world than Robby.

"If we only knew it," she had then replied, "we would see that the silent influences are ever the most powerful. What so powerful as light and heat, yet what so utterly without sound? You have quietly, but from the outset, occupied a position of solemn protest against the rebellion—sermon, prayers, conversation, very existence in Somerville, all an influence unswervingly against it."

"I have tried to urge in every way I could," Mr. Arthur then said, "the supremacy of Heaven in this matter, as in every thing else; that we are being chastised for some great and good end of God."

"That angry prayers are never heard, that trust in men is vain, that violence of party and feeling is unchristian. I have never said so before, nor would I now but to encourage you," adds quiet Mrs. Sorel; "but your very words to Mr. Barker all the time is an influence in Somerville for good."

"Could Christian men outside the South, at the North, in England say, know my course, I think it would meet their entire approval; I do think I would have the sympathy of the wisest and best of my generation. In any case," added Mr. Arthur, "I have the hearty approval of my own conscience, though deserted by so many who once esteemed me."

That is, he pursued the course he did because any other was simply impossible.

"I do not make my conscience a law to any other man living," he reasoned with Mrs. Sorel; "but neither can I make the conscience of any other a law to me. My own deliberate conviction I must follow, even though it leads me to 'a traitor's rope,' as Mrs. Warner says."

More than he knows it, too, is there growing up in him one great hope. For the hour she had first burst upon him in her mother's parlor a glowing school-girl, swinging her sun-bonnet in her hand by its long strings, he loved her. Always very foolish in him as it was, certainly, had grown up this absorbing affection. Now he be less that he rarely met her. He was a Union man; Mrs Bowles knew it, and was of opinions accordingly contrary: not for worlds, too, did Alice even, would he intrude unwelcome. When he did visit Mrs. Bowles, too genuinely a lady to allude to her own private affairs, even to one confined herself to Rutledge Bowles, whose letters few and far apart was the food of her mind and the fountain of her speech. Rutledge Bowles to Mrs. Bowles South Carolina incarnate, was very often in trouble in these days; his letters were full of it: eternally worrying about Secession right and left, east, west, south—almost, in time of peculiar injustice to him, north even, rather than admit it.

Mr. Arthur often met Alice when at her mother's, and one more, generally, of the war garments so perpetually demanded in the Somerville days. Since, like the starling, she could get no books—there were no magazines or new books now. He had a fancy that a blush tinged her white as their muslin when he met her one day as a teacher in the diminished Sabbath-school? Alas, poor human nature! his chief happiness in those Sabbath-school days was the Sabbath-school, even though mere sight and casual greeting was all.

Her mother never attended church now, for Mr. Arthur would not pray for the Confederacy. But the preacher was aware all the service through of one sweet face that did not draw down too far away toward the door. The solemn fact is, he selected his weekly text, and wrote every line of his sermon almost as much for her as if it had been a letter. Had not Alice become a communicant just before Secession? How much or how little through his means he never dared ask himself.

Long ago, if Secession had not come in, would he have learned his fate at her hands. Yet he believed—that is, he hoped—I mean, he felt assured— However, not for the present, visit. Perhaps when the end comes she will see how right I was all along—even her mother may. Not without terrible apprehension meantime of the young gentlemen in gray clothing and brass buttons who frequented Mrs. Bowles's hospitable parlor, rode with her, took her to parties. But if a man is not to be governed by his own intuition of the wisest, happiest course, what is left him to do? See her, his unwavering intuition is —wait. But it is for something considerably more to him than the re-establishment of the Union that he yearns in looking to the end. Besides, he says, if I was to learn certainly that I have no hope with her, still, in the attitude of a foe, I too great a blow to bear. Let the hope live, if only to sustain me through these dark days.

Perhaps it is as well he does not know of the letter Alice receives these days from her brother. Its soon after his ordeal before Tim Lamum—the first from the hand of that dynasty. Rutledge Bowles writes his sister that he has received a letter to the effect that she is being addressed by a Mr. Arthur, a Union man! Could it have been Mrs. Warner? Surely not Mr. Neely? For these are, both of them, too sharp not to know the kind of reception Mrs Bowles will write to his sister, with the effect upon her of that epistle.

He can conjecture the possibility of some such letter to her from her brother weeks after, however. He, too, is favored with one from the happy Carolinian. Such a letter that, after reading the first few lines, he refolds it, places it again in its envelope so redirected as to go back to its author, and drops it in the letter-box of the Post-office. This does not diminish the pride of his antipathy toward the one he loves most of all the world. Not without a medicinal virtue to him is that letter, a counter-irritant to the other inflammation of Secession.

And thus does, even on this fair young girl, the great question press heavier every day. No neutral ground between the old era and the new. One opinion or the other. And to the opinion you adopt must be given your whole heart also. The past is forever gone; and the future, choose!

But by a determined effort Edward Arthur throws every painful thought from him down upon the west wind, blowing full upon and past him, as he rides away from Somerville this August morning beside Guy Brooks, on their way to the Pines. Riding avowedly away from Secession, conversation, however, on all other topics droops and dies before they have got ten miles out from Somerville.

"One of my old clients that was that stopped me as we were mounting," said the lawyer at last. "He was telling me that he had escaped the ranks by working in a powder-mill. I told him he had better have gone into battle at once. At least a dozen of their trumpery powder-mills have blown up in this section. Villainous—"

"My dear boy," remonstrates his companion, "do let us forget Secession for a while. We must, or we shall lose our wits. If a cow gives a shake of her bell at night lying by the calfdot at Mrs. Sorel's, it wakes me instantly out of the deepest sleep to imagine it the Somerville bells over some great victory. I am perpetually fancying I hear the sound of distant cannon on the west wind. If I hear a shot-gun, I say that man has heard some news. The distant crowing of a rooster has been to me more than once the far-off yelling of somebody for victory. I am positively hesitant to open the Star; it is like opening a letter with a black seal. In fact, I never ask the news of my but a Union man, because I know he will break any disastrous tidings to me in the gentlest possible way." Mr. Arthur laughs as he says it. "I never knew," he adds, "so well before what the command mean to pray without ceasing. I never wake at night, never recur to the subject during the day, but it is with a prayer for the Union on my lips. You may laugh at me, but I never catch glimpse of a leading Secessionist, nor the louse, child, or dog of one reminding me of him; never see a swar-jooter on the walls; never see a Government wagon, postage stamp—any thing that reminds me of the great crime, but what theologians call ejaculatory prayer burns on my tongue for its swift and utter destruction."

"Yes, my Heaven speedily crush the rebellion and give us back law, order, civilization, society, country, religion, ourselves. With all my soul, Amen!" adds the lawyer, to such lengths of disloyalty has he arrived. "However, don't tell the Provost Marshal I said so."

And it is note-worthy the manner in which Union men risk their lives in each other's hands in these days. Meet a stranger casually in a store, fall in with a respectable traveler along the road, the one topic is introduced as soon as the salutations are over, and, almost from the first syllable on either side, by tone, manner, bearing—the subtle Freemasonry which causes people who feel alike—lovers included—to be aware of the fact, especially when they feel very deeply, in half an hour the stranger and yourself have mutually placed a life in each other's hands if you both be Union in sentiment. Because there is no longer neutrality. The guilt has so deepened and widened by this time between the two opinions that there can be henceforth no passing and repassing. If you and your chance acquaintance are not Secessionists now, both of you are to the centre of your souls the opposite to that, and opposite to that forever.

"That client of mine," adds the lawyer, "was telling me the various shifts to escape conscription. Some have gone to tanning, and the sort of leather produced is apt to see. Others have rushed into the making of salt, nitre, sulphur, shoe-pegs—any thing. Others are flying desperately around to get the required twenty scholars, to be exempted as teachers. One man, to my certain knowledge, exposes himself purposely to keep up a sufficient rheumatism. People suffer with remorse, neuralgia, and every other disease under heaven, to a degree unheard of. Many a man has suddenly proved to be many years older than his own wife ever imagined. I have heard of Campbellite congregations of late which have mutually ordained to the ministry every male member on their books—how true that is I don't say."

"What a mercy the comic will slip into even the most tragic!" puts in Mr. Arthur.

"There is that client of mine," continues Guy Brooks, "a poor, honest, hand-working man, with a wife in wretched health and a swarm of white-headed children. Jewet is his name—Silas Jewet—a fair specimen of really the most virtuous class in the country. All his life he has regarded Disunion with as much horror as a man can regard any thing which he considered impossible; Washington's Farewell Address, framed and glazed, is the only ornament there, hanging up against the wall of his cabin. A Democrat from his pine-wood cradle, idolizing Jackson for whipping the British at New Orleans, the United States Bank, and Nullification. This man wakes suddenly up to find Disunion a fact, and Jackson's alternative with South Carolina actually upon us. And he must leave bedridden wife and helpless children, a few rags of clothing, a little corn in the crib, a few pigs, perhaps an ox or two, their only supply, to be gone—he has no idea where nor for how long, and to fight for Disunion! No alternative but to leave all, shoulder, strip himself almost to the skin for the use of his suffering family, and march off in a cause he abhors. Silas Jewet fighting for Colonel Rex Roberts, Tim Lamum, Colonel Juggins, and the like, that they may retain their negroes, slaves which they have bought and sold in their own and folly in Secession!"

"And this going before board after board to be examined, displaying your hidden sores, concealed diseases, to move their pity and secure an exemption—testing slavery ourselves to the very dregs to see how we like it, as Ferguson says. And all this insolent triumphing over us of men, at least the most active and prominent among them, grog-shop politicians, bullies, and ruffians, the very sediment hitherto of society—" And the clergyman emphasizes his remark by stopping his words in full flow lest he should add what he ought not.

"The wounds around his house, Silas Jewet says," adds the lawyer, "swarm with runaway negroes. Twice they have broken in, while he was away, upon his helpless family and stripped the cabin of all the little food there was in it. I couldn't advise him to run the country; it will lose every stick of that little he has got if he could move his family even. The woods are full of runaway whites as it is, and starving. That we should be brought to this—we, and for what?"

"I tell you, Sir," says Mr. Arthur, more calmly, "at first I regarded the deadly principle of Secession as the great sin, the cause and source of our sufferings. Slavery I was born and raised with, and I never had any very definite idea in reference to it before. I have now. It is the accursed root of this accursed upas. Could it be extirpated by a stroke from heaven, and destroyed any other than a wrong thing have destroyed our country as it has? Slavery is a sin, Sir. The judgments of Heaven now on us are God's wrath against us, North and South, just for this great sin. And to think that in the Church of God itself this sin has its last and strongest citadel! God's great institution for putting down sin in the land itself the most active and powerful! It's gone by its establishment! What can Heaven's only instrumentality for good to a people is thus not only powerless for good, but is actually the most effective means in the land for the sin, no wonder He drops it as his instrumentality and draws the sword instead. And nothing less than God's awful judgments could open our eyes to the truth."

"So those two women in that field on your left?" asks Guy Brooks, interrupting his friend as they ride by a road-side cabin with its improvements. "I don't seem to notice them, but look at that ingrest one in the big yellow sunbonnet—one with the hoe. Any thing remarkable about her?"

"Not that I can see—why?"

"Well, nothing, only the one in the blue bonnet is Mrs. Hoss Hook, and the other is mine."

"Her sister, lately from Carolina. Yes; I stopped here to get a drink of water a few days ago. Mrs. Hook told me," says Mr. Arthur.

"You saw the sister—talked with her?" asked the lawyer, with a smile.

"Yes—why; she had just stepped out, Mrs. Hook said."

"Yes, and always has just stepped out, whenever calls. It's her husband, man!"

"Why, I asked after her husband," says astonished Mr. Arthur. "She told me he was a better from a some regiment, somewhere. Was shot in the leg, or something of the sort. I remember I tried to encourage her by telling she hoped so, but feared not. And that other woman—"

"Don't look back. Not five people besides them know of it. Dare say he is used to the women's clothes by this time. Delightful state of things, isn't it?"

And while the friends ride thoughtfully on let us in this connection turn for an instant to Colonel Jaggers's household, type and symbol of hundreds of thousands of households throughout the land.

"Wa'n't goin' on to their lot to interrupt them," had been Mrs. Jaggins's reasoning in regard to the Yankees. "Why can't they let my home?" If she don't like owning niggers, well jest let them not own them. Our havin' hands is none of their business."

And very naturally indeed had Mrs. Jaggins equipped Tom, when the war broke out, to go and help drive off the Yankee hordes. And the news came, months and months afterward, that Tom has been killed there in Virginia. Now Mrs. Jaggins is a mother; Tom was her son, her only son. And a very ordinary youth, gawky, freckled, stolid, was Tom Jugging; but to his mother he was all the world. When the fatal news came, calling back that disastrous afternoon from Somerville, after a dozen efforts to break the news to her at last taken out the paper and blotted letter from Henry Sorel, who was in the same company with him, and reads it out, breaking down at times times in the reading, Mrs. Jaggins's hands fall with the knitting in them into her lap with a first feeling of profound astonishment, that a thing had occurred that entertained in her mind for an instant. Then followes the burst of grief, till all the neighbors flock into the house from their cabins and field to know what is the calamity. It lasts in all its bitterness for weeks; loud weeping and wail is the theme of conversation with friends; silent, steady weeping, the tears rolling for hours down her cheek and splashing upon her knitting-work, during as she knits. Tom as a baby, Tom as a little boy, Tom at school, Tom a grown youth, Tom and now saw him leaving home to go to war.

But now a change is coming over Mrs. Jaggins which perplexes her husband wonderfully, smoking his cob-pipe on long afternoons while old age suddenly fallen upon him. With every body else, long before Tom's death, Mrs. Jaggins has come to know that the war is, in fact, a struggle for slavery. And since, as her grief loses, so to speak, its first personality, she is thinking the slavery question steadily over as she knits—no Tom to knit for now, but only from habit.

"You may say what you please," she remarks to Brother Barker, whose condolences are, somehow, singularly unacceptable to her, "but my Tom was more to me than all the bands se've got. I'd give up every black one se've got, God he knows my God too, to get Tom back to-day. Yes, every one of them, from old Cudgo, that waited at my mother's wedding, and can only tend the young turkeys, down to that last little thing born in Sukey's house last night. It's them this fight is about. In my 'pinion one white man like my Tom is worth all the niggers in the world. The Colonel there, he says a person's say it: I don't always said, for one, all my life what I think, I don't care who knows it, that if my body else thinks slavery is worth all the men bein' killed and all the other ruin brought upon us for it, I don't. As to what you say about the Bible bein' for it, so can we; they say about the Bible bein' for it, so can we; there's a right of things connected with it. Many a time ever since I could remember I've asked myself—However, no matter, that's neither here nor there. What it seems to me a curious sort of thing for God to be for. For our Jesus Christ, say, to be for. Or I wonder if Tom's death in makin' me kind o' unsettled in mind, this slavery 'pears so dif'rent. An' you believe it is—of course, sure as eternity. Well, I'll tell Brother Barker with such eyes, as her hands fall with the knitting in them into her lap, this even that Brother, request to reply, has seen a sensations up his spine as he does so.

For his wife's practical sense Colonel Jaggins has ever had the highest respect, and her remarks to him when they are lying side by side under the mosquito-net, or when he is smoking his big clumsy pipe, have opened a whole new train of thought in his mind. You see at the South we all took our the institution as a matter of course from our birth. But many thousands are smoking the same thing in their pipes now. Is slavery worth the ruin it has caused? Could any thing short of a thing actually had have produced such ruin? Up to that date, however, very rarely did the universal thinking and talk of the South get to the to you a result to be reached by other than much thinking, even though that thinking be quickened by swift-succeeding and tremendous events.

It was generally, though silently, agreed that it was not good idea Moses' God gave the people that sermon on the Exodus from Egypt. True, an anonymous admirer revealed it by note: he was hardly well-bred to discourse but Brother Barker suspected a trap, and he rages inwardly over it these days like a caged lion. For Mr. Arthur has come to feel that the Almighty is pledged against all wrong as it exists in the world, now as ever, and has used, is using, and will use all agencies and agencies for its overthrow.

"I confess I am uneasy in regard to Paul," Guy Brooks is remarking to his companion as they ride along, and after a lengthened silence. "I fear trouble is brewing up there in the Pines. There are many Union families living there. They have kept very quiet all this time, never expressing their opinions, at least except to each other, violating the law, studying as closely at home as possible about their business. As many as could have fled the State from conscription have done so, and those who remain they can go, unable to hear from or assist their families. For myself I don't want to go into the Union army, I don't know where. This is the main reason of my going up now," adds the lawyer—"my anxiety in reference to Paul."

"That accounts," said his companion, "for those three columns of abuse of the Governor in the last Number of the Sun Star. It is the most ferocious thing I have yet seen in the paper."

And it was. Mrs. Warner, who had fallen into the habit of reserving the strongest "documents" met with during the week for the day of unhappy husband at night, had accomplished two objects on the Doctor by the reading to him of that article, especially the long close of its verses, and convinced him that it was the production of a more frantic pen than that of a mean-souled Brother Barker.

It charged the objects of its rage with being Abolitionists banded into a conspiracy to murder and rob in the pay of the Washington Administration, and with having its leader as the avowed infidel who had recently disturbed a peaceful congregation gathered together for the worship of God by introducing his blasphemous atrocities. "More hereafter." The paper added, "That a single one of these miscreants should escape a long sleepless little credit to the undoubted loyalty of the country. These are no times for the regular processes of the law; but Lynch law, and that swift and just and speedy work upon them!"

"And Amen, say I," added Mrs. Warner in conclusion; "and I wonder, I wonder, Dr. Warner—sh, you needn't drop that head of yours, if you are one of this band of traitors, Abolitionists of them, for what I know; you are a Union man, and you know it!" Viler abuse than is intended by that epithet even Mrs. Warner can not use.

For the last half hour the travelers have ridden along in silence. Guy Brooks with his head declined in thought—thought evidently so deep and painful that his friend hesitates to break in upon it by a syllable.

"Mr. Arthur," says the lawyer at length, looking up at his companion with an expression of deepest anxiety, yet almost childlike supplication, "you are my spiritual guide, now what do you say? You know Lemuel has often urged upon me to go to the recruiting office as a Union man to be shot, as so many have been, from behind a tree; besides, they are sure, sooner or later, to force me into the ranks, even if I escape that. Now what ought a man to do? It isn't that my business is broken up, that so many of my old friends have become personal enemies, that I sacrifice every cent I have on earth by going, that if I am caught on the way my life will be taken. What I have is to desert the South, wrong as the South is. Then the idea of actually enlisting in the Federal army and systematically killing my own kin—I can't say that I see a man alone. I am not disobeying a law they have made, am doing nothing against their feelings. Then the idea of actually fighting for this thing, and I know they'll force me in at last. I have fifty hands down on my place! I don't believe in slavery! I don't say slavery is a sin or any thing of that sort, but as to fighting for it I can't, and I won't! And Abraham may be against me—I may—but I'm not going to fight for it or for the ruin of the South, which I know Secession to be. I have, I do believe, to struggle on, matters in the church getting worse every day. What do you say?"

The Kentucky lawyer has spoken with energy, turning in his saddle as he rides, and looking his friend full in the face. And it is not the first time the minister has been applied to for advice of the kind. Mothers and wives of members of his church, young men members also, had come to him: "What is my duty, Sir, as a Christian man in reference to escaping or enduring conscription—duty of escape?" I can, I will, I must!" Ah, how fervently had the pastor sought divine instruction in order to instruct others. What could he seek for more than light of Heaven in Scripture, prayer, and—Providence.

"It seems to me," he now said to his friend in conclusion, "that you should wait the plain indications of Providence. Don't act an instant before it is necessary. You could not. The light opens only as we advance into it. Wait. Let your hand lie in that of your Heavenly Father. He will make it to you as clear as it is possible for us to see at this time comes. "Wait on the Lord: be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thy heart; I say, wait, I say, on the Lord."

We all know the Ruler of all uses devils in all their degrees to accomplish His purposes—devils of ignorance, devils of fanatics, and those of yet in hell, as much as He does the angels in heaven, and those not yet arrived thither from earth. He will make it to you as clear as it is to things now are, it is of all His human instrumentalities the diabolical ones He most delights to use, in so much the most numerous—ay, and energetic.

But the travelers have by this time reached a creek which is the line of the house of Paul Brooks. It is a wild and barren spot. The road runs along through deep sand and under gloomy overhanging woods. The only sounds the sighing of the wind, the ever-living steady murmur, now rising, now falling, overhead, with a surge as of the sounding sea. Riding along in silence through the solitude, conversing in low tones, they come immediately, and by a sudden turn of the road, upon the creek, which, running for a time parallel to the road, now rushes, swollen by late rains and quite a torrent, across their way, rushes, foam-covered with the yellow sand, and cones of the pines swept away in its course through the forest. For some minutes past there has been the sound of falling trees, and they are now observe that, on the left of the road, and not a dozen yards off, the creek suddenly falls over the edge of a small circular excavation.

They say the hazel wand bends in the hand toward water flowing far underground. Certainly the feet are drawn by some strange attraction of the magnet. And whenever, you must have observed it, there be an object near you charged with that which is either within you to excess joy or sorrow, like or dislike, love or loathing, the very object itself would seem to exert a power upon you. Even the inanimate forms of the five channels by means of which objects of lesser interest flow in upon the mind.

Certain it is that the moment the same instant, and swayed by the same unaccountable influence, turn their horses and ride to the edge of the chasm. Terror! No fear eyes deceive them? The water has washed out a round pool from seven feet across, falling into it from the sands of the bank, and a fall of ten or fifteen feet, and now runs in the hole it has made round and round ere it finds outlet under the fallen log, and so down the slope. Runs slowly round and round, bearing upon its surface, half-discernible among the foam, leaves, grass, and other light matter,

Southern States of America. It would have been strange, indeed, if these two had not long since grown accustomed to men dying by violence. No event more familiar to them than that. Men falling dead from their horses by a bullet through them from behind as they ride along the highway; men called, by day or by night, to their door by a halloo from the front fence, and shot down at the feet of wife and children; men called in a "fair fight" to the streets after having come armed for months, the one aim of each being to kill his foe before he can get a shot at him; men killed accidentally, by-standers in a store or along the street, by some one of the bullets generally distributed plentifully when a fight among the setting of such "difficulty." In all their varieties such deaths had formed a large part of the practice of the lawyer, of the death-bed visitations of the minister. Pity if they had not got somewhat used to such things by this time. Murder? Nothing more thoroughly familiar to them than that. But in all their double experience, except in the case of a negro or two, and that for a mob, not one single murderer put to death by law for his crime.

Let only the truth be told. Not for money were men killed in the South, or very rarely at least before the war. Very rarely on account of seduction, that crime being almost unknown, whether or no the abundance and the perfect accessibility of females of a darker hue prevented the attempting of seduction who shall say? Anger from any one of ten thousand causes—anger in first flash, or anger cooled into the steel of revenge—lies in the great motive. But neither of these two had ever stood so near the hanging of a man before. They had often, of course, heard the hanging of Abolitionists and horse thieves, but for murderers there was only the jail, out of which they soon "broke;" by a particular process cases the Penitentiary from which a pardon sooner or later released them.

Not that law at the South was an inactive thing. The unsleeping vigor and vigilance of the law of the land in regard to negroes—slaves for instance—is ever upon the slave, and upon any one even suspected of entertaining doubts upon the institution, was at the call of the slave's idea. A strong grasp upon the murderer, the hold of an aged crone, toothless, blind, deaf, paralytic, palsied, were comparison too flattering to the law.

Years ago Edward Arthur, and ministers like him, had urged the Scriptures of God as the law of the land in regard to negroes, and for them, as for others, the certain judgments of God, too, upon the land. Even if slavery be a divine ordinance, insured the protection and care of the Lord over it, even, murder is not. He urged the sin and its certain national consequences as earnestly, fresh from the civilization of Scotland, as he had just arrived from the civilization of Edinburgh; and with what result?

"De Lord's a person, you're right; only nobody minds at last," said Bob Withers.

"For my part, Mr. Arthur, I really can not understand why you can not see that you can bring yourself to speak so of your own section!" And much more from Mrs. Warner, snuff stick in mouth, to the same effect.

It is a Southern hand writes this, a heart true in every fibre to the South present and to the Nineveh needed by the threat; if ever London needed, in its great plague and great fire, the exaction of the divine wrath upon its faults and sins, did the Scotch send the cornado of war rushing over it for its sins. "The earth was filled with violence." That is what the Scripture says in one age; and, without among its causes, this, too, it was which brought upon the South its deluge of fire and blood. Not that the slave was not a man, are, or ever, in the worst of Christendom; as much piety there, in proportion to the population—as much of many an excellence—as in any part of the world: certain virtues, even, as peculiar to and characteristic of the South as is the magnolia and jessamine to and of it; and these the less is all this true. They say that the percentage of illegitimate births is larger in Scotland than in any other part of Europe. For which Heaven's justice will be meted to it at last! It is one human nature every where, in the same weaknesses and with the same in each of us. "The whole world lieth in sin," but is of the South we happen now to speak.

During the few moments God's wrath has been gazing upon the superscription over his brother's grave, as true a superscription as ever was over the grave of, Hol Robbins, peering anxiously, then curiously with his small eyes at the lawyer from under the flapping brim of his old wool hat, has come upon another idea.

"Look here, Squire," he begins rapidly to say, "you are Squire Brooks, and I'm glad to say, 'you are' because of the lawyer's face has satisfied him of that, however, and with keen reference to the revolver in the brother's hand he proceeds excitedly—

"Look here, Squire, don't you go and believe one word I said about my not being a Union man——" And at this point Hol Robbins takes off his old hat, throws it on the ground, and with both his large hands above his head proceeds to such imprecations upon himself if he is a Secessionist, such a throwing his entire soul into the matter as to make his assertion more than double.

"An' I never knowed about it till next day, Squire," he says at last. "But if I had a-knowed what could I a done? One man, you know—only Catfish Robbins. S'pose they'd not a come by an' killed me, too, of I'd been any 'count? Dag's born, Squire, when I could a done soauthin'. What with hand work, fever an' ague, an' the whole country almost again in ye'r ague, an' the whole country almost again me, however, there's one thing I is do."

And turning toward the ruins of the cabin he proceeds with hands, arms, face, every fibre of his body as well as his tongue, to curse the murderers in such a lava of heart-felt execration as to bring down upon him the stern rebuke of the lawyer and minister even that moment of horror and hate.

Catfish Robbins lets falls his outstretched arm, and, ignoring the minister, looks at the brother with perplexity in all the lines of his yellow and withered face.

"Why you ain't no parson, Squire," he says at last; "any rate you ain't pioueer than God Almighty Himself, sir. He is a cussin' sich devils as them in the Bible, an' I'm a cussin' Yankee Secessionists a'most all of them devils were. Jest what a cotton-mouth moccasin in Lowes is to a chicken snake at Cheraw is Yankee Secessionist is to a Southern-born one—pis'nous! a-gnawin' an' a-gnawin' at the vitals after a Don't matter," he adds, brightening as the lawyer and minister turn to go, "I'm a cussin' them men all the time, say how, and keep my hand on the revolver at its top. Ye'll know when boy Hark here at it too. I'm a-cussin' of 'em, I first woke of a mornin', between the tails of my plow, koin' corn, eatin' dinner, dreamin' at night, under my breath when I'm among at night, under my breath when I'm among them sort of scoundrels—never stop. You couldn't a knowed this Paul Brooks as well as I'"

Meanwhile, in consequence of an order to that effect from the lawyer and with lively remembrance of his previous remarks and the lawyer's revolver, the negro has climbed the fatal tree with the agility of a monkey, obtained the paper, and given it to the lawyer, who reads it aloud fully as if it were a bank-note he places it securely in his breast-pocket.

"Now throw them with your axe," he adds to the negro. "Not that side, this side toward the cabin. That will do, thank you." His voice is the gentlest in the room and the negro both glance at him with surprise.

"Stay," he adds; "Robbins I thank you for your kindness to the child. I can't talk now. Another day, when God pleases, I certainly will repay you. Now go."

"Wait a moment, Squire," says Hol Robbins. "Not now, go!" says the lawyer, impatiently.

"About his property, you bein' the heir——"

"What of my property?"

"Oh, nothin', nothin' at all. What I was tryin' to say is, you bein' the heir, I reckon you'll be a-gettin' there was so much plunder burned up or tucken away by them devils. Fact is, there was almost nothin' left, an' I had to stripped himself, givin' first to one an' then to another till a'most nothin' was left. Parties of people whose husbands I'd shot in the wars, an' other families, too, whose men folks had run away to keep from goin' to the war. I sees he's got his blanket down at Widow Maxwell's only last week."

"Well, go now!"

"Hold on, Squire, you wouldn't mind a poor fellow havin' some of these yer old rails?" says Hol Robbins, coaxingly; "maulin' rails ain't no easy with me as it used to be, an' I'm sort a'gone—"

"Take any thing you wish of what is left on the place. Stop. Roll two or three large logs over this grave."

"Count of them hogs an' things. It was rather shallier, that is the hole."

But what consolation can the minister use as they ride off at last from the spot? He says no one deep in thought to yield attention. He ceases at last, and they ride along the way they came in silence. Old Negro casts, whose tattered weeds are hurrying on as if they had heard of what is in the gully below and are crowding there to see the sight, and which, in large front unwilling horses to the brink again, and sit gazing upon the murdered men circling round and round them. The sun, meanwhile, is at the same period, if not at the same instant, millions throughout the South are aware of men assembling in the Methodist, for like cause, here and there throughout all the Southern States. Millions! All men, women, children at the South are more or less cognizant of, and are thinking upon, like thoughts; beneath whatever outer bearing, thinking, thinking, thinking.

The solemn pines put their heads together far above the pool with incessant whispering, and bow to bear the tale to river, and so to the broad sea. And over all bends the great God so patient, knowing every thought and purpose, and by anger, and by the inherent force of their own nature, to their appointed end. Yes, thank God, no stone in the planet turns, no wave in the sea with motion more certain than that by which every Judas goes "to his own place."

The two friends ride on, not having their road before the silence is broken.

"You won't object to camping out with me to-night, Mr. Arthur?" says the lawyer, at last. "We've done it together before now on our hunting excursions. I know a place by the creek where I camped once with Paul a week while he was getting his cabin ready. I can not enter a house to-night—I could not endure it—so you will, I hope, besides, we've enough left of our lunch for supper and breakfast."

The night has fallen before they get on the spot where Paul's cabin secluded and grassy knoll under the pines. To dismount, tether their horses where they can graze, build a fire, and arrange themselves before it upon their saddle blankets, is the work of a few minutes.

"Thank you, I can not," said the latter, as the other companion pressed him to share in the food put up by Mrs. Sorel in lavish abundance for their journey. "Eat, and listen. We for their journey. "Eat, and listen. We may not meet again soon, and I've much to say. First, I want to tell you about Paul.

It is a long story, as Guy Brooks tells it, that night under the pines, in the light from the fire of logs upon his broad face as he speaks, revealing even a new expression altogether. Mr. Arthur is almost surprised at the calmness of his fri l. Guy and Paul were the two only children a Kentucky planter. The lawyer suggested long years when the trivial incidents of their boyish attachment to each other—like a boy again himself while he recalled them. The moments had been fleeting out a long, unfinished scheme, the brothers had sold the old place, bringing the negroes southward to their new home. Paul was beginning to understand Paul in reference to those negroes," said the lawyer. "Just before leaving Kentucky Paul had come to me. I am a professor too, as you know. Not as Paul was. We were very different. He had a hundred times my depth. I don't think it was his religion only. Our father was a good man, but our mother was an extraordinary woman for intelligence and piety. I remember her as if I saw her to-day. erect, beautiful, the finest-looking woman I ever saw in my life. Her eyes before her death she gave me in my life. Her eyes before her death she gave me in my life. Her eyes before her death she gave me

THE LOBBY OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AT WASHIN

GTON DURING THE PASSAGE OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

A BLUSH.

In a blush doth a tell-tale appear
That speaks to the eye, quite as plain
As language itself can convey to the ear,
Some tender confession of pleasure or pain;
What thoughts we should never impart,
What secrets we never should speak,
Are the flourish of truth in the heart
But one rise in a blush to the cheek.

As the blossom of spring on the bough
Is promise of fruits yet unseen,
So the color that mantles thy beauty just now
May be prophetic of hopes but yet green.
How vain is each delicate art
Of concealment, when nature would speak,
And the flourish of truth in the heart
Will arise in a blush to the cheek.

EM.

SHE had waited there all night. The three roads stretching their three ways before her were powdered with a light, dry snow, which the wind as it levelled and smoothed and tossed in her face. Over her the cold sky of the February night looked near and selfless. The tall pine might be landmarks or rendezvous. It was dead to the top, where some scraggy tufts which had sifted the snow cropped out.

Heaven knows how she dared stay, little, tired, scared, babyish thing that she daylight showed her. And more than that, Marston Goss was her only friend on whose wife might be keeping appointments with other men at any time, let alone in the dead night, out in the country in this gold-riddled county, and with one too. But if it had been with the Angel Gabriel it wouldn't have altered the matter in Colonel Goss's eyes, I suspect; and though it would, poor little Em had no thought of justifying herself by explanations; so it's hard to tell where the courage that kept her there came from.

She was not glad either to have the dull, tardy dawn break. The darkness had been terrible, but then it concealed her. And the mysterious chirping and crackling, which always begins in the woods with the first sense that the stillness, every stir tightening her nerves to the snapping point.

She tried to take her mind from the long-drawn meeting, waiting what she was thinking. Colonel Goss was likely to return any minute from his scouting excursion—to come by one of the very roads before her. She must be ready; or, what was but little better, some of the servants must presently discover her absence from home. She faced them both in a sort of dream, shrinking up as under her steadying herself with any sense of her innocence, but merely starting duly at probabilities and their results.

Uncle Ben, she recollected, was to vote wood that day. He would be along soon, and, like the rest of Colonel Goss's servants, severely beat her into him for cringing and crafty not to be glad of a spy's earnings. She started a step forward, fancying she had heard the old man's voice shouting his ox along with the rush of the crisp morning air.

Her head was tired and confused; all the freshness and color gone from her pretty face; her lips dry and grayish, and her violet eyes filled with reckless fright.

A bit of paper was crumpled in her feverish little hand: that she had not once let go of since the mulatto woman—who had come with some fowls and eggs and insisted upon seeing Mrs. Goss the afternoon before—had slipped it, upon some pretense or other, into her work-stand drawer. She smoothed it out now and read it over:

"I must see you, Em, to-night. Some time to-night by the old pine-tree at the cross-roads."

There was nothing more, and, for that matter, no need of more. She asked on explanation of Stephie. She was not afraid to do any thing in the world he told her to; and it would be worth a good deal worse than it could come through not to do him again. The very sight of the words he had scrawled made her feel braver. She straightened herself with a little pale determination—so much like the determination of a toy—stamped her twenty-two feet (twenty-two) was what they called her half the time, at home), folded her little hands tighter, and began searching the lengths of the three roads, taking them in order, beginning at the left: that was the shortest road, a single flight, and direct as it cut the red clay bank; next the old pike, connecting up with Virginia pikes do, and off to the right the new military road, planned by the slushed sake. Up and down their lengths, in the cold light coming, searching. Even the looking relieved the dreary thump-thump of the minutes through the dark.

Daylight broadened. Now and then her heart quivered and bounded at something she saw. When the something turned out to be a stump, or possibly a dog, her heart had to go to its place to be but sick again and keep still.

It got to be near seven o'clock. She was very tired. Even the strength of excitement was suspending itself, and a dreamy kind of delirium began to gain upon her. She was positive that the wheels of Uncle Ben's cart were coming along over the hard, rough ground, when it was nothing in the world but a snow-bird, she fancied her husband had suddenly come upon her, and all hope had screamed out with terror; then she wondered, childishly, what would be done to her if she were found out. She was nothing but a child any way. Not yet twenty, and married to a man who had lived his forty years like a Tartar kral upon his thousand acres, at the head of his hundred slaves; breathing submission like an atmosphere, gorging himself with despotic rule, and, naturally enough then, suspecting every one around him, even the little wife he had taken only two years before from west of the Kanawha, to be mistress of Marston Manor. She had wanted to love him; but he didn't understand that. Her trifling vexed him, and h.. showed it, and she was shy and timid, and went away from him to make beautiful pictures out of her simple past, and to live in them instead of in her present. Marston Goss understood this even less than the other. That was why he began to suspect her.

Covering there, close to the dead tree, sick with watching and disappointment and fright, she felt his eyes—stern, unmerciful eyes, whose looks grieved her soul. She was dizzy and it grew dark. She groped for something to hold by. Her limbs were yielding—sinking.

"Em!"

Ah! So sudden! It was not true! The blood rushed through her veins. Life came in hysteric gasps. She was hearing his step, hearing the blur of tears away that she could look into his eyes. He was her twin brother, you see, and they had been separated ever since her marriage.

"Oh, Stephie!"

"Darling! You have waited here alone?"

"It was nothing, Stephie," in short, choking tones, to assure him that there was no harm in what he had asked of her.

"You can't tell, Em, what I have suffered"—starting and stopping to look at her wan face. I got my message to you privately, for I didn't know but Marston might feel about—touching his uniform—about having a Federal soldier visiting his—wife." Stephie had to stop for a word for—and a look of inquiry, half expecting she would contradict him for her husband. He hadn't believed in his soul that any man would close his doors upon his wife's own brother.

She gave no sign, only a little shiver.

"After I got your message I unexpectedly met quite a force of them at the junction."

"Yes; he is there," she said.

"And there was nothing about dusk; but no one hurt"—seeking how anxious she looked, and not understanding. Then I was detained to carry some orders"—putting his hand into a breast pocket of importance upon his breast pocket, bulky with papers. "And twice after I'd started I was recalled, and the picquets white-flagged. Why, I thought I should die with impatience, little one. It's been the hardest night's service I've ever seen."

"It was nothing, Stephie," she repeated, faintly, very contentedly, clinging to him in happy dependence, taking his words in haughty, caring way, after all, for her little fears. "Not at all."

"Little kitten," he said, trying to strip his voice of the shock he felt at seeing her so changed as she was; anodized the white cheek with the finger of his great gauntleted hand—"to think how we twins hardly breathed apart till you were married, and then never to see one another for the whole years! Why, it wasn't the fair thing at all, baby" —making his voice gay to stop its quivering. "We never should have let you go—should we?"

She lay very quiet now in his arms, thriving by breaths on his fondling. She needed so to be loved —so much more than she ever suspected herself.

"You never can know how we've missed you, Em," he said.

"And then the war, Stephie"—in her pitying, complaining, little tones—"I could have gone back, you know, if I hadn't been afraid"—with such quiet submission—a whole volume of disappointment and longing clapsed in her half-complaint.

"Yes, he said, a little gloomily, turned from her for the moment by the thoughts her words roused—the weary old war-thoughts—"I think it was harder for him to take up arms against Marston's side—your husband—almost like you, yourself, Em—even than going against old Virginia!" —with considering tones and long words.

"Yes, Stephie." She didn't comprehend much about it in the main. She was too near for its proportions and perspective to be right. But depressed by the confusion of events; the corn growing green over the acres before her eyes one day—trampled and ruined the next; the dim blue hills bazed by cannon smoke, and then left clear; subtle sweeps of ground-guests, going as suddenly, their noiseless lines trailing on through the woods, winding through the pass—not much else, but there, that she could understand—and the fury of her husband's hate for the "other side," shown in bursts of rage or savage exultation—all filmed with a mute, smothering fear—these were what she meant when she said "the war."

Her arms were twisted about one of Stephie's, as big and strong as a bear's, her head cuddled, clinging to him as though she could detain the moments and him together; so happy, so very happy, just to lose herself, forget, to begin to think of all the things she meant to say.

And then?

She cried out, wrenching herself from him wildly; erect, her hood fallen back, letting her long hair loose to the wind; her lips parted, some quick flame of self-burning like itself out with the fear; her eyes full of horror. Stephie's hand was on the pistol in his belt. He sprang about, facing the way her eyes were fixed. And all that was good and perfect shot—he could feel the mad glitter of Marston Goss's face as it came to his leveled revolver, his black horse curbed, quivering, to his haunches; his hand and will paralyzed by his recognition of his wife, lying, as in the sharp, gray morning air, like moulded basalt.

She raised her hands slowly, mechanically, as a person unconscious, and put them up protectingly before her brother, never turning her eyes one moment from her husband; then slowly, with a mechanical intelligence, fell them upon Stephie's arm with the fierce strength of decision, with the impulse of a dumb, dominant will, toward where, near by, his horse was tied.

"Go!" she stammered.

He understood them, and regained himself.

"What—Em—to leave you in it?" with cool indignation.

"Don't you see? It is he. I am safe," she interrupted, in a still, frozen voice, her eyes never faltering, her form swaying—keeping unconscious—within the range of his vision.

"He would not harm me?" Stephie said, confident, and yet half-questioning.

Colonel Goss had given his horse the rein, and was coming toward them.

Em was powerless to explain, but she knew how they hunted their prey, how they never spared one. A hard hand seemed to have fastened around her throat. A hard hand only tell him what she had seen—the tattered rags of those half-cut coats that had swung from the trees; one last winter, this very month—almost to the night of Marston Manor! Spies, they had said. But she knew! If she could only tell him!

Colonel Goss did not fire yet. He was waiting to see.

Her voice came to her—harsh, dry, as though the very tongue was parching.

"He would, Stephie"—the name ending in a hysterical scream—"and"—pointing to the papers he carried—"and to-day's your own"—wildly, not the woman to be so stirred by any patriotic impulse, but snatching the argument whose thrust was the sure pitches of greenish grass. But it was all just as lonely as before. No sign of life—no sound. She knew that the sun was in the west, that the day would go soon. She went steadily to work to get out. The room was in a sort of tower with one narrow, mullioned window. She broke that away deliberately. Afterward she knotted the bedspreads, fastened one end in the room, the other about her waist. It seemed quite simple. She wondered, rather, that she had not done this at first. Then she poised herself on the window-ledge, waited for a minute, and, clinging as long as possible with her hands to the sill, dropped. The rope span about with her weight, and her head struck. She even grazed the bricks, and hung limp and helpless. In the end she was standing finally a foot or so from the ground, unable to loosen the knot about her waist, with a choking, suffocating sense, watching the whirling world grow black around her, spinning in a vortex of fragments, and sensible of dissolution.

"Little Em—!"

"Are you in Heaven too, Stephie?"—dreamily rather gladly.

"Open your eyes, darling"—his sobs choking him.

The waxy lids lifted heavily.

"Why, this is home!"—with babyish wonderment and self-pity—like the eyes wandering wearily from the white bed curtains over the blue chintz couches, the girl's books and toys and the rest.

He was on his brush before her, and she—those big, weak tears. The mother was crying softly, uncontrollably, and it was left for him to hurt.

"You have been very ill, dearie."

She thought for a minute; the tired lids dropping again, but with no agitation as the recollection of it all came back to her.

"Did Marston find me?" speaking quite slowly.

"I did, darling"—Stephie, then, hastily knowing how to tell her the rest.

"I was ill, he was away at the bridge"—pensively, with little interest.

"He was hurt there," Stephie said, holding his breath.

"Is he here now?" startled, opening her eyes a little, quickly.

"No, dear; he was hurt, I told you—badly hurt." She thought about it, with no emotion in her face.

"Oh yes. He is dead, I suppose."

Her apathy tore their hearts.

"That was why he didn't let me out," she added, with a faint touch of satisfaction in her tone.

They looked at one another, and thought she was wandering again.

"I was found about Marston," Stephie said, "I went to the General, and told him that you must be there alone, and all about it, and he gave me leave to go to you."

Her thoughts had gone back.

"Yes, it was a long time," she said, placidly.

"It was two days since Marston left me you"—breaking down, with great sobs—"my poor darling"—falling on his knees beside the bed, and burying his face.

"Little daughter must rest now," came the mother's voice, unsteady and full.

She had put the two pale hands and held them out, opening the hollow, tender eyes, saying in her little distant, pitying way.

"I'll go to sleep a little while, mother."

They held her hands with pressures of passionate agony, mother and brother; bushing their sobs, holding back their anguish, for her sake.

It was a little while—only a little while. The strength of strong enough to keep her. The sobs were not loud enough to rouse her. She did not wake up to them again.

Last summer I crossed the bridge that the rebels held, in spite of all, that night in February, 1863, and went on to the wood without encountering a picquet to Marston Manor. There is neither claimant nor heir to the house now. The trumpet flowers flaunt in their old Gothic window, and the wild rose grew above the desolation and decay.

The servants, whom Colonel Goss sent off to Lynchburg the day he left his wife a prisoner, had come back, neither invited nor hindered, and settled themselves deliberately upon the acres.

"And what do you'll let me have for the meal I wants for my little pone, off de ole place?" Uncle Ben said to us, in interrogative and rather uneasy accents, with a view to keeping on his knees upon his hoe.

"But, Uncle, don't you want something more than corn meal enough to keep you alive?" I asked, experimentally. "You are a free man now, and ought to be thinking of laying by something for old age."

"Ole age," with a stumpy chuckle, feeling of his grey poll. "Yes, I'se free man now, bress de Lord; an' I'se tired scuffin' around like a nigger. Might as well keep on scuffin' for ole massa. T'wan't easy, dat," with another low laugh.

"He was a hard master, then?" I asked.

He looked at me sharply, a little mistrustfully, Than, evidently relenting.

"He was, mass—t'are tru to yer soul," he said, with rather incomprehensible exultation.

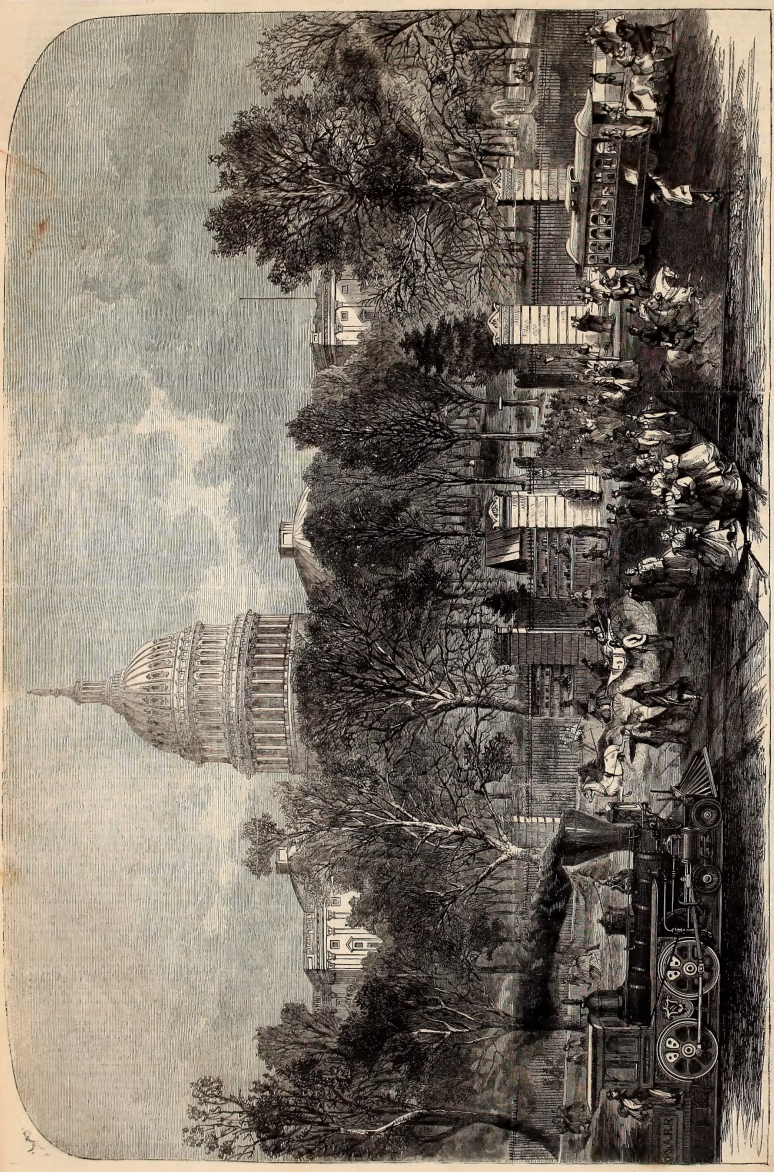
"But we want to see you feed folks take hold ambitiously in your new career," I persisted.

Uncle Bun straightened himself with dignity, a little affronted. I think he looked about him, at his patch of corn, row of collard sprouts, then down to his ragged trowsers, and off to his shanty, against which a thread-bare wash hung then conspicuously his savory sides. And, as though the picture might teach its own lesson, he resumed his hoeing in silence, working with after-thought and merely by way of manners, "Yes, ma'am, so we does!"

KRAUFT'S WORLD BEWITCHED.

MR. KRAUFT, coming home after business hours, was told that a young woman was waiting to see him in the library, and going in with emotions of disgust for a young woman capable of calling on him before dinner, recognized in his visitor Ellen Tree.

Miss Tree was twenty-four or thereabouts, and wore a faded black bonnet. She was not pretty, though she had all the possibilities of beauty, because you can't make rounded outlines, sparkle, ease, rose, and smiles out of constant anxiety and bread and black tea. She was lady-like; that is, would have been, if her gown had not been clumsily dyed, and skimped, and her shawl as shabby as her hat; and she was a friend of Mr. Kraut's, who instantly concluded that she came to ask some favor about rent or repairs, and as instantly decided to say that he only went to manage the people in Mr. Kraut's opinion; but as a rule, when you ask favors, you are depreciating; now Miss Tree was not depreciating, though she stammered a little as she commenced:



"Mr. Kraut, you are a man of wealth and influence—"

"Yes, yes," struck in Kraut, bluffly, and facing Miss Tree in a bleak, inauspicious way. "All very fine! but if I have what you say, I gave it to myself, mind you! I made my own way up from the bottom round, and never asked help of any one; and folks that don't get on don't go about wishing for help, in my opinion."

"Precisely why I apply to you," said Miss Tree, calmly. "Others may have been put on my way, I was certain that you could not help taking an interest in others who only ask the privilege of following your steps."

Mr. Kraut expanded a little.

"Hum! Miss Tree! I—hum—ha! well—hum—I certainly I have what you say, I gave for myself, mind you! I made my own way up from the bottom round, and never asked help of any

PARIS FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

ALTHOUGH the weather is still occasionally bitingly cold, and we are visited at times by frosts of a night, the Parisian modistes are determined to force the spring forward, spite of nature itself. The windows of their establishments, indeed, may be compared to so many parterres of spring flowers. Velvet bonnets are fast disappearing, and in place of them we have chapeaux of white crape and of rice and other fancy straws. A new shape just introduced, and one likely to become very popular, is a sort of compromise between the bonnet and the hat. It appears to be nothing more or less than a hat with a widish brim, compressed very much at the sides; in fact, a revival of the sui-disant pastoral headgear in which both Reynolds and Gainsborough occasionally decked out their aristocratic beauties, and which we see covering the heads of the shepherdesses of Boucher and Laugret. This new form of chapeau is made generally in white crape or the finer sorts of fancy straws. The usual trimming is a wreath of either clematis or jasmine blossoms and leaves, or a wreath formed of Michaelmas daisies, with occasionally a brilliant-costed bectin or two at one side. Those made of fancy straw are bordered with some light-colored velvet—blue seems to be the favorite tint—with strings to match, and trimmed with either a bunch of wheat-ears on one side or a wreath of ivy-leaves, intertwined among which is a chaine Benaiton, all being of the same material as the bonnet itself.

The Pamela bonnet, which the Empress has now taken up, and which she rechristened the "chapeau Lamballe," is becoming very much worn. The peculiarity of this bonnet is, that it fits close to the lower part of the face—clutches it, as it were—which has a very pretty effect on the countenance of a well-rounded, youthful beauty, to whose perfect oval face it forms a charming frame, but which hardly suits the taste of matured years who depend so much upon and who so sorely tax the modiste's art. The chapeau Lamballe, as worn at the present moment, has few ornaments about it, and rarely any feathers, except a little tuft or so. It is now being made in white or pale blue silk velvet in preference to white, which, perhaps, a rose or two both inside and out.

The robes Lamballe are in great request, more particularly for morning and walking dresses.

The chaise Rosalind, which took the Parisian world of fashion, as it were, by storm, still holds its sway, although it is quite certain that it will be impossible to adapt it, on account of its more or less heavy look, to the light and delicate fabrics which promise to become the mode during the ensuing spring. It will, no doubt, however, retain the bold if not modest as an auxiliary to the coiffure. Formed of pearls, or of amber, and interwined round the head, the hair being flowed behind with a shower of small rose-buds fallen over the neck, it has a most graceful appearance.

Coiffures, as at present worn, are generally raised a good deal above the forehead, with a multitude of small curls. The chignon is becoming abandoned among the haut monde, with whom nets are again the mode. The coiffure Persane is the way of nets is the "Coiffure Benoite," which is covered over with artificial curls made of the glossiest and finest hair, so all the various shades of the human hair, and which are occasionally powdered or dotted over with small gold stars.

Stockings of bright and sombre colors, ornamented with clocks at the sides, or of a white cross-bar pattern, have also been introduced. For evening dress stockings are of white silk, with clocks in gold or silver embroidery.

ANTOINE PROBST, THE DEARING MURDERER.

On Saturday, April 7, a murder of the most atrocious character was perpetrated by ANTOINE PROBST, whose portrait we give on this page. The Philadelphia Ledger of April 21 gives the following account:

The victims were CHRISTOPHER DEARING, a farmer, his wife, his daughter, SARAH, and his niece, a young woman about twenty-five years old. MR. DEARING occupied a farm on Oxford road, some distance from the Point-House Road, belonging to MR. THOMSON MITCHELL, of Public Ledger. He had lived there for seven years, and had been a resident of the neighborhood for twelve or fifteen years. Besides his own family he had a hired man living with him, a German, whose name none of the residents thereabouts could give; also a lad, called CORNELIUS, seventeen years old, who was bound to MR. DEARING, and had been with him seven or eight years.

The last seen of MR. DEARING alive was on Saturday last, when he came to the city on business, and called upon MR. MITCHELL, his landlord. After transacting his business he seems to have made a purchase of some meat, which was found in his wagon, and to have driven to his home with his niece, before reported to, who had been spending a few days at Burlington with some friends.

Since Saturday all has been quiet at the farm. The neighbors thought it strange that they did not see either the children or the adult members of the two family about, but to ascertain the motive for this unnatural quietude, was more than curiosity could satisfy. About two o'clock one of them, a friend of MR. DEARING, went to the farm-house, and found it sealed up. Prompted by curiosity, he raised one of the windows and entered. The shades were drawn, and for while the interior was not entirely in the dark, it was sufficiently dim to render one near him—looking for a time—powerless. The picture of a foul play. The barn and stables were open, and all in the former yielded, as if a man was ever to be seen entering from under a side of hay. The hay and a sweet removal, and was gone. The cattle were also fed and watered. Not only was the murdered family undisturbed, but that of his friend also. Both were in full dress, he having even left on his hat, and both had their heads neatly covered from their bodies.

The pockets of the gentleman had been turned inside out, and his body searched, as if for a double. The pockets of the ladies had been carried there on the bay table over them to prevent immediate discovery. The clothing of these bodies led to the belief that the mother and the children had met a similar fate, but this was not at once instituted for them. In their pockets, however, news of the murder, the murderer, and information had been conveyed to the Second District Police Station. From there, by telegraph, to the Central Station. Chief Engineer and Superintendent of Police, the scene of the tragedy, with High-Constable CLARK and several other detective officers. Coroner MARSHALL arrived on the form, but before he arrived the other bodies had been found in a cornfield adjoining. The father, mother and four children all lying together, and all, as MR. DEARING and those were, with their heads neatly and concealed under a pile of hay. The mother had, in addition, the top of her head crushed in. Another and more shocking sight was never seen than the mother and her murdered children after the bodies had been taken from the earth. One of the children was a mere babe, less than two years old. Whatever motive induced the murder could have thought, to have moved even the brutal murderer's heart to pity. The victims, with their ages, were as follows: CHRISTOPHER DEARING, 40 years; JULIA, his wife, 39 years; ELIZABETH DEARING, his niece, 25 years; JOHN DEARING, 8 years; THOMAS DEARING, 6 years; ANNA DEARING, 4 years; WILLIAM DEARING, 2 years.

The eldest child, WILLIAM DEARING, was spending a few days with his grandfather, JOHN DEVITT, in West Philadelphia. Had he been home there can not be a doubt but he would have shared the fate of the other members of the family.

The fact that two members of the household—PROBST, a hired man, and CORNELIUS—were missing directed suspicion toward them. It was not long, however, before CORNELIUS was found to have been murdered.

On the 12th PROBST was captured in West Market Street. The prisoner was searched, and two rings were found on his person, one of which is one of his pockets. This was afterward identified as one that had belonged to MRS. DEARING. Proof had also been one of DEARING's clothes. The confession made by the prisoner was to the following effect:

He said that he had only killed CORNELIUS, and that the DEARING family were murdered by a German. His accomplice's name was JOHN GANTNER. The agreement was that all were to be knocked in the head with an axe, and then their throats cut. GANTNER slept in the house with CORNELIUS on Saturday morning PROBST, according to agreement, got the boy near the hay-rick and killed him with his axe. In the mean time GANTNER was preparing for his bloody work. PROBST went to the house and told MR. DEARING that a man was at the barn and desired to see him. He got to him and show him what to do. She accordingly went, and was there murdered by GANTNER. The children, except the baby, were killed by one after the other to the barn, and there dispatched by GANTNER, after which he took the baby from the arms of its mother and killed it in the house.

At one o'clock on the same day MR. DEARING returned to his home, in company with his niece, and at this time GANTNER was in the house. MR. DEARING and his niece were killed on the spot, and their bodies carried to the barn.

The prisoner was then asked what he had done, freely to such of the officers of the prison as asked him questions, and, when dinner was served to him, he ate somewhat voraciously. He was formerly from Brooklyn. He is five feet eleven inches high, twenty-five or twenty-eight years of age, round shoulders, no whiskers, black hair, a short, thin, light mustache, inclined to curl at the ends, has a downcast look, and weighs 170 or 180 pounds. He is very reticent, and has a shuffling gait. He seems to be entirely destitute of feeling; and with the exception of fitting care and attention he might have been obtained with far less violence, no motive can be found sufficient to explain this wholesale massacre.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A POLITE acceptance of courteous attention in our public conveyances is the exception not the rule. Many individuals seem to fancy that because they are "ladies" they must receive every thing, and give nothing in way of politeness. The French, characteristically, have a most beautiful way of making themselves attractive. We by no means think that a gentleman is in duty bound to be jumping up to give his seat in the cars to ladies who, it may be, are not half so tired as himself. But where is the courtesy in a very pleasant one; and lookers-on can't help feeling indignant when a stolid lady coolly takes a seat which a well-dressed fair one without a word or look of thanks. Yet so commonly is this done that it is really refreshing occasionally to see another style of conduct.

The other day, as a young lady stepped into a crowded car a gentleman rose and offered his seat. "No, thank you," said the lady, "I am only going a few blocks." But the gentleman's gallantry increased, and on a second invitation she took the proffered seat with a pleasant recognition of the attention. But the original possessor of the seat evidently regarded her as an anomaly, and as he stood near her, apparently very contented to be so stand, he looked very much as if he was less obliged to the alternative of her acquaintance.

Not long since a lady entered a car so crowded that no attempt was made to give her a seat until, presently, a gentleman, rising to leave the car, offered her the seat he had occupied. Instead, however, of taking it herself, she turned kindly to a weary-looking miss who stood near her, holding a heavy boy, saying: "You take this seat, you have a child to hold." She remained standing, while the somewhat surprised girl took the seat. But with so much quiet grace was this little politeness offered that it was a real pleasure to witness it. We should like to have a similar pleasure oftener.

There is no lack of houses in the markets although May is coming on apace. Landlords, who fancied that they held the world—of New York city—between thumb and finger, have relaxed their grasp; and despite all their efforts there is a reasonable probability that the majority of our citizens will still have a roof to shelter them! Housekeepers are already taking the fevrishness and planning about the picking of their Lares and Penates, while they fervently wish the dread ordeal of moving were over.

Speaking of moving day reminds us of an item which appears in a recent English journal. It is this:

"We believe it is no longer a secret that the title of the poem on which, as we mentioned some weeks since, the Poet Laureate is at work, is 'The Death of Lucretius.'"

Whether we are to say that Lucretius should be any respectable person in regard to what Tennyson is actually writing. And we will relieve any anxiety our readers may feel about the matter by informing them to assurance that, "Apropos of expense," we have secured the "Author's notebook cheby" and are now prepared to furnish that work over wrong impression exists in regard to the title, is due merely to the circumstance that the poem refers to the death of Lucretius—from his house—touchingly alluded to in a ballad sung by MRS. LUCRETIUS, about ten o'clock on the evening of the First of May, as per following lines:

TO-MORROW'S THE FIRST OF MAY.
A MOVING BALLAD.
AIR—Jeannette and Jeannot.

You must wake and call me early, call me early, husband dear!
To-morrow 'll be the maddest time of all the round New-Year;
Of all the circle of the year this maddest, maddest day,
For to-morrow is the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

I sleep so sound all night, my dear, that I shall never wake,
If you do not call me loud, when the day begins to break;
But there are other things will break, I guess, besides the day,
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

There's many a fine house, they say, but there's none so bright as this;
Where we moved in there was but one—we pleated seven more.
The honey-suckle round the porch has woven its wary leaves,
And in the garden we have reared a bright array of flowers, I ween.
But though we've loved our home so well, we've got to move again;
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

Our carpets they must all come up, our pictures all come down;
Each room undergo the looking-glass, I'll wrap it in my gown.
The beds I'll leave for you to pack—be careful they're not jammed;
The chandelier may go by cart, the globes should go by hand.

Be sure and take the hammer round—I shall have need of it, dear!
Save all the paper you can find—and don't forget the cat.
Don't mix the pickles and preserves, nor throw the old broom away.
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

And oh! tell Bridget, husband, to be careful how she moves
The earthen-ware and crockery, and other things she loves.
And if upon the sidewalk you should hear a dreadful wail,
You'll know our china dinner-set has gone to eternal smash.

O course some common things will break, some costly ones perhaps,
But you can't expect to move, you know, without a few mishaps.
And when we've got the moving done you'll have none to blame but me,
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

The night winds come and go, my dear, along the vacant street,
And the happy stars above them do not seem to mean to cheat.
But to-morrow it will be sure to rain the whole of the livelong day;
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love—to-morrow's the First of May.

So you must wake and call me early—call me early, husband dear,
To-morrow 'll be the maddest time o. all the round New-Year;
To-morrow 'll be of all the year the maddest, maddest day,
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

During the recent strike of the car drivers in this city, one of our down-town lines was entirely deserted, and the comfort and confusion which the whole city suffered in consequence, and the duty of the railroad companies to guard against such strikes, remarked that, "Under no other government on the face of the earth would such conduct be permitted." This was in allusion to the business of the railroad company being conducted without sufficient regard to the convenience of the public. Consequently it was not so surprising that on one of those earlier days the Englishman, lately imported, who had come to New York to represent a London Character for a Fourth Avenue car was puzzled. Nor that, after some time, his patience being fairly exhausted, he broke forth, to be answered to a gentleman close by, "Well, by Jove, his tilt's busting. Why, 'ave you no 'acknes, hor 'acks, her hormit. Don't you know his Highland you can get by-where you like for 'alf a dollar, you know." Here he discovered that those around were laughing at him, and, with a look of scorn, he re-entered the hotel.

The public recognition of the New England Church of this city, which took place, with appropriate services, last week on Thursday evening, was an event of interest to many, as the crowded house testified. As there was hitherto been, in reality, but one Congregational Church in this city—the Broadway Tabernacle—the need of another is now long apparent. On the occasion referred to, the sermon, by Rev. H. W. Beecher, was characteristically full of rich thought and brilliancy. Rev. J. P. Thompson, of the Broadway Tabernacle, on behalf of the council of ministers, gave the "Right Hand of Fellowship" to the new church, with cordial assurances of sympathy and co-operation. Other clergymen took part in the exercises, which, being both by the composition and choir, was interspersed. Eighty-three individuals have become members of this new church. The church edifice, situated in Fifth-Street, near the Sixth Avenue, is neat and tasteful, though not pretending to appearance.

The Boston Medical Journal wisely says:

"People who would avoid or prevent cholera should cultivate equanimity, regularity of life and habits, cleanliness, sublunar exercise, temperance, and the avoidance of all excesses. When they have done their effort by providing for the care of the sick, alleying public panics, and making public nuisances, they may safely abandon their apprehensions."

Certainly no good ever results from excitement and agitation. There is great safety in equanimity, self-control, and judicious care. An exchange relates the following incident, from which we may, while we laugh over it, deduce a very important moral:

"A friend of ours, who has been unfortunate enough to be taken down with the typhoid, left his boarding-house very quickly and suddenly, as soon as the first symptoms of the disease began to manifest themselves, and took his quarters at the hospital. In order to allay the anxiety of his landlord as to his whereabouts, he sent him a note, stating that he 'entertained no personal hostility toward the house, but that he did not wish to associate with the boarders.'"

Fashion continues to change with an unchanging changeability," remarks some cynical observer. "This week the ladies are wearing their dolls' bonnets and cloaks, and the next they will wear their hair in dolls' hair and other folks' bonnets." It is suggested that it is not at all impossible that we may yet be failed to wear the fair hair to match the color of dress. Thus a lady in the morning may appear with dark brown hair, and in the afternoon have golden hair with her yellow silk! So when deep mourning was required the hair might be dyed black, and a streak or two of grey might easily be added where half-mourning was thought desirable. So also the fated lover might be told that—one-pink, or one-green hair would certainly be unique, and who knows but it would be a charming variety?

Not long since a lady was walking through one of the squares in London, with a long skirt trailing in the dust and dirt behind her. She grew impatient, stopped a gentlemen, one of whom observed, to the other, "I say, Jack, how much it requires a lady to hold up her skirts?" "Yes, and not be clean after all," replied the other.

Comment is unnecessary.

The following item occurs in one of the latest London journals:

THE FASHIONABLE COLOR.—Green dresses are very much in the fashion at present. Ladies will soon look like swans, and will probably be called upon to feed on grass. A stout Scotchman met Professor Maschka and Dr. Lorck, of Prague, who have analyzed a green dress worn at a ball in Vienna, and discovered that it contained no less than 5 oz. of arsenic.

There is an old saying that "Blessings brighten as they take their flight." This does not seem to be invariably correct, if the following anecdote be true:

A retired Scotchman was addressed by his sick wife: "Oh, John! I'm dying, and I'm going to leave you." "Please yourself, Betty, and then'll please me," returned John, with great equanimity. "I have been a good wife to you, John," persisted the dying woman. "Middlin', Betty, middlin'," responded the matter-of-fact husband.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.—No other preparation so exactly suits the various conditions of the human hair.

JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, Proprietors.

We clip the following from the Chicago Sunday Times of April 1:

UNITED STATES FREE CONCERT.—GIFTS OR ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND GREENBACKS.—The Philadelphia Tabernacle and house of MESSRS. WILDING, BRADFORD & CO. ought to be of themselves sufficient attractions to the public to call forth the rare inducements which they set forth to subscribers to their great Prize Concert, on May 26, in this city. It is a gratifying characteristic among those who have set high hopes on drawing the big prizes to cast suspicion against enterprises of this character, and the frauds have failed to strike the lucky numbers. But were all that had ever been given unreliable, they would not diminish one iota against the great responsibility and honor which heads and guides the United States Prize Concert. Besides this, the number of prizes to be distributed is so great that the average profit alone would accrue to these gentlemen after the gifts are fairly distributed, for not less than one hundred thousand dollars' worthwhich are to be awarded to the fortunate, including one gift of thirty thousand dollars, one of twenty thousand dollars, a number of fifteen thousand dollars, four thousand dollars, three thousand dollars, two thousand dollars, and other high figures—all cash and currency. In addition to this twenty-three houses and lots, worth each from six hundred dollars to eleven thousand dollars, will be awarded to the holders of successful numbers. Besides all this there will be one hundred and twenty-five thousand greenbacks, in fifty dollar greenbacks, given to a family costly libbe, making altogether one chance out of every four that a rich prize may be won.

The drawing will be done openly and above-board at Crosby's Opera-House, in the presence of thousands, and under the supervision of the Secretary of the Committee whose the audience itself will select. Order and fair dealing, under the circumstances, are unquestionable. All who become subscribers will be made independently rich by the gifts they will get, and the rest of those who will be unsuccessful themselves will receive hundreds and valuable gifts.

The number and undoubted character of the references of MESSRS. WILDING, BRADFORD & CO. give stability and reliability to their enterprise; and this prize concert is commended as a means of safe investment to those who desire an interest in any enterprise involving a small risk for the prospect of great gain. The proprietors refer also to donate to the LINCOLN and DOUGLAS monument fund two thousand dollars. Further particulars in a great famie two thousand dollars. Further particulars in a great famie may be found in an advertisement in another column.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.
It was early in the spring of 1855 that the Compound to be originated. No material of any family was enlisted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for some months previous brought that a preparation, having for its basis the inside bark of white pine, might be so compounded as to be very valuable in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in disease alluded to, I expended a small quantity of the Medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was astonishingly gratifying. While in two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a perfect cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N H., who had been much recommended to me on account of a severe cough, closed by a sudden cold, and had raised more streaked with blood, than could be accounted for by her nurse. She took about ten ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1855, I first advertised the White Pine Compound. WHITE PINE COMPOUND.
As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.
This good New England remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years use in the New England States where its wonderful virtues are well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diphtheria, bronchitis, croup, influenza, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, weak back and kidneys, and universally it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicines everywhere.

WHO SHALL DECIDE?

ONE remark in the testimony of Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS expresses exactly the absurdity and peril of the "Conservative" policy of reorganization. In reply to a direct question by Mr. BOUTWELL, Mr. STEPHENS said: "I do not think any of the States attempting to exercise it [the right of secession] thereby lost any of their rights under the Constitution as States when their people abandoned that attempt." In other words, when a State has drawn the sword against the Union and is vanquished, the moment she surrenders the sword the Union has lost the right to provide for its further security without consulting the State that is still sullen and sore with defeat. This doctrine is the very reverse of that adopted by the President in appointing Governors and prescribing conditions, and is opposed to the virtually unanimous resolution of the loyal citizens of the country. It nicely regards the war as a friendly tussle, an exciting little episode; and some of the pleasant party at table having failed in cutting their neighbors' throats, the company will now all be reseated, and the dinner go de lightfully on.

Happily there is a common sense in human affairs which prevents men from following any theory to their own destruction. If this doctrine of Mr. STEPHENS's were to be gravely accepted as the rule of reorganization, he and his friends, who frankly confess that their success as to the right of the rebellion remain unchanged, finding that the present was an unpropitious moment for putting that right into operation, would still have succeeded in obtaining some seventeen additional representatives in Congress. Representation is based upon population. A majority of the population in certain States is reckoned not by its actual number but by three-fifths of it. Mr. STEPHENS and his friends take up arms to secede. During the struggle the United States restores that population to its actual numbers. "Well," cry Mr. STEPHENS and his friends, finding that they are going to the wall, "half a loaf is better than no bread. We aimed at the moon and missed it, but we have shot an owl. We stood at five, and we struck at four. We do not get it this bout, but we have scored seven. Let us acquiesce." And he tranquilly proposes that eleven States, having failed to destroy the Union by a drawn war, shall be welcomed back to Congress with a largely-increased representation, and being there, shall help decide whether they will accept any other measures.

His argument is one that has been frequently urged, and which has an apparent finality very agreeable to a superficial view. "The war," says Mr. STEPHENS, "on the part of the United States was to prevent secession. It succeeded. Consequently secession was prevented. Consequently the States are all in the Union. Consequently they have equal rights, and Georgia has the same claim to representation that New York has. If the population of Georgia has increased during the war, thereby increasing our representation, that is our good luck, but it is none of your business. Show me in the Constitution the power to keep out Georgia."

That is adroit; it shows the practiced politician, but it is not the question. The question is not Georgia, but Union. The Union has been mortally imperiled by a conspiracy of which Georgia was a part. Georgia and the other Confederate States having been vanquished in the field, the question is what further is necessary to secure the Union. And that is a question upon which Georgia can claim no voice whatsoever. The authority which will have secured the Union against the arms of Georgia can alone rightfully determine when and how Georgia shall return to her rights in the Union. That power is no more verbally specified in the Constitution than the power to coerce States. It is in the nature of things. The Constitution is not a code of common sense, and the Government of the United States having been murderously assulted will determine, like every other Government, what is necessary to its security. Five years ago Mr. STEPHENS and his friends told us that the Constitution did not permit us to do any thing by force to prevent the attempt at secession. We differed, and by force we have prevented secession. Now Mr. STEPHENS and his friends inform us that the Constitution does not permit us to do any thing further. But do he and his friends suppose that they are in a situation to expound the Constitution of the United States to those who have just now successfully maintained it against both the theories and the arms of himself and his friends?

National necessity and the general welfare justified the war. They justified emancipation. They justified the appointment of military and provisional Governors. They justified the arbitrary military orders. They justified the imposing assent to emancipation and renunciation of the acts of secession upon the provisional conventions. They justify the present maintenance of martial law and the Freedmen's Bureau. They justify any other measure, not inconsistent with the plain and necessary intention of the Constitution, which may be deemed essential to the resumption by any late rebel State of her position in the Union. The necessity must of course be prudently estimated. The conditions must be wisely determined. Neither hostility nor ignorance are to taint them. History and human nature are to be carefully considered. But the right of the authority which prevented the eleven States from uniting with the Union to regulate the resumption of their relations in it is as unquestionable as the right of self-defense.

STRIKES.

THE strike of the car-drivers has ended, as strikes usually end, in the triumph of the employers. Yet the conduct of the strikers was, upon the whole, so moderate in their chief, so apparently just, that they were sustained by public sympathy.

The most striking fact in the case was the general willingness of the strikers to respect the equal rights of other workmen. A man has undoubtedly the right to say that he will not work for two dollars a day because those wages will not support his family. But he has no right to say that another man shall not take two dollars if he finds that they will support his family. So any number of men may combine and agree not to work for less than certain wages, but they are the worst of criminals who forcibly prevent a single man from working who is satisfied with less.

The difficulty with strikes, as with Trades' Unions generally, is, that they presuppose an essential hostility between capital and labor. But that hostility as such does not exist. A man, whether he have a hundred dollars or a million, naturally wishes to buy cheap and sell dear. A rich man buys his labor at the lowest price, as the poor man buys his bread and meat. The poor man is not hostile to the butcher because he prefers to buy his meat at a shilling for good meat, nor is the rich man hostile to the workman because he prefers to pay the lowest sum for which he can get the work he wants. Of course this parallel must not be pushed too far. Labor is merchandise, but it is something more. It is merchandise plus a soul. It is useless to treat it as merchandise out of political economy. It may be a disturbing and incalculable force, but it is none the less powerful because it is unwise to take it into account or allows for drift in his reckoning. We are not saying that some capitalists may not be hard upon some laborers—we are only denying that a man who has been successful must necessarily the enemy of him who has a hundred.

The important fact for strikers to consider is, that a strike, unless it be undertaken under the French revolution wax at bottom really a strike for higher wages or the means of living —is seldom successful. In England, for instance, where they are most frequent, LOUIS BLANC, who has carefully studied the matter and with the heartiest sympathy for workmen, says that for twenty-five years, from 1836 to 1861, scarcely any have been successful.

The great strike of the Preston factory operatives in England in 1854 is the most memorable upon record. They had a lot of work. They in that year and demanded ten per cent. increase of wages. It was refused. The operatives struck, and were supported by the funds of the Trades' Unions, their contributions being guided by an active committee. The employers announced that if the demand were not withdrawn the factories would be closed within a certain day. The day expired, and the factories were closed. Seventeen thousand operatives were out of work. Their sufferings were terrible. They had been accustomed only to earn twenty shillings a week received but four shillings from the general fund, which amounted to 150,000, or 200,000. They endured the strain with gloomy heroism for thirty-six weeks, but were finally forced to yield. The strike had cost the entire population a loss of £250,000, or a million and a quarter of dollars.

Why did the operatives yield? Simply because the employers could wait longer. And no strike was or can be managed by the workmen but a general overturn of society, which is always burning down your house to warm your feet.

So terrible a spectacle as the Preston strike, and the constant recurrence of the same effort however unsuccessful, as in the case of the stonemasons and bricklayers, who struck for nine hours instead of ten in June, 1861, and of the present tailors' workmen in London, has led thoughtful Englishmen to the conclusion that so much smoke means fire somewhere; and intelligent communities in Rochdale and Leeds have established co-operative societies upon the principle of a mutual understanding between producer, capital, and labor, which have already had the best results. And if in England, where the condition of the laborer is probably worse than in any other country, the idea of strikes as a means of securing any great benefit, it can hardly be more serviceable elsewhere.

In this country the solution of the difficulty is to be found in reason rather than in stopping work. If a body of men who are steady, responsible, efficient, and therefore valuable workmen, find that by the general increase of prices their wages are insufficient, and plainly and temperately state the case to intelligent employers, who are the great majority, we do not believe they would be made to suffer. But if they assume hostility, and act accordingly, nothing is more probable than that they will encounter hostility. For resistance to a request of higher wages usually proceeds from the conviction that to yield is to invite still larger demands. That feeling can be dissipated by frank and honorable conduct, and by the spirit of cooperation, which is the true secret of industrial harmony.

REFORM IN ENGLAND.

LORD GREY and his friends, who agitated England for electoral Reform in 1832, Richard COBDEN and his friends, who began to agitate for the Corn-Law Repeal in 1837, and JOHN BRIGHT with the party who now propose to agitate for Parliamentary reform in England, have been that class of true statesmen who perceive a condition of affairs which will lead to revolution if it is not changed; and who, therefore, before the peril is imminent, arouse the public mind that the catastrophe may be avoided altogether. They are all met by the same objection. They are told that the people do not demand a change, and that they are incendiaries who try to inflame dangerously the public mind. Their answer is always the same. They reply that the conditions of revolt are existing, although latent, and if they are not perceived by the public, that that is the very reason why the public should be made to see. Acting upon this principle which Machiavelli taught England the danger and the duty of the hour, and by organizing the popular demand they have compelled privileged classes to yield, and have so saved their country from tragical convulsion. Their wisdom lay in putting up lightning-rods in pleasant weather, and in not waiting until the hot air quivered with electricity.

In his late speech upon Mr. GLADSTONE's new Reform bill Mr. BRIGHT said that he regarded it as wholly unsatisfactory, but that the bill which he very plainly declares is a necessity of the times in England. That work is the constant enlarging of the suffrage. Pass the present bill, Mr. BRIGHT says, and Parliament will show that it sympathizes with the multitudes of the English people. The advice of those who urge Parliament to resist it he calls "the most revolutionary advice ever given in this House." And Mr. GLADSTONE, in replying to Mr. LOWE and Lord ROBERT GROSVENOR, who had asserted that the bill was framed to admit drunkards and brawlers and semi-savages to political power, said, with his old brilliant fervor, "I object to the whole tone in which these statistics as if we were ascertaining the numbers of an invading army. The people who will be admitted to the franchise are our fellow-subjects, our fellow-Christians, our own flesh and blood. Men lauded to the skies for their conduct—men who have borne destitution, starvation almost, with a patience which is a lesson to all."

Mr. BRIGHT's statements and Mr. GLADSTONE's are in the key of the position. "You have a population divorced almost entirely from the land and shut out by law from the possession of the franchise." To see that fact, and to appreciate the vital danger it involves, is the proof of his great political genius. To rely upon his profound conviction that the danger is real, and because it is real, personally comprehended, and to devote himself to arousing the people to perceive it, makes him a great popular leader. He marks exactly the difference between a follower or a trimmer and a statesman.

Mr. BRIGHT knows, as every close observer of human nature and student of history knows, that every country is safe so long as it moves constantly and regularly toward a wider distribution of intelligence, property, and political power. When those tend to concentration, when the land is falling into fewer hands and the political power to a smaller number—the country is being besieged. Mr. BRIGHT has read Roman history and French history with his mind as well as with his eyes. He has seen that although the early French revolution multiplied the number of land proprietors, and the days of July abolished the old Bourbon monarchy, yet the number of voters was still only about 900,000 out of 30,000,000 of people, so that LOUIS PHILIPPE's parliament was virtually of his own election; and deceiving himself by his own image, which he reproduced as the people of France, that MOLÉ found himself suddenly without a kingdom or a crown.

In England the tendency of the land is to fewer proprietors, of which, we believe, there are now about 36,000; and the voters of all kinds are but twelve hundred thousand in a population of 30,000,000; nor to counteract the consequences of this tendency is there any thing broader and more radical than individual qualification of suffrage, or the enlargement of political power. To that Mr. BRIGHT looks for more general education, which, in his judgment, is sure to follow. With greater general intelligence, and the self-respect which springs from the consciousness of an actual share in the state, the still further enlargement of political power, even with any necessary modification of the whole system of the country, becomes possible. Without some movement wisely and continuously developed which shall give the great multitude of the people some direct voice in the representation, Mr. BRIGHT unquestionably expects grave trouble.

The politics of England are watched with interest by many minds in our kindly disturbed States. Their own problems are in many points, and especially in this of suffrage, like those in England. We hope they will weigh the counsels of BRIGHT and GLADSTONE.

THE I. R.

THOSE honest Irishmen who comprehend the real sufferings of their country and would seriously help her, must be the most indignant of all the spectators of Fenian antics. It is not to be doubted that large sums have been subscribed for the pretended movement toward Irish independence, and the mass of those who give a generous part of their hard earnings to the fat Fenian treasury are unquestionably very earnest. They heartily hate England, and with the easy enthusiasm of their race they sincerely believe that they have subscribed to some formidable demonstration. If, however, those who have received the money are not quite so earnest, the urgency of the subscribers must be rather annoying. It must be appeased in some way, and nothing would be so valuable to the leaders as a valid excuse for deferring the blow. Has it occurred to those who have given their money that the demonstration upon the border are intended merely to provoke the United States Government to interfere, so that the leaders can turn to their subscribers and say—"There! you see the Government has interfered! We can do nothing now, of course. But patience, patience, patience. Wait carefully, watch closely, and you shall see what you shall see!"

So far as now appears that is the present scope of the effort to establish the I. R. in the State of Maine.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE SUFFRAGE.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON must not be held responsible for the follies spoken in his name. The vociferous orators who defend him, and in the same breath declare that this is a white man's government—meaning that no man of any other complexion should be allowed to vote—reckon without their host. The President is not of their opinion, if we may judge from his own words on many occasions. Let us refresh their memories.

In his famous speech to the colored people of Nashville, on the 24th of October, 1864, which was certainly not the least illustrious incident of his life, Mr. JOHNSON said, speaking of Tennessee: "Loyal men, whether white or black, shall claim control her destinies; and to them shall be given that which we enjoyed in past, I trust, I know, we shall have a better state of things, and shall all rejoice that honest labor reaps the fruit of its own industry, and that every man has a fair chance in the race of life."

In April, 1865, Mr. SUMNER, Mr. W. D. KELLEY, and Mr. SCHURZ, who, as Jews were very radical, were entirely satisfied with the opinions upon the question of suffrage which were expressed to them by President JOHNSON.

In May he told Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, that he should earnestly advocate the extension of suffrage to her colored citizens, if we were in Pennsylvania; but that he did, as President, he had a right to force it upon the late rebel States.

On the 15th of August, 1865, President JOHNSON suggested to Governor SHARKEY, of Mississippi, that he should persuade the Convention to "extend the elective franchise to all persons of color who can read the Constitution of the United States in English and write their names, and to all persons of color who own real estate valued at not less than $250 and pay taxes thereon.....This you can do with perfect safety."

On the 27th of September, 1865, President JOHNSON told Senator WILSON that the suffrage question was open for discussion within the party, and that he should not discriminate between its members on account of opinions they might express. Various gulais not settled by the Baltimore Convention.

On the 3d of October Major STEARNS made a memorandum of a conversation he had just had with the President, during which Mr. JOHNSON said: "My position here is different from what it would be if I were in Tennessee. There I should try to introduce negro suffrage gradually: first, those who had served in the army, those who could read and write, and perhaps a property qualification for others, say $200 or $250." This memorandum was submitted by Major STEARNS to the President, who returned it with this indorsement: "I have no time within communication and find it substantially correct. I have made some verbal alterations. A. J."

There is no reason whatever to suppose that President JOHNSON has changed his opinions upon this subject. And no man of common sense supposes that this large part of the population can be long disfranchised with safety. Differences of methods will prevail, but in an intelligent, free republican country there can be no question as to the right and necessity of impartial suffrage.

TAXATION AND REVENUE.

BEFORE these lines are read the House Committee of Ways and Means will probably have reported the amended Tax bill. The papers are full of the governmental economy of the changes which are to be made. But Washington correspondents, like HOMER, have been known to make mistakes, and we may as well defer criticism on the bill until it appears in authentic form. In the mean time there is no reason to question the published statement of the revenue for the fiscal year ending the 30th June next, which sets down the receipts of Government from customs, excise, and miscellaneous sources at $325,000,000; or the published estimate of the public revenue for the fiscal year 1866–7, which informs us that the income of the coming year will not be less than that of the current year.

These are substantial, suggestive facts. This country, it seems, with a population, including negroes, perhaps 3,000,000 more than that of Great Britain and Ireland, and 9,000,000 less than that of France, yields a revenue to Government fifty per cent. more than the public revenue of Great Britain, and of France. The British revenue has for some years averaged $350,000,000 per annum, and the revenue of France about the same sum. Our public revenue this year will not be less than half as much more. Thus, while inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland pay an average tax of $8.81 to the head, and inhabitants of France about $8 75 per head, inhabitants of the United States, including negroes, pay about $16 50 per head. This is pretty well for a country which but within three years was new to direct taxes, and of which it was confidently predicted by observers who were neither idiots nor traitors that the people would never submit to the exactions of the tax-gatherer.

The revenue, as we said, is not to be less in 1866–7 than it was in 1865–6. Yet the expenditure is declared positively to be reduced. In 1865–6 the expenditure will be found not to fall far short of $600,000,000. For 1866–7 the Secretary estimates are $385,000,000 and sound authorities predict that unless Congress throws money away the aggregate, including the interest on the public debt, will be within $450,000,000. This would leave a surplus of $250,000,000, to be applied, as many suppose, to the reduction of the principal of the public debt.

An important problem is suggested by this probable excess of revenue over expenditure. Is it just or politic for the present generation to undertake the payment of the national debt, and at the rate of nearly 10 per cent. per annum? On the one hand, it is urged that, as there is no better possible investment for an individual than the purchase of his own paper, so there can be no better use for the public funds than in the extinguishment of the public debt. And, further hand, as future generations will benefit at least as much as the present generation by the war for which the national debt was incurred, it seems but fair to many that they should bear their full share of the burden. Or, to put the proposition in another shape, it seems unfair that the present generation, which has contributed its full blood to a work that is to benefit its posterity as well as itself, should be further called upon to reduce, by the payment of heavy taxes, the pecuniary burden which naturally would devolve upon its successors. There can be no question but that the war of 1861–4, with the consequent prosperity of the country, will redound

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY & CO., WASHINGTON, D. C.]

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.

THERE are few public men in the country who have spoken so plainly, and whose political career has been so conspicuous, whose real position has yet been more misunderstood than that of Mr. STEPHENS. It was long the habit to regard him as a "national" man as opposed to the school of State sovereignty; while the plain fact of his whole career is that, while Mr. CALHOUN'S measures were not always approved by him, Mr. CALHOUN'S theory of the Government has never had a more consistent and determined supporter. Viewing the two great historical parties of the country as the Northern and the Southern, the Southern policy has been steadily defended by him, and with a thousand-fold more sagacity than by its sinister and more rhetorical chief. If the people of Georgia and of the late slave States had followed ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS rather than ROBERT TOOMBS and BENJAMIN and DAVIS, the war would have been deferred, but the character of our Government would have come much nearer destruction.

MR. STEPHENS was born in Taliaferro county, Georgia, on the 11th of February, 1812. He studied law and came to the bar in 1834. In 1836 he was elected to the Lower House of the Georgia Legislature, and in 1842 to the State Senate. In politics he was an ardent Whig, and in 1843 was elected to Congress, where he remained until 1859. In 1844 he supported HENRY CLAY for the Presidency, although he thought him too lukewarm upon the then great Southern measure of the annexation of Texas, and one of the first speeches MR. STEPHENS made in Congress was in favor of that measure. He was one of the authors of the resolutions for the annexation, which was peculiarly MR. CALHOUN'S measure, and intended by him to secure his election to the Presidency; and as it was necessary at that time for the Southern policy to acknowledge the right of Congress to legislate upon Slavery in the Territories, the Missouri Compromise was distinctly recognized in MR. STEPHENS'S resolutions. In 1847 MR. STEPHENS introduced resolutions upon the Mexican war which became the platform of the Whig party, and by committing it to the Southern policy finally destroyed that party. In 1850 MR. STEPHENS supported the compromises which included JAMES M. MASON'S foolish Fugitive Slave bill. In 1854, when the Southern policy required that Congress should no longer legislate upon Slavery in the Territories, MR. STEPHENS, as Chairman of the Territorial Committee in the House, was the chief supporter of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. He blew hot or cold for "the South" as occasion required. The Whig party disappeared. The Supreme Court declared the Southern policy to be Constitutional; and at the close of the 35th Congress, in 1859, MR. STEPHENS declined to be longer a candidate.

Upon his retirement he spoke, in June, 1859, at Augusta. He reviewed the political movements of the twenty-three years—nearly a quarter of a century—during which he had been in political life, and declared that "we"—meaning "the South"—had gained the victory in every agitation. "There is not now," he said, "a spot of the public territory of the United States over which the national flag floats where slavery is excluded by law of Congress: and the highest tribunal of the land has decided that Congress has no power to pass such a law, nor to grant such power to a Territorial legislature.... Wherever climate and soil suit there slavery can and will go to the extent of population." He cautiously favored the acquisition of Cuba, and plainly but indirectly advised the reopening of the slave-trade. As for the main question of Southern policy, that of slavery itself, he confessed that "the leading public men of the South, in the early history, were all against it." But he said that it was a question "which they did not, and perhaps could not, thoroughly understand." The most commanding lights of religion and science had now shown that not to sustain human slavery upon religious grounds was "to reverse the decrees of the Almighty." This great truth having been accepted by the American people, and solemnly proclaimed by the Supreme Court, Mr. STEPHENS contended that he might safely cease from his labors. The country would now advance to a still more shining prosperity. But that no one should misunderstand his orthodoxy upon the one cardinal point of devotion to "the South" he said that, as matters stood, he saw "no cause of danger either to the Union or Southern security in it." The former has always been with me, and ought to be with you, and dominate in the latter."

In the Presidential election of 1860 Mr. STEPHENS supported Mr. DOUGLAS and HERSCHEL V. JOHNSON, because he was sure that the Southern policy would be safer under them than with the probable extravagance of BRECKENRIDGE and LANE. Upon the election of Mr. LINCOLN he was openly opposed to secession for reasons which he stated in a speech before the Georgia Legislature at Milledgeville on the 14th of November, 1860, in reply to an appeal of Mr. TOOMBS for secession on the previous evening. This speech was much quoted at the time in the North as an indication of Union feeling. But it was simply an argument against the policy of secession; the right was never denied by Mr. STEPHENS, nor, indeed, is it, that the Milledgeville speech states simply the value to "the South" of a Union which it then orthodoxly upheld. The election of Mr. LINCOLN, Mr. STEPHENS said, did not remove it from Southern control. The Senate and the House were opposed to him. If the new President and his party should attempt to do any thing which Georgia considered to be unconstitutional, let her secede. He was first for his State, and next for the country, and he merely objected to secession as unnecessary so long as the Union remained as it then was, under Southern domination. This was Mr. STEPHENS's "Union" speech upon the eve of the war.

When, as probably he foresaw, the counsel of the immediate secessionists prevailed, Mr. STEPHENS was at once elected Provisional Vice-President of the "Confederate States of America," first, to organize and secure the Georgia party which agreed with him; and second, because there was no doubt of his entire devotion to the cause as against the country. This was on the 9th of February, 1861. On the 21st of March he spoke at Savannah. He repeated in almost the same words the philosophy of the speech at Augusta in 1859. He announced that the "old Union" was based upon liberty and equal rights, which was "a sandy foundation," he added, "Our new government is the first in the history of the world based upon this great physical, philosophical, and moral truth" that slavery is the "natural and moral condition" of the African race. This is "the corner-stone" of the new system. Mr. STEPHENS neither conceded nor repudiated in this speech any of his well-known views. It was entirely harmonious with his whole career.

During the war he was not conspicuous. He seldom presided in the Richmond Senate, and he twice essayed to aid mediation by some kind of negotiation. He probably did not change his opinion that the attempt at secession was a mistake, and events, of course, must only have confirmed his conviction. From May to October of last year Mr. STEPHENS was a state prisoner at Fort Warren. He was then released upon parole, and, returning to Georgia, secured his election as United States Senator. On the 22d of February, 1866, he made a speech to the Legislature recommending acquiescence in the situation, and such legislation as would secure a chance to the freedmen. But still holding to the right of secession, he also believes that every State which has tried to secede and failed is now entitled without delay or condition to resume the exercise of every other right in the Union —a doctrine which grows naturally out of the old Southern view of the government, and which we have considered in our editorial columns.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XVII.

"O HAPPY day!—O glorious and blessed day! —O day for us to celebrate with joyful hearts as long as we live here and throughout all eternity! No room for hesitation now. Many a time you have laughed at your humble speaker—said, 'Don't be too fast, Brother Barker'—hah! was it not right? From the first whisper of the great News I believed it all, every syllable. Shame upon you who held back, who wanted confirmation, as you call it. There was your sin. Men standing high like among us, too—like the lord on whose hand the king leaned that our text— Second Kings, seventh—speaks about. You would despise me, but you can't take from me my faith. You hesitated. You said, Louisville taken? May be so. Cincinnati captured? Perhaps; only there's a good many people living in that town, always to bring more, and the like. But Washington captured? you asked. Don't know about that. You all believed about the second battle of Manassas which went before all this glorious success; you hemmed and hawed about the rest. Only let me have the humble satisfaction of telling you all to witness this day that I believed it all from the first—news and victory of Manassas, capture simultaneously thereafter of Louisville, Cincinnati, Washington —yes, and of Philadelphia and New York City, too, which will soon follow. Is it because I believe in our glorious Davis and Lee and Stonewall Jackson and our gallant army? Not one bit of it. What I believe in is God. From the first I have said, Brethren, here's the only ground to stand on. This whole war is a war for slavery. God teaches plainly in His Word slavery is a divine ordinance. In all the world we are His peculiar people, being the only people on earth who believe in the institution as such. An infidel North, an infidel world against us, but God for us! You have trembled and said, 'Oh, the North is so populous, so rich, so united, so determined—the North is so this, and the North is so that.' All I said is this, Very good, if the North is God and a million infidel more so, what do I care? The God of the Bible is for us. But the whole civilized world is against us. Who cares if all the kings in hell, too? If God be for us, who can be against us? I, all the brethren in our denomination, almost the entire number of every denomination, have said the same here at the South—if you would only believe it when you hear it. There in that ninth verse—We do not well: this day is a day of good tidings; and we hold our peace;' what the lepers said to one another. As I said in taking that text, this being a day of good tidings, I don't intend to hold my peace!"

And Brother Barker did not. It was on Sunday morning in his pulpit in Somerville, to his church crowded to its utmost capacity. For a week the news he specifies has been pouring in, increasing in magnitude and being more fully confirmed every mail. Some rejoicings had taken place from its very first arrival; but last night the news was so entirely confirmed that even the most prudent Secessionist in Somerville abandoned any doubts as to its authenticity. Hurrahing until hopeless hoarseness, bonfires, fireworks from cannon down to the feeblest pistol, bells from the big bell of the Brick Church down to the weakest tea-bell in the hands of baby assisted to hold and shake it! Shaking of hands till exhaustion. Somerville has rejoiced before, but Somerville outdoes Somerville this time. Very properly, the news being by far the most glorious ever received.

Around Mr. Ferguson, sitting grimly aloft in his room, Somerville sweeps and roars like a maelstrom, all the country around sucked into the vortex of rejoicing. Like a hunted lion in his brushy lair, the Scotchman broods in defiant storm behind his grizzly beard. His only care is to secure each and every dispatch or other printed fragment in relation to the news as it appears, and before it can be whelmed in the torrent of later and fresher tidings, give it a permanent place in his scrap-book according to its exact date and sequence. It is a very Daniel Lambert of volumes. No easy matter to handle it now, as it lies on a table in the Scotchman's room devoted expressly to it; and it is growing rapidly in these days. Mr. Ferguson has no children, not even a cat, and this is his pet. Mr. Ferguson has no visitors beyond Dr. Warner, Guy Brooks before he left, Mr. Arthur, and one or two more; his business is destroyed, for the present; the collection is at once his only business and recreation.

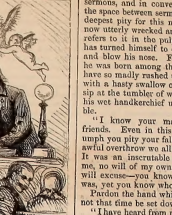
Yes, on this Sunday morning, while Mr. Arthur is preaching the old, obsolete, utterly uninteresting Gospel to quite a small congregation, both he and they none the brighter from a night from which sleep had been routed by the bells—at the same hour Brother Barker actually outdoes and altogether eclipses the Brother Barker of any previous occasion. No wonder. Is not the North now finally defeated? The war is over, at last Barker very justly remarks in his sermon. Washington being captured, there is no longer any Northern Government existing to fight. With tears in his eyes he confesses in sermons, and in conversation which fills up all the space between sermons, to a feeling even of deepest pity for this misguided and infidel but now utterly wrecked and ruined people. As he refers to it in the pulpit he has broken down, has turned himself to one side to wipe his eyes and blow his nose. Friends must excuse him, he was born among that infatuated people who have so madly rushed upon their ruin; and so, with a hasty swallow or two and a twenty-fifth sip at the tumbler of water beside him, he tucks his wet handkerchief under the edge of the Bible.

"I know your magnanimous souls, dear friends. Even in this hour of your final triumph you pity your fallen foe. In view of their awful condition you all feel to sorrow over them. It was an inscrutable Providence that caused me, no will of my own, to be born there. You will excuse—you know how wicked Jerusalem was, yet you know who wept over it!"

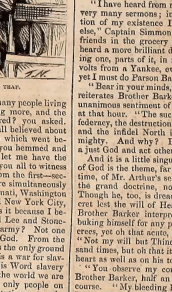
Pardon the hand which records this, but shall not that time be set down as it actually was?

"I have heard from my earliest infancy many, very many sermons; in fact, in the earlier portion of my existence I never heard any thing else," Captain Simmons remarks to a group of friends in the grocery next day, "but I never heard a more brilliant discourse—a more effecting one, parts of it, in my life. My nature revolts from a Yankee, even when a Secessionist, yet I must do Parson Barker justice to say that."

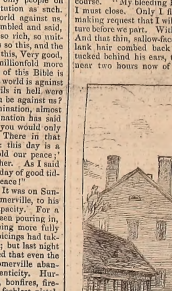
"Hear in your minds, friends, this one thing," reiterates Brother Barker, speaking the almost unanimous sentiment of his denomination South at that hour. "The success of our glorious Confederacy, the destruction of the old United States and the infidel North is the doing of the Almighty. And why? Because he could not be a just God and act otherwise."



And it is a little singular that the sovereignty of God is the theme, far from the first or the last time, of Mr. Arthur's sermon at the same hour, the grand doctrine, not the same inference. Though he, too, is dreading this morning in secret lest the will of Heaven may be at last as Brother Barker interprets it—dreading it, rebuking himself for any pain at what Heaven decrees, yet oh that acrid, bitter, sickening fear! "Not my will but Thine!" he repeats a thousand times, but oh that it would throb in his very heart as well as on his tongue!

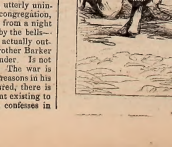


"You observe my condition, friends," says Brother Barker, half an hour later in his discourse. "My bleeding lungs will not permit—I must close. Only I find on the desk a note making request that I will explain a little Scripture before we part. With pleasure will I do so." And that thin, sallow-faced fellow-creature—his dark hair combed back off his forehead and tucked behind his ears, the centre and seat for queer two hours now of that crowded church, enjoys, as he leans forward over his cushion, note in hand, a degree of self-satisfaction intense beyond the ordinary allotment of the rest of us.



"I find here," he says, "some questions to answer. I have had no time to examine them. Dear is general knowledge of this blessed Book is sufficient. First, 'What does prophesy mean by the stars of heaven?' An easy question to answer," with a smile: "as I have often told you, by the stars of heaven are meant in prophecy governments, particularly the States which once composed this Union. 'Second, Has prophesy a meaning when it speaks of a third part of the stars of heaven?' Whoever wrote this note could hardly have attended the preaching of your most humble. I've explained it often in the Sunday-school. The smallest child there could tell you on the reference to our Confederate States: thirty-three States at the time of Secession; eleven seceded States. Yes, if there be, as I've often explained, any thing certain, positively certain, in Scripture," says the preacher, slowly, "it is that by a third part of the stars of heaven is meant these Confederate States of America. Very good. 'Third, When Scripture speaks of the great Red Dragon what is meant?' Really, friends," says Brother Barker, smiling, "these questions are too simple: I'm wasting your time. By the Dragon is meant, of course, the Devil, the Adversary, Satan. He is called great because of his terrible power over men. He is called red—the great red Dragon—to show that he burns like fire with fury, and because he accomplishes his dreadful purposes against men very often by bloodshed and war. A last question: Please say, then, what is meant by Revelation, twelfth chapter, third and fourth verses.' Revelation, twelfth, third—twelfth, third." Brother Barker has his long forefinger on the place in an instant, and reads, without a pause: "'And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads.' All this emblematic," the preacher pauses here to say, "of the devil's terrible power over men; but let us go on: 'And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth—'"

Total silence in the vast audience. Then a perfectly distinct "by George!" from the direction in which Bob Withers is seated, with a tittering among the younger people, first Brother Barker's aspect of sudden and total discomfiture, swelling as the meaning of this most unexpected Scripture breaks upon them according to the explanation yet ringing in their ears! The whole congregation at last catches the joke, and join in. The thing comes upon it so suddenly. The reaction of feeling also. The symptom of a crowd of laughers likewise.



Brother Barker has closed the Bible, very sal-

"YOU BLACK-HEARTED ABOLITIONIST!"

low-lindead, and leans himself over the desk with deprecating hand for some time before he can make himself heard.

"Brethren," he begins, at last, in his most solemn tones, "an enemy hath done—" But the congregation has at this instant a fresh sense of the joke, and go off together in another peal of laughter, as audiences sometimes will, as much at Brother Barker himself, the victim, as at the sacred Scripture.

"An enemy, an enemy hath done this," he says at last, "since before, in my humble belief, in the cause of the South and the God of the South, an enemy attempted to wrest Scripture to his own account the same way. I forestalled him, and told friends he wrested Scripture to his own destruction. You have all heard the fate, the just fate, of the traitor who slid in the double revelation of God on him as a traitor both to his country and to his Bible. Like Uzzah, he laid his hand on the Ark of the Lord, and, like Uzzah, he perished for his sin."

But there is laughter breaking forth yet, here and there, among the most thoughtless. Brother Barker grows more livid, his hair seems blacker, his eyes like those of a serpent, his head projected nearer his audience, his long arm shaking a prophetic finger at them.

"I have spoken of the fate of that miserable man's body," he adds; "but what of his immortal soul gone to the Judgment? I tell you, friends, disloyalty to the Confederacy is a sin against God, a great sin. He will answer a man for that as well as for any other sin. The Power that he are ordained of God; and it goes right on to add: 'Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist shall receive to themselves—Damnation!'"

But it is impossible to describe the force and zest with which the word passes the speaker's lips.

"As to the person who wrote this"—the preacher holds out the offensive sheet at arm's length—"let him look out for himself. He may be here this instant. I tell you, Sir, whoever you are, we have your handwriting. We have your Bible message? Come to this!" wails Brother Barker. "Is it possible there can exist among us men so desperate? Men who can lift a hand to our white Zion? Keep it in the very hour that Heaven has finally crushed it beneath its awful wrath? From whom," continues the preacher after a pause, and with a lower leaning of his body to his audience, as he asks the question, in confidence, of them, "did the writer of this get his Bible message? The Concordance by which this note was got up belongs," shaking the paper almost to pieces in his extended hand as he speaks, "to a minister of the Gospel now living, this moment preaching preaching without one prayer for the Confederacy, in Somerville. And the speaker's silence is more eloquent of meaning than any words could be. Not a grown person here but knows—Miss Nancy Bowles is the only lady who whispers it to her neighbor then—" Parson Arthur.

"I will say this much more"—the preacher has worked himself by this time into a frenzy, the projection of his lean Body, long arms, small head over the desk, with the look of his whole resembling him, even to Tim Lamum, who sits on one side of the pulpit, crowded there by the stress of the occasion, and has the preacher in profile, to an enraged serpent—"this moment our brave boys, your own husbands, brothers, sons, lovers, friends are in prayer there, enduring hunger, cold, intense toil for their country, lying in their hearty's gore, hacked very hinted and shattered by a fiendish foe; pouring out from every vein their rich, warm, Southern blood! And for what? Dear God, the mighty's wish on their and His hellish foes. Yes, pursuing and slaughtering and burning the Louisvilles and Cincinnatis and Washingtons of your defeated tyrants as those other slaveholders and peculiar people of God did the Canaanites. Our dear boys are there this moment slaying such of our cruel foes as come in their reach; and here are we at home, the same foes right among us, people sitting disloyally, insolently down to write such a paper as this"—a deadly shake to it—"while we are exulting in our cross victory. Men right at the President Address dashing the news on the very hearthstones which warm them. I tell you what, friends and fellow-citizens"—and the preacher, lower down over his desk, two-thirds of his body toward his breathless congregation, suits eyes and lips, long arms and convulsive fingers, livid and teeth set, to the words—"you should this hour seize the wretches and crush them like vipers under your feet!" and the stamp with which he dashes his heel upon their shattered heads thrills every heart.

But not without the conscious uprising in his own bosom, ay, and in the bosom of every Christian man there, of a something against all this, not without that, no not without that!

Only human nature, and that nature years, dear reader, as well as his. Our common nature: in this instance diluted in and by the raging of such a whirlwind as never befalls twice a century. Let Him decide the degree of guilt who can!

Reaction, however, being thus established, Brother Barker draws himself together again into the pulpit and takes up his well-worn hymnbook.

"Sixty-eight Psalm, first part, long measure:

"Let God arise in all his might
And put the troops of hell to flight."

Brethren, please sing."

Yes, the case of Mr. Arthur grows a more painful one every day. Many of his members, once his warmest friends, cease to attend church; even those whom he knows most cordially to approve his course are very rare indeed in their attendance there, exceedingly shy of being seen conversing with him, even for an instant, on the street. So many whom he once knew pass him on the streets, refusing to speak to him, that he now takes the initiative in that matter, and never himself first salutes any one of whose friendly feeling he entertains the least doubt. The very children are, in more instances than one, instructed to call after him as he passes along. The week after Brother Barker's sermon Mrs. Warner's little son salutes him as a black-hearted abolitionist. It is on record that the same child receives, for the first time in many months, an exceedingly severe chastisement from Dr. Arthur, followed by a much more severe scourging of the Doctor himself by the tongue of his wife; but who does not see the inspired veil of their family privacy to explain matters?

In fact, Mr. Arthur's apprehension of the correct standard of a layer in Christian society is clearer than it ever was before, with all his readiness. But let only truth be told: with all his bitter ungraciousness in the community, he enjoys a sweeter, more solid peace than ever before.

"It reminds me of the story of the prisoner whose confession was carefully constructed to contract around him every day," he says to Mr. Ferguson, who has just read aloud from his poorly scrawled, carelessly endangling, pen the miscreant ministers yet lingering among us who refuse to pray for the Confederacy, "from the last honest light. Sir.

"They do their utmost to drive you away. Only go, and they will publish you as having deserted the Federal cause. A hypocrite and a spy all the time you were here," added the Scotchman, upon whom quite a number of Yankees have fled, "a Yankee, an old bachelor, and a tough Scot, since Gay Brookes is gone—" fled in a base and cowardly manner to our dastardly foes," is the clear bird it—Mr. Ferguson, whose regard for Mr. Arthur has, since Secession, steadily increased, is glad to, at least, more gentle than he was ever known to be to man before. There is the spirit of John Knox in Mr. Arthur which he can not quench.

"Yes, if you were a man you would leave an odor behind you proving you to have been all along the vilest of wolves in sheep's clothing, just as the story of Judas Iscariote proves a departed visitant to have been the devil." So he comforts his friend.

Henceforth he scarcely ever visited any one. The truth is, he was afraid to leave his collection. Now he lags and creeps about the room, within limits, quite safe in which he keeps his hand-stiles and money, and frequently visits Mr. Arthur in the study of his house. Here the two Americans, Arthur and his minister merely returns the dry Good-morning, and waves the Scotchman to a chair till he gets through. Then Mr. Arthur has been known to pat Robby, when out there, on the head—the first time he has touched a child for many, many years. The whole association is upon the one topic until Mr. Arthur wearies of it, yet he experiences a pleasure in having his grim and gaunt friend near him. It is somehow like the having a rocky barrier for the time between him and the roar and dash of the ocean—for, yet a little while, the most clamorous is the phrase of Secession just now.

"I know dozens of cases in which they have made preachers take the oath, and then they have forloughed them to preach; resign this morning, and before night Simmons and Tim Lamum will be after you," says Mr. Arthur, impatiently.

"None of the interest religious matters among even the best of our people, which I counted on to make up for other things," moans Mr. Arthur. "The Union men flying like rats, or giving up all hope of the changing of the purpose or the power of the General Government. So many who abhorred Secession have gone over to it from a deeper hatred of Abolition. But oh, this spiritual apathy!"

Quite a contrast to the ferrent praying, preaching, singing, conversing, at that fellow Barker's Sunday services and weekly prayer-meetings," says his friend. "Such a perversion of all that is purely the Confederacy. It lives with it, will die with it."

"They ignore, for the present, every Gospel doctrine, so far as urging it is concerned, I fear," replies Mr. Arthur. "God is feared principally as the One who may help the Confederacy to live and invoked, and clung to, mainly as the One who must and shall help the Confederates. It is not so much my duty to preach that the very Saviour now is, because he sanctioned, or, at least, did not expressly condemn, slavery. At least the duty must be better than all this, but this is the outer seeming. And I, perhaps, am as fanatical—only the other way."

"The Almighty," says the Scotchman, reverently, "is simply witholding his gracious Spirit for the present, leaving men, for the time, to the course they will. The Lord is full in that Divine wind which bloweth as it listeth."

"And, the analogy of Nature, will it prove true here?" says Mr. Arthur, sadly, "the strong blowing which seamen know always to follow a calm.

"When His other instrumentalities have got slavery out of the way. Even that man Barker has some blind idea toward the truth. Before this last ridiculous news, they tell me, he had a vast deal to say about some Jonah or other being under deck of the Ship of State—some wedge of gold and Babylonish garment being hidden somewhere in camp which prevented success."

"I fear he refers to Jefferson Davis," left unhung in the land—not to the institution; but who can tell? How often I wish I could catch a glimpse of some man's heart to-day. Do not even know my own!" says Mr. Arthur. "I don't want to speak of myself; but I do feel as if I was actually in jail—by fact in the stocks."

"And midnight upon you; then do as Paul and Silas did, in like case: pray and sing praises to God. The earthquake will come in due time," is the consolation of the Scotchman.

"But so many really good men have gone into this thing—men who hated it at first as much as myself! Some from the influence of others, especially their wives or sons; some because it was to be made in it: some from despair of the success of the Federal government; some because they also feel to regard Slavery as being at last, by its favor, on the side of the South. What pains me most is, that ministers, whose influence is considerable—men older, wiser, sincere devoted than I—men superior to me in every sense, should so be thoroughly personalized and realized by the Confederacy. They look at the head as he walks his study, wherein this conversation takes place, sinks upon his bosom in his deep, deep thought.

The Scotchman sits at the table, apparently turning over the leaves of a Ridgeley's "Body of Divinity," but not omitting, Brother Arthur is far away in Scotland, standing beside a grave wherein he saw laid, years on years ago, a fair young face and form, and traces there before his eyes parts of his memory forever. The plumed Hamlet, the white-bearded Lear, the sweatily chilly young man on the stage are not more the heroes of drama. This grizzly old Scot was not driven apart from men and so deep within himself, more to commune with God to desert and cave, without his tragedy too.

What divine finger touches his heart to-day? Is it Annie's memory? He had never thought of it before, a new purpose, as his eye rests upon his friend, suddenly blossoms upon him, like the sound but dry stick, which is dead all at a new purpose! And like the arrival of the time for the putting forth of buds, it brings a spring and a go with it to the wintry old Scot. A purpose, and a substantial one, too, as we shall yet see.

It strikes him—the change in this once enthusiastic young divine, who came to Somerville to accomplish wonders—that is long ago now. The long gallop of Secession fanaticism, perhaps. It is the plunges the year around into the cold pool. Maybe it is because, in intervals of study, Dr. Arthur rails in Mr. Lloyd's garden so violice and spade. Because, once too reliant on others, circumstances in these days have become in him altogether too perhaps. And it may be for the reason that he has been swimming very long now against a current broad and deep as all the professions of a nation, from without and from within, have wrought together to make him, bodily, mentally, spiritually, a humanist. Maybe he has been a Mr. Arthur, will turn to look upon him as he passes them hereafter, saying to themselves, "There is one who has had a history." But he said one, please God, who has a history before him also.

The Scotchman discovers a tumbler of fresh flowers from off an old volume of Shakspeare on the table; and with the sight and smell of the flowers is taken to a field where he sees on Sunday school and church. Yes, yes, if God will, there shall be a story, yet unlived, as pleasant as any of Watery Kirk. Like Dr. Arthur, he has Shakspeare or one of it: a story of love through years of trial, and, at last, union just the sweetest and more perfect for all that. Not that Miss Fergusson is perfectly confident; he knows too much of this sorrowful world for that. If it is in my power, he says.

But Mr. Arthur is thinking as he walks of that last visit good Mr. Ellis made him the Saturday before the Sunday appearance of the church.

"I do not ask you to take an active part," Mr. Ellis had closed a long entreaty with his pastor by saying, in the humblest manner which In Mr. Barker's temper and manner which I can not approve. But people tell me every day that you wish for the success of Confederacy, and success of the Federals. Assure me this is not so. This is all I ask."

Mr. Ellis had been urging the waning influence and usefulness of his pastor with tears in his eyes; most sincerely is he attached to his pastor and his family. If he possibly could, he would cling to both.

"Being born at the South, it is impossible for me, as for you, not to wish well to that for which what is for the welfare of the South. As to the rest, I can only say, God's will in regard to the South be done. I am a minister of Christ first of South; let us leave it to Him."

And Mr. Ellis can by no means be satisfied with this answer. He would only have told him that he can not regard either Secession or slavery as things for which Heaven is likely to fight.

Dark days these for Mr. Ellis. True, the Confederacy has been most wonderfully victorious of late, but Secession movement is a certainty, of course. But then Henry is off in camp, terribly exposed body and soul. The Confederate cause among Christian men is frightful. And Mr. Ellis, his expenses becoming heavier every day, is making nothing there in his empty store. Strange to say, he has not lost property developing in Mr. Ellis's bosom which surprises men—an altogether peculiar love. Perhaps a tenderness which are most involved in it. He is nervous, sensitive, quick to take offense, petulant exceedingly when bad news is coming. Far from an liberal, however, toward the object as he was at first. He has been so drained, you see, and doubly drained by his pastor's appeals.

"Who knows, Mr. Ferguson," says Mr. Arthur at last, "but Providence may permit the Confederacy to be established—a Christian nation of slaveholders, off by itself from all intermeddling—to show what Christianity within it can effect on slaves? The world may thus get a new idea of the power of religion, and then such may thus be in an admirable training for freedom, if such they are to have at some future period."

"Visionary!" growls the Scotchman. "God works according to laws inherent in the nature of things. We have no Scripture warrant to absolute supernatural miracles to effect what requires a double miracle. Only by a supernatural restraint would the world be held back from such intervening. Only by a supernatural increase of the Christianity at the South will owners do more for and with their slaves than here-tofore. Only by and now that marriage is an ordinance, the relation of parent and child is an ordinance of God, even if slavery is, as well as slavery? Did they assert Christian liberty for the slave? They have had the opportunity; it is gone from them forever. Christianity? It demands the observance of the parental and marital relation in the case of every disciple, white and black, and that is utterly inconsistent with the very existence of slavery. Let a Christian owner try any improvement upon the culture of his slaves; like a dog with a tin kettle to his tail he would be run out of the country, with Abolitionist! fastened to him in no time.

"Well, then," says the discomfited friend, "Heaven must permit the Confederacy to gain its independence, to set up for itself, isolated from all the world, in the Christian pendant to Satan it claims to be Christian, yet on the basis of slavery. The Ruler of all may permit this that said system may work out its own ruin even from all the world by the law of self-destruction inherent in every wrong thing; or that, as a disciplinary one for the nations, Christian nations, he may be the object of His swift and direct vengeance."

"I prefer," grumbles Mr. Ferguson, "to take a plainer, more common-sense view. By Secession the South is at arm's-length from the National Government, and Heaven is glad that Government both will and power to scourge the South out of Secession and slavery, and back into civilization and freedom, as it has not for the nineteenth century. That is the way Providence has worked from creation till now—by means."

But Mr. Arthur's attention is rambling. He has lived all his life at the South; and as he walks up and down there, he sees in the air about the misty instances of oppression, cruelty, corruption, awful sin, which have passed under his own eye as a matter of course. He sees that, as human nature is constituted, the necessary fruits of just such an institution. How many, many times has he, in the past, reasoned with himself for recalling them to mind to a soul. He wouldn not narrate a single instance of them all even to Mr. Ferguson. He almost forbids himself for recalling them to memory. He an Abolitionist, even in thought! Perhaps ten years hence people will be interested to know how they appreciate the horror with which such a man as he shrank them from the thought. He ventures now only this far:

"People say I am not sound, Mr. Ferguson. They are right in a sense. I am very much apart from them. If I could only preach and pray and speak! I am no true Southern man, they say. As if the believing in and urging on the men and the things which have been producing, are stirring, my own native soil, as I know they are, constitutes that! And here I am gagged, cold hand and foot, restricted to the use of my one thing for my country, deaner to me now than ever. Make a gesture even as much as this. Burning daily part of death for even thinking and feeling—"

"Patience, man!" interrupts his cooler friend. "You can at least preach the Gospel."

"Not all of it. Not the many parts of it bearing directly on the times. No. Only verses ing directly on the times. No. Only verses which, from the first, those at church expressly to see if there is a syllable in sermon or prayer upon which they can lay hold. Not the whole of the Bible and previous throw themselves, as if casually, in my way, who spoke in denunciation of slavery and Secession. Not even the whole of it is wise to pray for this spiritual apathy into which we have all fallen! I pray, I strive, I can not move it even to speak to the Lord about it as to a person. I can not even grapple with it in my own bosom. Powerless, absolutely powerless!" and he falls into a chair and covers his face with his hands.

"Only mortified pride," says the Scotchman, with a promptness of a surgeon's knife. "Leaves would see you living needed you. Who knows? You may be in training for future usefulness. And if you are not, you are not the only one, my way! When you have learned your own entire feebleness you may lean upon Heaven enough for it to work in the future."

"I feel at times as if there is no future," rejoins Mr. Arthur, after a silence. "That is as if I had come to the end of my service. No country left me. The very Church of God powerless, or worked as the most powerful of evil forces to defeat and destroy itself. I will tell you what is about all my consolation just now!—drawing a Concordance toward him as he sits at the table.

The Scotchman patiently listening, the young theologian proceeds, with alacrity and unwavering cheerfulness as he takes his glasses more and more past all doubt from Scripture, to prove conclusively that the world will end, in all probability, in a year or so. He rapidly explains from Daniel and Revelation the twelve hundred and sixty years "to doubt on dead point. Now for the exact date following this 1260 years very universal bishop in 606 A.D. "Can you show me on what ground we are to doubt it?" asks Mr. Arthur, eagerly. "Now add 606—please do it yourself on that slip of paper—to the twelve hundred and sixty."

For the year in which the world is to end? I can calculate without ciphering," says the grizzled Scotchman, with amusement under his beard. "Exactly eighteen hundred and sixty-six."

"But really and in good earnest," pleads his friend, as if for a gift. "You are fond of applying to dulge in idle speculations in private or in public; but it really does look as if it may be the year of the end of all. God in mercy grant it!"

"All stuff, man!" says the callous Scotchman, rising from his seat with a yawn. "You would not say so if you had heard looking of the final success of the Federals, not even if you had heard of any great victory on their part. Nonsense, man! Put that day and that nonsense remember." And Mr. Ferguson, conscious of the flowers on the table, the fair face he sees at Sunday-school, and the youth and energy of his friend, of his own new purpose too, says, emphatically, "For one, I hope not.

"Besides," adds the Scot, in his own room, half an hour later, and with his collection open on its table before him, "it would be the greatest pity," passing his hand fondly over the pasted pages, "the greatest pity in the world for such a collection as this to be burned up incomplete, even if it is by a work of God." And thereupon Mr. Ferguson falls into meditation as to what kind of binding will be good enough for said collection, and which of the Edinburgh publishe illustrates most worthy of it in his death—all which "unnecessary" expenditure is wholly "for only fear is it will not last long enough!" he adds.

TWENTY-FIVE DARK HOURS.

I'd what we calls a ganger, and have so many men under me when we're making a new line o' rail. I passed best part o' my time in the country; but I have worked on the lines in Russia and Spain; but what I'm about to tell you happened in London, where we'd sunk a shaft right down, and then we was running forards and backards.—My shaft being to get rid of your stuff, and sometimes for a steam-engine to be pumping up the water. It's rather dangerous work, and a many men get killed; but then a great deal of it's through carelessness, for lots of our fellows seems as though the whole o' the business was to work backs and arms, and not a precious strong, and nowheres else; but I'd got so used to it that in cutting or tunnel it was all the same to me as how I was busy sinking a shaft, or digging, and sometimes bricklaying a bit, as that I thought worry little about danger when I'd seen as all the while my pipe was well in full blast.

It was just at the end o' the dinner-hour one day, and I was gone down the shaft to have a good look round before we began again, for I'd spent my right-hand man, Sam Carberry, with me. It was a new shaft, thirty foot deep, and the men had to go down, and a windlass and baskets for bringing up stuff and letting down bricks and mortar.

We hadn't turned more than ten minutes some ten or a dozen foot each way, so as you may suppose it was werry fresh—grass, as we calls it, and I wasn't quite satisfied about the shoring up o' one or two, for you know fellows do get so precious careless when once they've got used to danger; and as for some of our big navvies, why they're just like a set of children, and for every thing else but their regular work they're quite as helpless. Tell 'em to fill a lorry, or shift a truck, or wheel a barrer that's got a bit o' smoke; but as to taking care o' themselves—but there, I needn't say no more about that—just look at the great, good-tempered, lollopping fellows, that man can't have it all ways; and if he's got it all in bone and muscle, why 'tain't to be expected as he's going to have all the brains too.

"That's giving a bit there, Sam," I says, a-pointing to one part o' the shaft where the earth was a-bulging and looked loose. "That ain't safe. There'll be a barrer full o' stuff a-top o' somebody's head afore the afternoon's over. Shore up against that is. Take your mell and knock out that lower shore, and we'll put it a couple o' foot higher up. Mind how you do it!" Sam nods his head, for he was a chap as never spoke if he could help it, and then he gets up, while I takes a look or two at the brickwork, to see as to be done by the men as I'd dropped on by the foreman. Then I hears Sam banging away at the bit o' scaffold-pole, and directly after I looks down with a bit loose in my hand, then there was a rattling o' loose gravelly earth as I pops out, and then feels as though my heart was in my mouth, for I shouts out: "That's the worst one!" But in an instant Sam dropped to the bottom, and as he did so it seemed as though some one threw a cannon ball down the hole, and I felt the wind as blow on the chest, and was driven backward and flushed up against the wood scaffolding in the curning. I supposed I was stunned, for I felt nothing more for a bit. Then it seemed as though I was being called, and I corter woke up; but every thing was in a fog pitch and silent as the grave, only feeling heavy and misty and stupid, I shut my eyes again, and felt as if going to sleep, for there didn't seem to be any thing the matter to me, only as if enough something had shut up thought and sense in the dark, and not a wink of light could get in. But there I was in a sort of dreamy, confused state, and lay there perfectly still till a groaning noise roused me, when I thought some one was talking, and so sharp was that flash that my brain seemed scorched, for I knew that was buried alive.

For a few minutes I stood where I first rose up in a half-stooping position, with my head and shoulders touching the poles and boards above me; but a fresh groan made me begin to feel about in the darkness, and try to find out where I was, and how much room I had to move in. But that was soon done, for all the time there was about a yard square, and as far up as I could reach it seemed a couple of yards, while the other way there was the width of the tunnel. I dared not move much, though, for the earth and bricken brickwork kept rolling and crumbling in, so that every moment the space grew less, and a cold sweat came out all over my face, as I thought that I should soon be crushed and covered completely up. Just then, however, another groan sounded close by me, and for the first time I remembered Sam Carberry, and began feeling about in the direction from whence the groan came.

Bricks, bits o' stone, crumbling gravel, the upright earth-supporting poles, and then I met with splinters, and snapped in two and three pieces, with their ragged ends sticking out of the gravel. But I could feel nothing of Sam, and I'd found the board again, as though I had been running, and there was the big drops a-rolling off me, while I drew every breath as I'd been heavy load. I grew wild with terror, and for it seemed as though I shouldn't be able to breathe much longer, and then I must be stifled. It was awful, the feeling of being all alone, and had such effect on me, that I dashed about like a bird in a cage—now here, now there—in mad efforts and struggles to get out. Why, I hadn't thought of swore and tore about, jumping up and plunging my hands into the earth; till at last, panting, and bleeding, and helpless, I sank down and prayed—yes, a child.

Ah! That did me good, and seemed to clear my thoughts, and make me mad with myself to think I had been wasting my strength so for nothing, when perhaps I might have been finding somebody to make my way out; and while I was thinking like this, all at once I started, for there was a groan again close to my head; then, quick as a flash, I got my hand upon a bit of broken board, when I felt a groan again, and then, after searching about, found a hand underneath it, and by the feel o' blood, for there was company—I was not alone—and after working off the way now and then, I soon had again like a good 'un till the shovel was at liberty; and while I was hard at work I had no time to think about any thing else.

And now, though I could feel that poor Sam was breathing, he didn't groan; and I began with the shovel to try and set his head free from the earth, but at the first trial I threw down the tool with a horrible cry, as the loose gravel came rattling down, and in another minute the space that I'd made would be completely covered if I had not thrust myself against the earth and kept it back.

If I could only get out, I began thinking I would not have cared; but now that I was forced to keep still and hold up the earth, the thoughts would keep coming thick and fast of my wife and the kids, and were coffins—black cloth coffins with white nails; black coffins with black nails; gilt coffins; workhouse shells; and every other sort of one I'd ever see myself lying stiff and cold. There was one light-grained elm, which looked sometimes quite like a little ripple flight on the top, and another of the same gradually closer, and closer, and closer, till it seemed as though the next moment it would crush me, or drive me through the earth into the next dig-ging; then it would gradually go back further and further till it was quite a speck again. Then there were processions of mourners, and funerals, and tolling by.

Now and then there was a noise of stone falling or a little bit of rolling earth, else all was as still and silent as if there wasn't such a thing as hearing. It was so still that the noise seemed to make me ill, so I began to talk out loud for the sake of having something to hear; and then I listened again, hoping to hear the sounds of pick and shovel, for I knew they would be trying to dig us out, alive or dead.

"That'll be it," I says out aloud; "they'll dig, and dig, and dig, and then they'll get to the end, and they've got all the stuff to get up the shaft, and shore up again as they goe, and I shall be gone mad before they get to me."

Then the horror of death came again, and I leaped up and beat myself about till I was drenched with cold and sweat, and then I sank down, for I felt as my heart throbbing and beating, and, try what I would, I couldn't get enough breath. I tried to thank the Lord for all my past life, and prayed for warm, and that the earth had not settled over it. It was company to be able to touch it so long as he was alive; but I thought of his wife and children, and then shivered as I felt that I should scrape the loose gravel over it, and creep to the far end of the narrow hole. And now I began to think of Sam, and to think about home, and my two girls, and their mother; and there was no comfort there, for I began to wonder what was being said and done after I was gone. Quietly as could be I calculated what my funeral would cost the Odd Fellows, and then about the allowance there'd be made to my pay out o' the Widow and Orphan's Fund, and then I thought how things might have been worse than they was. At last of all, I felt I could pray no more, for I felt the first time since I'd been buried, I was down on my knees with my face to the wall.

I don't know how long I stopped like that, when all at once I fancied I heard a voice speaking, and I started up; but it sounded so more, and as I sat listening I could see again all sorts of things coming and going. Now it was coffins; now strange-looking beasts and things without any particular shape; and as they moved, and coiled, and rolled forward, I kept feeling as though they must touch me; but no, they glided off again, and at last, to keep from thinking, I stripped off coat and waistcoat and, groping about till I got hold of the shovel, I cried out, "God help me!" and began to try and dig a way out.

"Every man for himself!" I half roared, and the curious, stilted sound of my voice frightened me; but I worked on till I had thrown back a few spades-fulls, when I found that I had put it off too long, and that I could do nothing but sink down, panting for air. I couldn't keep off the idea that something was pressing down upon me and trying to force out my breath; at last this idea got to be so strong that I kept thrusting out my hands and trying to push the weight away. I don't know how time went, but at last I was lying, worn out and helpless, on my back, and then I set trying to grub or burrow a way out with my fingers.

All at once I remembered poor Sam, and after a great deal of groping I found the board again, and laid my hand upon his face, but only to snatch it away with a chill running through me, for it was as cold as ice. Then I tried to touch his breast, but soon gave up; for, with the exception of his face, he was completely bedded in the earth, while the board and only saved him at the first moment from instantaneous death.

I crept as far off as I could; for now it seemed that death was very near me, and that my own time must be pretty well run out.

I won't tell you how weak I was again, and how all my past actions came passing past me. Odds! they all were, from boyhood till the present; and I couldn't help groaning as I saw how precious little of good there was among 'em; yet here and there a bright spark among all the blackness. At last I began to think it was all over, for a heavy stupid darkness came over me, and I battled against it with all my might; but it was like—to me, there, in that darkness—as though I was sinking deeper and nearer with heavy shadowy wings; and as I tried to drive it off it went back, but only to come again, till at last it seemed to have got me down, for after groping round and round the place such a many times I seemed to see and know every bit of it as well as if I saw it with my eyes, till it faded away, and all seemed to be gone.

Next thing as I remembers is a dull "thud-thud-thudding" noise, which drove me up in so that I sat holding my head, which ached as though it would split, and trying to recollect once more where I was; and I dare say your mind must have been a bit touched, for I could make nothing out until I had crawled and felt about a few time over, when once more it came back with a flash, and I remember thinking how much better it would have been if I had kept that shovel, for now I knew what the row was, and I seemed hardly to have the hope, which seemed to drive me almost mad. "Could they get to me before I was dead? Could I help them? Would they give up in despair and leave me?

I lay listening to the "thud-thud-thud" till all at once it stopped, and the stillness that succeeded was so awful that I shrieked out, for I thought they had given up and left me. But the dull, thudding noise roused me again, and once more I lay listening and counting the spadefuls that I knew were being flung about as they dug over the roof. Then I rose, and tried to shout in reply, I found I couldn't do more than whisper.

All at once the earth came caving in again, and I was half buried. Weak as I was, it took me long enough to get from it to crawl up and obtain an upright post or two; and I found that I did; for no sooner was I there than the gravel ceased in again, and I heard a shout, saw a flash of light, and then was jammed close into the corner, and must have been suffocated but for the work I'd been doing, and the room that it gave me. But as I sat wedged in I could hear the sound of the shovels and picks, and I knew how men would toil to get out a buried comrade, and I felt feeling quite helpless and resigned, I tried my best to pray for my life, or, if not, for mercy for what I had done wrong.

Ah!

"Ain't no more here," I'd said a minute, it seemed to me in the dark, and I could not speak to you before.

"Must be," said another voice. "Poor chap's under them planks!" And then come that sound of shovels again, and then a loud hurraying, and I felt hands about me, and I knew being carried, and something trickled into my mouth, and voices were buzzing about me more and more, and I began to be able to breathe, and I heard some one say, "He's coming to;" and then one spoke, and then another spoke, and I knew I was being taken up the hill, and was on a stretcher; and I dream, till I heard a loud scream, and felt two arms round me, and knowing that now I was saved I fainted, I tried to say, "Thank God!" but could only think it.

After a bit I managed to speak, but I suppose I said all sorts of wild and disconnected things, for I asked the time, when the voice that revived me so whispered in my ear that it was nearly three.

"And how long have I been?" I got out at last.

"Twenty-five hours!"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE practical but very unpoetical use to which the citizens of New York have conformed the first of May has called forth the ire of other cities of all the country. Theseming, blooming month, when bursting buds and singing birds are in universal rejoicing under the "blue canopy fields of ether," is, with us, devoted chiefly to unpacking furniture, and "getting settled." It is really a decoration of the high spring-time; and the poet's words are thereby, in part, falsified:

"The merry May hath pleasant hours, and dreadful are they not."

As if they looked like the leaves, upon a silver tide: The trees are full of crimson buds, the woods are full of birds,

And the yellow cow-ta wands, like a tone with pleasant words."

In many country towns there still exists the pretty custom of Maying. The young folks are roused at daybreak by the ringing of the village bell, or, wanting that, by special call of some sleepless youth. They penetrate the woods, and, upturning the dead, damp leaves, or, perchance, brushing away a lingering layer of snow, discover the hiding-place of the sweet trailing arbutus, that delicate May flower, whose fragrant, pink blossoms are woven into a garland to crown the chosen Queen of May.

The inhabitant of our city who may, for a shilling, any day buy a bunch of spring violets from the little flower-girls on broadway, does not understand the peculiar pleasure of finding the earliest blossom in their native haunts, unless, by chance, they have the memory of their childhood to aid in the recollection.

The culture of flowers is a delightful occupation. In the city, however, where the only opportunity to work in the ground a few feet square, which most likely the landmen monopolize over Monday, a narrow border around the little yard, is the severe allowance. Nevertheless wonders can be accomplished in a little space by skillful management. And if ladies, who, in the country, have the requisite skill and taste, will give a little attention to the matter now they will be repaid by-and-by. It need not be an arduous labor. A gardener will prepare the soil properly in half a day; and, as a lady will prefer the usual promenade for a few days, the time thus gained will enable her easily to accomplish the rest, and, we think, she will not lose her many chosen acquaintances. In selecting seeds and plants the simple, hardy varieties, and those which will bloom through the season, usually give more satisfaction than the more delicate kinds, which require special care. Mignonette, Heliotrope, Verbenas, Monthly Roses, Pinks, etc., can always be depended upon. Chrysanthemums, Pinks, Asters, and similar plants will brighten the beds in autumn. In the Fall months a judicious selection one may have bouquets from her own garden all through the season. In the Old Country, none but for their share of the work and of the flowers. Give Harry and Lucy this day bed of their own, and let them how to drop in the seeds. If you will provide a little wa they will soon learn to distinguish the weeds, of course they will pull up like plants too, their happiness will be complete.

Women, all the world over, love flowers: and there is no gift to them more delicate and appropriate than a bouquet of fresh flowers. It is not, therefore, strange to generally understood that gentlemen often have an equally keen enjoyment of them; nor that it is an equally generous impulse for a lady to place flowers upon the dining table, or by the breakfast plate of husband or brother, for their special gratification. We have seen gentlemen who particularly enjoy a bouquet for breakfast; and, doubtless, others would be equally pleased to have it in warm weather comes on. It might answer instead of a fresh dessert dish.

The Central Park is putting on its fresh spring dress. The "season" will open—weather permitting—on the first Saturday afternoon of May, by a review. The smoking pagods has been repaired and replanted—a great variety of rustic seats have been added; and, indeed, throughout the Park much has been done to change the winter to increase its beauty and render it attractive. The improvements are now in progress in the upper section, which has hitherto been in a comparatively unfinished condition.

When "The American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals" is incorporated by the next Legislature, it may become possible to pass through Broadway and not meet the disgusting sight of a horse tortured by being overloaded or prostrate, struggling horses. At present it is seldom possible.

The following singular statistics of matrimonial life in Paris are reported:

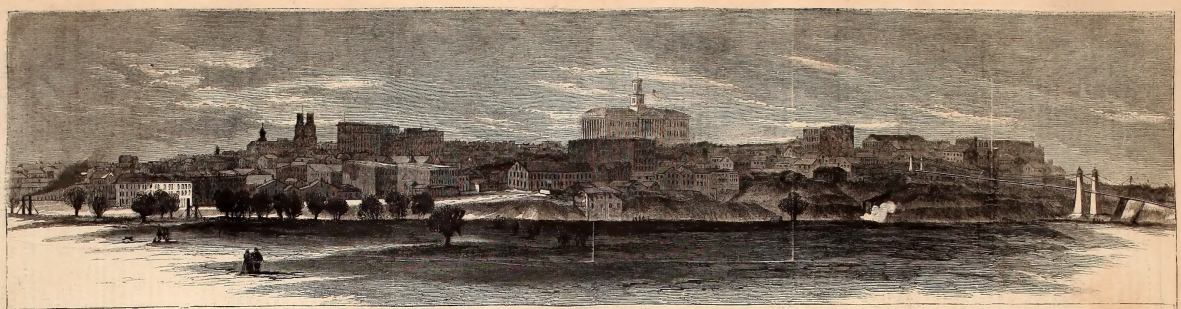
During the past twelve months 8644 wives have fled the unhappy roof of their husbands. The unfortunate wives of husbands who have done likewise there are 6407; of married couples who have passed one afternoon in the Seine are 7119; of those who have agreed to live apart, 5801; of females and children who have been abandoned, 3111; of happy couples, 49; of mutually indifferent, 61,430.

If this Parisian statistic is liable to anything like accuracy more extensively than at present, some remedies should be carefully sought for the epidemic. We need no plenty of them. Let us see. Here is a recipe for keeping a husband and making him good-natured:

"Keep his dinner hot in prime condition at the requisite degree of stiffness; never let him know the want of a broken; give him the choicest cuts from the tenderest meat, and a sparkling cup of coffee for his breakfast; keep sparkling before and behind you every day in the week; never scorn him with the blunders and extravagance of Bridget; meet his every want and wish with a cheerful, pleasant face, well-combed hair, and a welcome kiss; have ready a comfortable chair, with a cheerful fire, and a pleasant chair, with comfortable gown and slippers; be merry, and tell him news received from abroad; have a clean, well-made bed in a cozy chamber."

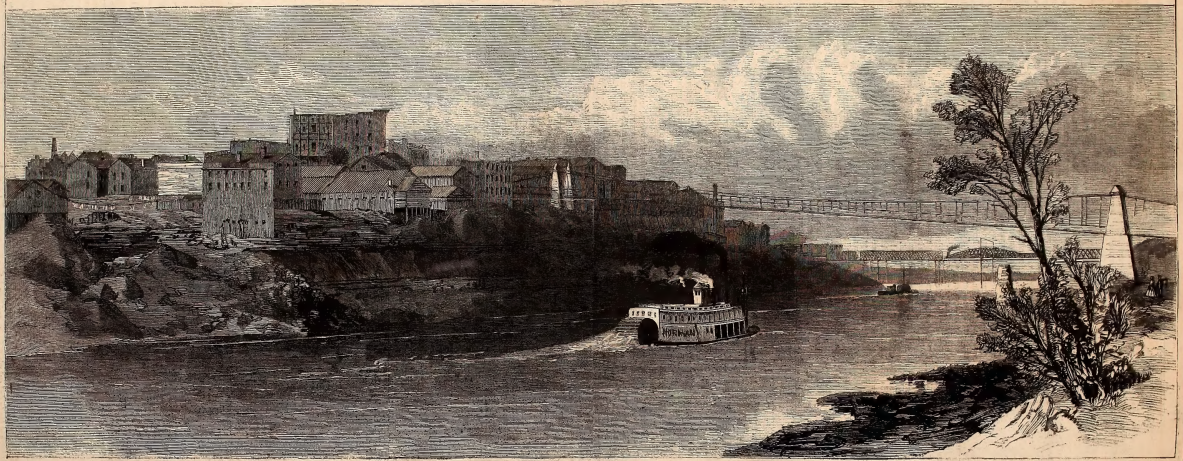
Very good. Now—well—verily, our moral cook-book does not contain a single recipe for making and keeping a good wife. That is strange. The inference is plain. Either wives are born so, or else no one female ever took the pains to study the subject. But doubtless there are about accepting their children to the dangers of the street, and many mothers will be glad to know that a good chocolate factory in the Rue Richelieu. He had an immense number of guests, although he was not a fashionable manners drove many away from him. He was about sixty years old, and leaves a wife and children who inherit his fortune.

Somebody—we are unable to give the authority—reports the following as children's "sensitives," each one of which is a suggestive enough for a text:



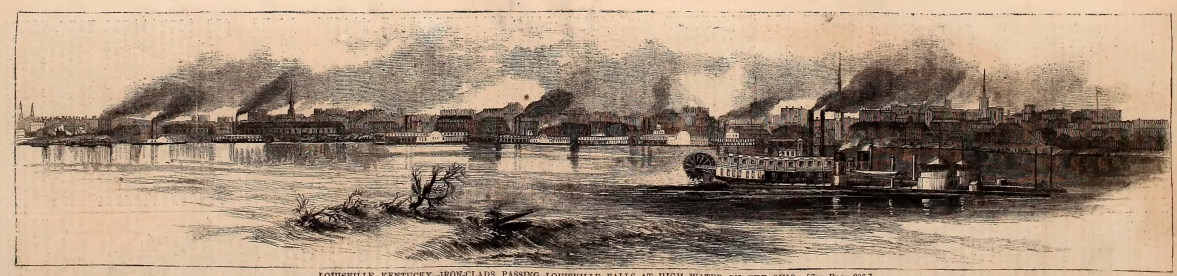
Wonder why mamma keeps Bridget at home from church to-day, and does not go herself, and has to stay at home to build my rabbit-house on Sunday?

Wonder if my mamma thinks it's proper that pretty cats with the yellow blue's head on the top, and then nobody can be sure of the top of the mountain? Wonder, I must a how-happy just as well as be wanted a cane?



Wonder what the cat thinks of the many stories to visitors about his killing the master's rabbit when he went to school, and about his running away from the school-mistress when she was going to whip him, and then shut me up all day in a dark room because I cried once to be at ment as he was?

Wonder what made papa say that wicked word when Betsy upset the ink all over his papers, and then slapped my ears because I said the same thing when my kite-string broke?



Wonder if my mamma told Bridget the other day to say that she was out at home when Tommy Day's mother called, that the pots ne to bed without my supper every time I tell a lie?

THE PASSION OF MARTIN HOLDFAST.

THERE were ten of us; but four brothers and five sisters had died ere I reached manhood. So, too, had my father and mother. I was left quite alone in the old house—half manor-house, half farm-house—before I was five-and-twenty.

I know not on God's earth a more abandoned and desolate spot than that on which the original Holdfast had chosen to establish his house. Along the northeastern seaboard of Hertshire runs a long range of sandy hillocks. They are as deserted as the desert. A few coarse burrows in their sides, and when spring returns the shy curlew lays her eggs among the heath. Beyond the sandy ramparts and the sea was a silice of navigable country, perhaps a mile in breadth. This narrow strip runs from the mouth of the Blackwater a dozen miles to the north. The population is thin and scattered. There are some half-dozen farm-houses; the cottages of a few fishermen under the lee of the Lion's Crag (which forms and protects a miniature harbor) Mavrell Park, upon a bend of the Blackwater; and in its east neighborhood the Heuks. And the Heugks is the farm manor-house of which I have spoken, where the Holdfasts had lived and died, and where I—Martin Holdfast—was born. The gaunt old house had once been gay enough; but its cheerfulness had died out as the haunted years went by.

I had been brought up in a gloomy creed. Hell was to me a tremendous reality before I had cut my first teeth. I was taught in the nursery that God was a terrible tyrant, who delighted in fire, vengeance and in shedding blood. As I grew up the schemes was explained to me with amazing distinctness. We had built down for us at school in the form of question and answer; and even to-day I can call to mind the whole backboard, every printed and wicked riddles teacher and pupil—the pupil being ten years old—puzzled themselves daily with our feelings of indignation, horror, and astonishment:

Other lads could repeat this lesson without appearing to attach any weight to the words; but I could not. I was tormented by this vision which the gloomy logic of a theologian had conjured up—this vision of a God who was a jealous God! a God not for eternal torment. I reflected, and I rebelled. To hold to such a faith would, I felt, drive me into the direct unbelief. I was now over who God might be; but I was determined, at all hazards, to deny that he looked with cruel complacency upon the agony of his victims. On this ground I might find rest for the sole of my foot—for a time at least.

But black-and-red Hudson, our parsons, did not owe here. He was a Calvinist. Blackstock was at the dinner-table very much like other men—that he placed a respectable rubber, and was particular about his port. Yet when he mounted the pulpit he told us that the world and the things of the world were accursed; that our bodies were the servants of Satan; that when he rose from prayer from the wrath to come, but from all that seemed to make life beautiful and desirable—the lusts of the flesh, as he called them. Mr. Blacker was by nature sectarial, and I believe that, more or less, he practised what he preached. But my wife revelled against the doctrine.

I had been designed for "the ministry;" but my tender heart and I have parted by a vast gulf of unbelief, and they let me go. And then, gun in hand, I wandered across desolate moorlands or by the sleighing sea, day after day, and left the theologians to carry on their windy war. The old place was very lonely by this time; but when a man is hardly in body and soul, having the open air, his gun, his horses, his dogs; when he is five-and-twenty years old and six feet two in his stockings, he has no right to be permanently unhappy.

Nor was I—only I felt that the color of the life which I had inherited was somewhat gray. It wanted color-relief, I suppose. I was painfully happy in the excitement of the chase; but our rustic merrymakings were not lively. Philis had soft, pensive eyes (as we have); but then her hands were red and lumpy, and the old farmer's views about the weather were as dull as a sermon by Dr. Hackshack. The fishers' life did not lack adventure; how could it, when their field of battle was all glory and the sea? But hand, though good fellows in the main, they were sadly prosy: and their stories-talk had a flavor of Blastem which was not subtle.

There was one house, indeed, which was not utterly hard and prosaic and unlovely, like the rest. An air of romance and of romance I thought that lingered any where about—blew through Mavrell Park. But Mavrell Park was empty, and had been empty for many seasons.

The chief approach to the Park is distant about a mile from the gaunt old house that I have been describing. The Mavrell Mansion looks down upon the Blackwater—here half sea, half river. Twice a day

> The salt-sea water passes by,
> And makes a silence in the hills.

Of the present Mavrells I knew little or nothing. I knew indeed that the old Park—the hall proper, not at Mavrell Park, but at some princely palace in a remote Highland county, had recently died. I knew that he had, per force, left the little and the bulk of his estates to a son whom he had driven from the castle, because he (the son) had unfilially persisted in attending the parish church of a Sunday when he was needed to make the fourth at a rubber. I knew that he had left Mavrell Park to a distant cousin—a plain Henry Mavrell, who had long held a high diplomatic post at a Continental Court. More than this I did not know, and my ignorance was shared by all my neighbors.

Opposite the point where at low-water the Blackwater joins the sea, a cove or embankment has been formed. The land lies low, and, until this dyke was raised, had been frequently flooded. I sat here, one bright afternoon about the end of the middle of the month of February. The tide was full, and washed the pebbles on the other side of the dyke. It was a true February day—cold, cheerless, inhospitable. The evening shadows were already gathering to the sky while I sat and watched the duck as they flew up and down the bends of the river, and an old seal which thrust its bullet-head occasionally above water to squint at the salmon-nets. Angus, the taciturn, had apparently neglected to tell them that it was the dejections of this wily old rascal. He declared, with tears in his eyes, that it had made his life a burden for years, and that a little cod of large size must be had caught this year, and once or twice, when entangled among the nets, it had viciously smashed them. Angus and I, however, did not keep knocking his distance just now, but a bright-eyed vigilant northern diver was sailing within shot. He had come up with the tide from the long, polished bar afternoon meal, was looking about him before going off to sea. I had raised my gun, half-minded to give him the benefit of a charge, when the sound of skates on the frozen canal at my back—chrill in the frosty stillness—caught my ear, and I turned round.

Artemis and her train! one of her nymphs at least. She was not, in the world, likely, indolent ease of an accomplished skater—blazing through the keen February air—her cheeks rosy with the cold and the freshness of her lively feet. She came on, who, I knew not; I knew only that a lovely apparition had rushed swiftly out of the February gloom and had disappeared as quickly. Color enough for you, my pre-Raphaelite masters! A dark purple jacket, a skirt of the same color, only a shade lighter, and a cap of the same—possibly a coat; a wide-awake, covered with the skin of some strange animal—a leopard or panther—with a black cock's feather for its single relief. She—she. I could not tell whether her face was pretty or the reverse; but I felt at least that she was supremely graceful, that she was possessed of the very eyes, lute abandon, that each supple limb was soft and pliant and obedient to the lightest behest of the soul.

She had passed me, I think, and had not noticed me at first. "How beautiful!" she whispered to herself, as she looked across the embankment. A white plume of smoke rose from the Sandshills, making them all golden, and lighted up for a passing moment the sea-fires. "How beautiful!" she said then suddenly, with a little cry of pain, "Ah! my foot!"

She stooped to undo her skate, and then she saw me. She took me, perhaps, for a poacher or vagrant, for she gave a sharp, hurried glance backward along the dyke, but her pain, or the fear, lasted but a moment. "I am afraid I must trouble you," she said, turning her eyes full upon me, "I must ask you to help me."

"Holdfast," I answered, for her voice interrupted.

She smiled; then I saw rightly how beautiful she was. Her smile lighted up her face as the sun rises lights up the sea.

"I am so glad. You are our neighbor, you know—or rather, you don't know. Could you undo my skate? It hurts my ankle. I am May Mavrell."

She held out her foot—a small, clean-cut, shapely foot, cased in a matchless little boot. A few inches of coarse stocking light and white were visible above the boot; for her petticoat, without being exactly scrimp, was obviously a very serviceable article, and by no means calculated to restrict the free use of the limbs. I loosened her skate, and she thanked me with many composure.

"I have had John, our fat coachman, to whom care I was made over. The ice must have given way with him. But, though it gets dark at midnight here, I can not find my way home."

I explained to her as well as I could that there was a short-cut across the heats to Mavrell, and offering to show her the way. She hesitated, advised her to quit the ice and her skates. She did so at once—with perfect docility, and without a shadow of coquetry. I was speaking to her—to a stranger. That February walk through the gathering gloom decided the course of my life. Her manner was frank and unreserved. She talked rapidly—at least, words came rapidly to her, and she flung them from her with a careless ripples of talk, dashing over into a spray of mockery. Yet her gray eyes dreamt as freely as they mocked; they were soft, and, on the left hand, though not vivid voluptuous pensiveness. In her eyes, indolent yet restless; in the gliding and swimming grace of her gait; in her whole bearing, I recognized a large easy goodness and transient flashes of fierceness, one had glimpses of a nature that might perhaps have erected away a weaker or a meaner.

We met Mr. Mavrell at the Park gate, anxious about his daughter. She introduced me at once. "This is Mr. Holdfast, the new curate at the Heughs"—for she had learned all about me already —"he has been so good as to bring me home when I had lost my way." His manner was simple and courteous, and as I left he promised to call for me on an early day, and hoped that we might meet often, now that we knew each other. Holdfasts and the Mavrells must have known each other of old."

I did not go home at once. I slowly retraced my steps to the dyke, and sat there for some time slowly. Yet I seemed to tread on air. A sudden rosy rapture had entered into my life. The old land-marks were transfigured; I hardly recognized them. I had taken a first deep draught of the wine of Love. The wind, as it blew off the sea, and a sea of silver light quivered and pulsed as it rose, kissed I saw her face only—the pure ample brows; the full lips, red and curled; the great gray, thoughtful eyes; with their long lashes; heard only the quick, bird-like twitter of her laugh; felt only the pressure of her hand, when I helped her to mount her horse.

I struggled from the first in a blind, ineffectual way against the fascination of this girl. But she took me captive as a snake takes captive a bird. Before many days had passed I gave up the contest, and passively submitted to be carried whithersoever my good or evil fate might lead me.

"Do you know, papa," she said, one day, while we were seated together in the afternoon twilight, "that I sometimes fancy I have got no soul?"

"You have got a temper, at least, my dear," said her father, blandly.

But she turned away from him with a little impatient shrug, and addressed herself to me.

"That church of yours is quite to my taste; Dr. Hackaback is such a ridiculous old dear! We must have him here, papa. Mr. Holdfast likes him as much as we do. And the sisters Peterson! I could study their bonnets forever. In Dr. Hackaback a good man, Mr. Holdfast?" she continued, with an air of innocent inquiry.

I supposed that he was very much like his neighbors.

"Then I must get him to be my confessor. I have no end of iniquities to confess. But he must choose between me and the Misses Peterson. I am sure that their opinions are evangelical—such bonnets as they now know I belong to the Broad Church, Mr. Holdfast."

"I fancy Mr. Holdfast is not much interested in your theological experiments, May dear. She is very tenacious, Mr. Holdfast, is May. Ten days ago she wanted to be a nun, and asked me for ever so much to buy a veil."

"Don't tell tales, papa. You know it was a Brussels one I wanted. But I belong permanently to the Broad Church."

"Your friends of the Broad Church," said Mr. Mavrell, "make things pleasant, at least."

"And what pleasanter things to be pleased?" May retorted. "I am a coward at heart, and the dreadful stories these Evangelical people tell, and the way they swear at one, frighten me out of my wits."

May certainly liked things to be pleasant. I think she was naturally of a brave spirit; but she feared pain as a dog does a thunderstorm. She wrapped herself in soft furs; she made herself a warm nest; she strove in every way to shut out from her the ugly things of this world—misery, sickness, disease, sin, death. And thus they became more terrible to her imagination, for they are things that require to be met face to face, and that grow in full of menace to the half-averted eye. She lived in the senses; and, like all who do so habitually, she had become timid and easily scared in the presence of the supernatural.

It was on these scampers across the sand-hills I brought her to the old church-yard of the district. On a bright green margin of turf that overhangs the sea, beneath the shadow of a ruined church and mountain ponies easily made their way, half a decen old head-stones, telling how Alexander Davidson, Elspa Ross, Donald Mac Ian, had died in the odor of sanctity, and "a broken chancel with a broken cross," whose venerable Culdees had worshiped God in their fashion—such was the place. Railed off from the common earth, but rank with coarse grass and nettles, was the burial-ground of the Mavrells. Generation for many years by, as we know, the late head of the house had chosen another resting-place. Peering through the railings, we could read the "Sybil Mavrell" had been laid there a century before.

"She was my great-grandmother." said May, after a long pause.

Then we turned our horses, and rode silently along the bushless downs.

She had left her high spirits during our ride, but now she spoke not a word. Then turning upon me she said, almost fiercely,

"Why, why have you me there? It makes me shudder to think that we must come to that. How I hate death! We are to make only to be put away in such places, to rot under those loathsome mounds! Martin, this is cruel of you."

I would have excused myself, but she would not listen.

"Let us gallop along the shore," she said; "the wet sand will not hurt the horses' hoofs so much. Come, God, there is life in me yet a while!"

She urged her pony with bridle and whip, and we galloped for some distance, side by side. Soon the roses came back to her cheek; her eye flashed as the pace grew fleeter; she blood danced merrily in her veins.

"I beg your pardon, Martin"—she called me Martin now, as if I was a cousin or a servant—"but that was very foolish of me. Life is so sweet, and then it is all so dark and dreary outside. Let us banish these evil fancies, and say good-by to the King of Horrors."

We had come to the fishers' village, and I dismounted for a moment to tighten a girth. As we paused, a sweet voice rose from a group of women who were seated on low three-legged stools in front of the cottages, baiting the lines for to-morrow's fishing. The words were many, I think, were these:

THE FISHER LAD.

Fisle, the lass with the golden curls,
Sings like the linnet or thrush in the squirrels
All night-long she sleeps in her nest,
And dreams of the fisher-boy out in the West.

All night-long! His voice is the last
And hours a song as he lies afloat—
A song about Fisle, the golden curls,
That blooms on the cliff where the night-wind blows.

The dun duck dives, and the roving bark
Flies, all night-long, from the land to the land;
And, heaving the herring-nets over the side,
Night-long the fisher-boy talks with the tide.

Under his feet the herring are streaming;
Over his head the stars are dreaming;
And he sits in his boat as it rocks in the light,
And watches and waits for the morning light.

The wind is soft, and the sea is still,
But never a mermaid whispers to him;
And the fisher-boy sighs for her softest gain,
But she won't beguile him out of his boat.

At break of day from the sandy bay
He draws his nets, and he sails away—
Over the foam let gipsies roam,
But Love is best on the sea at home!

May listened with delight. "It is Maggie Bastan, the cripple," I whispered.

"What a musical voice! I must get the air and the words. Let us speak to them. You know them, I suppose?"

We rode forward, and they greeted us with natural courtesy. May took possession of one of the three-legged stools, and sitting down beside the crippled child, fondled and caressed her. The child gazed admiringly upon the glorious beauty of the face, and was easily induced to repeat the simple air. May had a retentive memory, and in a wonderfully short space had made the air and the words her own. Then with a compassionate caress to the child, and a kindly greeting to the older women, she mounted again, and we rode home.

In the evening we criticised the new books, and tiring of this May went to the piano. "What do you think of Handel, papa?" she inquired, as she sang the little air—which she had got from the fisher-girl. Her voice was sweet as heaven; I was, perhaps, a little one-sided in my judgment as to any other voice save one. Then, again, she discoursed sad, sad music, and anon dashed into the riot of a wild Bacchanalian waltz.

"You recollect how they danced it at Paris, papa? Ah, that was the wildest, most picturesque thing imaginable. Do you know the step, Mr. Holdfast?"

"No, I don't dance."

"I can teach you it in a minute; like all these national dances, it looks intricate, but is in reality marvelously easy—so, this is the step."

And then bringing her feet out of her ample skirts—clean-cut, serviceable, matchless little feet —she showed me how it was done.

"You are not so clumsy as I expected. Now, give me your hand, and put the other round my waist. So-o-o. Oh, you ungrateful boy, you have torn my dress!" she exclaimed, with a little shriek of affected dismay, as she jumped from my arm.

As I walked home that night I understood how men and women had died for love. I had caught glimpses of a passionate rapture which might kill Ultra-limpha pedrina. I had had in my arms one who she had leaned against my heart, her hair had fanned my cheek. I did not sleep all night; I was sick with love. With love which was, as the Athenian poet said, none escape, neither mortal man nor the Undying Ones.

As I walked home I was provokingly fickle. Sunny showers and rain-touched sunbeams chased each other the livelong day. The spring was born amidst blustering and frequent tears.

On one of these days we were surprised by sudden storm. We were not far from the Heughs at the time when the rain began, and we took refuge in one of the gaunt old house. Somehow it did not look gaunt and desolate with the rain-clouds driving across the roof—it looked gauntest also on the 21st of June, of summer days. Ere we reached the door we were drenched to the skin, for the water came down in torrents. It was one of those storms which the heaven abandons itself to the luxury of tears, and grieves without restraint.

For the first time my mistress stood beneath my roof-tree, her gay plumes sadly draggled. Servants, however, there were none, save Philis, a cipher, and she took Miss Marvell under her wing. In a little while May returned, so disguised that I hardly knew her. But the little sparrow I adored. She had donned an old-fashioned silk dress, that had been intended originally for a much larger woman, had her dainty little feet and ankles clad from below an enormous hood that my grandmother or my great-grandmother had worn.

"I am the ghost of your grandmother come to rebuke you for your sins," said May. "My beloved grandchild," she continued, with charming gravity, "I have reflected from the next world, where I am comparatively comfortable, solely on your account. Evil communications corrupt good manners, and I do not like the company you keep. These English people at the Park are undermining your principles. Already you have believed the fearful stories which Dr. Hackaback told us. And you walked in the fields last Sabbath; next Sabbath you will steal the spoons; then you will take to drinking and gambling; then you will run away with a lady—then you will soure when Dr. Hackaback is preaching. Ichabod! Ichabod! the glory is departed!" She stood the perfect representative of the children drew the cloak round her face, and groaned over the backslidings of the house.

Her dramatic power was perfect. She would have made a great actress.

"That queer old duck, Goody," she continued, in her own person, "is a perfect treasure. She allowed me to ransack your grandmother's wardrobe. I hope you like the result," and she made me a comely courtesy, such as old Mrs. Dolman Holdfast may have made about the beginning of the last century.

I admitted that it did credit to her taste.

"I've a great mind to keep it for our theatricals in summer, and become me, I think. Martin, what a lovely face!"

As she spoke she pointed to a picture on the wall in a bright, gilt frame, which all the cavities that make life sweet were written.

"My mother's portrait."

"Your mother!" she said, in an altered tone. "It is a face one might trust forever. Martin, you are happier than I. You had a mother; I never knew mine. Perhaps—" She paused again.

A softer mood than I had ever known in her succeeded. I looked away, for there was a trouble in her voice. I looked away; but I understood how I must have fallen at her feet and kissed the hem of her robe. I never loved her so wildly, so passionately, either before or after, as I did at that moment. Her eyes, traveling round slowly and dreamily, rested on me; she recovered herself directly; her self-possession came back, and her softer mood was coming—told her of the words that quivered upon my lips.

A keen, defiant light came into her face. It said as plainly as words: "No, I shall not and can not hear you. I do not love you. Speak a word and I leave you forever." But aloud she only said, coldly, "I think the carriage must have come."

I resolved that I should go no more to the Park. It was clear, lure me on as she might at times, that she did not love me. And I—this poisonous joy which had crept into my blood was eating up my life. But I would not die! I would go for a week, gun in hand, I tramped over the sand-hills, returning at night weary and fagged and wretched.

At the end of the week came a note from May:

"Dear Mr. Holdfast,—I have been in bed a week, not an hotter. Kate Saville comes next month, and we must begin our rehearsals. But I can not make up my mind what play to choose. Will you come and help me to-day? Pray do. You know my aims at stage.

"M. S. M."

Of course I did not go: of course you would not have gone? Perhaps not: if you and I were wiser than Solomon and older than Methuselah. Otherwise I think I know what road we would take and where it would end us.

I had resolved to keep myself well in hand, but my passion was visible in my face. I think that ever Mr. Marcell must have noticed it; for after dinner, as we sat for a moment over the wine, he led the conversation to his daughter. He probably knew more of her experiences than I did, and goodnaturedly desired to warn me.

"She is a clever little witch, is May, but as untamable as a fox. It is a pity she is such a tremendous coquette—only all women are coquettes. Fill your glass, Mr. Holdfast; I got that wine from Nethermill."

He held up his own against the light as he continued:

"I think a taste for sound old claret is about the soundest taste we can cultivate. And it is a duty to single out natural enjoyments for the sorts of life are easily exhausted. The horizon grows gray; enjoyment flags; the senses fail us. We close up all the small but pleasant holes to enter that they are so few. And when they come, the supreme rewards of success are poor and valueless. Your mistress's kiss does not burn as it used to burn; the truth is, she bores you. You don't relish the wit and the critics as of yore; your stomach is not what it was, and you envy me (I——) old jokes. My good Sir, a woman is only—a woman; and when you once get behind the scenes you learn how you have been imposed upon, and swear never again to find a world of romance in a sheet of pasteboard and a pot of paint."

He filled his glass and passed meditatively.

"You know Clavering by name—an obstinate old ass; he made a terrible mess in life. Well, Clavering once said a good thing—by mistake. At a dinner of the mess of our time at Cambridge he got rather drunker than he had ever been, and made a delightful malapropism: 'Some of them are happily dead; others, alas! are married.' Our shout of laughter must have been terrific; and when he found that he had transposed the words he insisted on putting them right, amidst still noisier shouts. But I think the first edition was the best. Well, the true one, and had I been Clavering I would have stuck to it."

This was the philosophy that ushered me into the drawing-room, where the witch sat dreaming in the fire-light.

A witch indeed, as you would have confessed had you heard her sing that night to an arch, saucy air, half-passionate, half-mocking, that suited the words I will not repeat.

Love in my bosom, like a bee,
Doth suck his sweet;
Now with his wings he plays with me,
Now with his feet.
Within mine eyes he makes his nest,
His bed, amidst my tender breast;
My kisses are his daily fare,
And yet he calls me of my rest:
Ah! wouldst will you?

And if I sleep, he
With pretty slights
And makes his pillow of my knee.
The livelong night.
Strike I the lute, he tunes the string;
He music plays, if I but sing;
He feeds me every lovely hour
Yet cruel he my heart doth sting:
Ah! wouldst will you?

Rosalind can mock a little at love even while she complains, but I had taken the disease in its worst shape, and was past jesting. A physician would we physic Love!—would have said from the beginning that my malady was mortal.

Our thankful projects, however, kept us in the mean time constantly employed. But although we ransacked the literary we could not agree upon a piece. This play was too warm, that was too cold: we could not muster performers for one, nor properties for another.

"I wish we had a poet among us," said May; "only poets are such dull people to have in a country-house. I know a poet once. I was left to amuse him, and he nearly bored me to death. He told me that he had lost his heart to a particular friend of mine, but I didn't believe him. He had written so many rubbishing poems about the affections, that he had no heart left to lose. Do you recollect the song he wrote for me papa, and which you said had stolen from Master Lovelace? It went somehow thus, I think:

With jests and tears and smiles,
And fitful wilful wiles,
The May her groom beguiles:
But nay May keeps the grove
Of-true love in her face.

Around the May's hawthorn hedge,
And by the water edge,
The murmur of the sedge
But nay May's sweeter far
Than hawthorn hedges are.

The thrush repeats her lay,
And the sad nightingale
With passion floods the vale;
But nay May's whisper thrills
My soul among the hills.

The kisses of the May
Are scattered every day
On all who come this way;
But nay May's lips are kept
Like choicest violets.

And so the foolish fellow ran on, with much more on the same key. But he might help us now, could we lay hands on him. Do you recollect what he was called, papa?"

But Mr. Marcell had entirely forgotten.

"If we could sell advertise for him, I suppose; so we must do without him, and take one of these two. Which is it to be?"

The first was a little gay French vaudeville—artless as the best art is, but exquisitely graceful and petulant. There was absolutely nothing in the story, but the people in it talked about nothing in the most charming way. The hero and his mistress made desperate love; but they clearly didn't care a copper for each other, and their passion ran off in epigrams. "My beautiful lady," said the lover on his knees at last (he went down quite leisurely), "My beautiful lady, have pity on me." And the lady answered, "No, I have no pity. Je suis là belle dame sans merci." And so the play ended.

No, that would not do. Miss Partridge (that it was overlike the play she had on hand; so we chose the other. It was Goethe's Egmont.

Kate Saville had not yet appeared, and Miss Marcell and I read the great play together. There was something in it—in Clara's unreflective rapture, in Egmont's heroic recklessness—that fascinated her imagination.

I was but a sorry Egmont, I fear—so poor a performer that Miss Marcell would have dismissed the part out of my hand, and swore (as ladies swear) that she would be the Count herself. And then, snuffing herself in more overalet or shall I say put at hand, she would show me with adorable petulance how it was done; how Egmont, bending over his mistress, had undone the cloak, and disclosed the jeweled collar of the Golden Fleece. "But this is not Hy Egmont."

I would never that I lived through it all. I was like a man in strong fever, now on fire, anon my teeth chattering with cold. I felt as if I could not in agony, and then wish had poisoned my blood. As she bent over me that night, as I felt her breath touch my cheek, I was as helpless and as fiercely miserable as Othello. I knew that my senses were deserting me: this potent enchantress had changed me into wax and stone. I felt as if I could organize, and I fled affrighted from her spells. What if I should smother her in my blind rage, as the Moor smothered his bride? I saw her dead in the black pools of water on which the moonlight lay, I swore that, come what might, I should not go to her again.

I kept my word. I did not occasionally, like Faust. But Fate was stronger than my will. I was to see her once more beside the sea.

She had been unwell, and she came up to me with a beautiful flush on her face.

"Kate Saville has come," she said, "and we are ready for a rehearsal. Where have you been for ever so long?" Then, without waiting for my answer, "I hope you are perfect in your Egmont?"

"I do not mean to be Egmont," I answered, gloomily.

"You are not going to desert us, surely?"

"I shall not act."

"Mr. Holdfast, this is too bad. Kate will be inconsolable."

But I would not. She never asked my reason; she knew by instinct what I meant. She should have gone then; but she still waited.

"Will nothing bring you?" Come up to-night. Kate shall give you a song, her voice is superb; and I—I will give you a supper. Mr. Holdfast added, while a lovely one crossed her eyes and lighted up her mouth.

"Temptress!" I muttered, eying her almost savagely.

"My dear Martin," she said all at once, quite seriously, "I am afraid that you would funer than you took me for a witch. I suppose the best that you expect is to see me ride away on a broomstick;" and she affected to pout like a spoiled child that has been crossed.

But I looked her full in the face (for I had ceased to fear her—I was reckless and desperate), and I saw that her eyes did not defy me.

Then came the end.

I took hold of her hand as we stood together and clasped it in mine. She was not offended; she did not resist, I fancied there was an answering pressure. Her touch kindled all the blood in my body into a blaze. I turned and looked her full in the face. The spell fell off the rapturous moment and checks, which were pale with fear or passion or love, but it still lingered in her eyes, and I felt that her eyes answered. I stepped down and kissed her on the lips. I was mad with love, and her lips did not resist. For a moment they clung to mine, or seemed to. Then her head fell upon the cushion she could not have foregone that kiss. Then the softness died out of her eyes; her face grew cold and hard and cruel; she curled herself out of my arms, and retreating swiftly and stealthily, gained a little knoll, from which she turned and faced me. Her eyes were full of menace and crouched a little, as if with angry shame; at the very moment I thought of a panther-cat in act to spring.

"Sir!" she said, flashing out magnificently, "have you forgotten that you are a boor?"

The reaction was overwhelming and bitter pride, yet, turning suddenly, she bowed her face into her hands and sobbed convulsively. Her being shook beneath the storm. It was a summer shower; it was a convulsion of nature. I was by her side in a moment: my arm was round her waist, and she was tugging at the strings of her bat. "Loose them!" she said; "they are choking me." She sat down on the bank, but for many minutes could not control her hysterical sobs. Her whole nature was moved—perhaps it needed such a convulsion to teach her that she had a heart.

"May," I asked, penitently, "what have I done?"

"Martin, you have humbled me bitterly. It is my fault; I know that I led you on. I have been false, light, unmaidenly."

"You are the delight of my eyes," I murmured, passionately.

"No, no!" she replied, piteously; "do not speak so. You can not be so sorely hurt; it would make me miserable to think that you were hurt."

"Hurt!" I exclaimed; "it is a hurt I shall carry with me to the grave—gladly." Then such a look of pained entreaty crossed her face that I stopped abruptly. For a moment there was silence; but she did not speak.

"May," I whispered, "you know how I love you; can not you love me a little?"

"No," she said, steadily, through her sobs; "I have no love in my heart. I am too hard to love. I do not love you." I turned very pale; and her eyes sought mine pitifully. "Martin, how have I deserved you? You must have known how cold my heart was. Why you have been so blind?"

"May—May!—might you not learn to love me?"

"It is impossible," she said. Her tears were dried, and she had gathered herself up to go. Her face was hardening again. Her mood had changed —as I presently knew. I felt the chill coming. "It is impossible. It can not be."

Yet I persevered; what will not a man do for dear life when he is drowning? "Do not shut hope out from me," I said.

"It is best to speak plainly at once," she replied —and her voice had recovered its clear, musical, mocking ring; "I can not give you my love, for among other reasons—it is pledged to another. Lord Audley——"

"Audley!" I echoed, mechanically.

"Yes, Audley—the House of Commons man. Audley is not betrothed;" and then added, God knows with what bitterness, "My lord, my lover, my hero, my Egmont."

"Are you in earnest?" I said, sneedily, yet with unnatural calmness—for I was dazed by her cruel beauty—"Are you in earnest, or a tiger-cub?"

Then I turned upon my heel and left her where she stood. She did not call me back; yet I listen sometimes for the sound. It is fancy only that I hear her say "Martin" softly amidst a low burst of weeping. I never saw her again.

* * * * *

I never saw her again. My heart was still hard against her when I heard one say, "She is dead." Even in death I could forgive her. Had she not burned up my heart? Had she not lured me to the very gates of hell? Had she not left me with a blight, black and withering, about me? But one day (when my fever was over—for I had been stricken by the plague of which she died) I remembered her tenderness, and, along the shore till I reached the church-yard among the sand-hills. A new name, I noticed, was carved upon the wall. Another "May Sybil Marcell" had been "laid out" of the sunshine under where the rank nettles grow. Then—remembering who had last stood by my side in the church-yard—that April evening—my heart forgave her, and all my fierce love turned into tender pity. She might have been fickle and treacherous; but at least she had had my whole heart, and she had been to me what no other woman could be again.

And it may be I'd say sometimes to myself, as the old bitterness returns for a moment) that I am her debtor. She taught me in a few days the love on which old men, even in their fourscore years, have sometimes failed to learn. It takes long to eradicate a love that grew out of the heart; many a bitter dismissal, many a sharp disillusion to make a man utterly happy and apathetic. But I took my dose at a draught, and since that hour am cured.

Old Tom Cat, then set defunct! Catsleep ended thy days. Thy cat-head is broken. No more will you catenate Thanksgiving and Christmas. Thy catcalls will no more be heard. The catastrophe was in the category of thy life. No catalogue will bear thee to the catacombs. Cat-birds will ring around no more for thee. Nor cat-fish. They will rejoice in thy death. The catastrophe that bound thee for time like a brazen fetter. The cataclysm will be shed on thy tomb. Thou hast been the "Catline" of thy circle. Thy loud wail will no doveny caterpillar. Thy catarrh will be taken off then. Thy cat-harpings are silenced. Thy catacombs will be scraped in thy memory. Thy catacombs will be hushed forever. Thou hast gone down to the kitchen of eternity. Thou hast stopped thy last catafrom rip. Thou art erased from the catalogue of cadavers. Thy catechist will be closed. Cats-foe will grieve on thy grave, and catch up catenulatable. And catenulatable. And catenulatable. Now rip-rap over thy resting place for ought we care. Adieu, old Tom Cat—last adieu!

A Connecticut deacon was asked what a very poor and feeble pair of oxen to a very large load of wood. A neighbor asked him as he expected to get the large a load to market with so poor a team. The deacon replied that he expected to have some assistance from Divine Providence. His neighbor asked him whether it would not be as well to dispense entirely with the oxen and let Providence draw the whole load.

A pair of lovers, fleeing from stern and cruel parents, were married in the cars near St. Louis the other day. The bride scrawled to the conductor to send his daughter home, but he telegraphed back: "I never return a fair on this road."

THE BARBER OF BALLEN.

The barber of Ballen was five feet high,
His wife measured five feet ten;
She wasn't a Vienna in figure or face,
And he was the monkey of men.

The fair lady's temper had evil repute,
Her short husband was pitied by all;
Her tongue, like a pendulum, constantly swung,
And her language was rounded and full.

A young friar came off the dame to confess,
But whether she told him the truth,
The author would like to know is strange:
While the friar kept his counsel—nine youth.

One morning at breakfast the chocolate was hot,
And the fair lady's temper not cool;
The barber complained of caloric, but she Cried her hand with a shrewd-ish scowl.

"Pray taste it, my love, and see what I say
It is quite truth, on your Pope's word you'll
I know 'tis as cool as the air on the bridge,"
So she tasted to show her humanity.

Chocolate once heated remains very hot
For a very long period of time—
So the fair lady found to her resultant regret,
While it served but her temper to prime.

The lady her stalwart arm raises on high
To hurl at her little lord's head.
The fluid that peppered her petulant tongue—
When an accident happened instead.

That instant the friar appears at the door,
Intending their breakfast to share.
When splash goes the chocolate all over his face,
And spreads in the route of his hair.

JAMES STEPHENS.

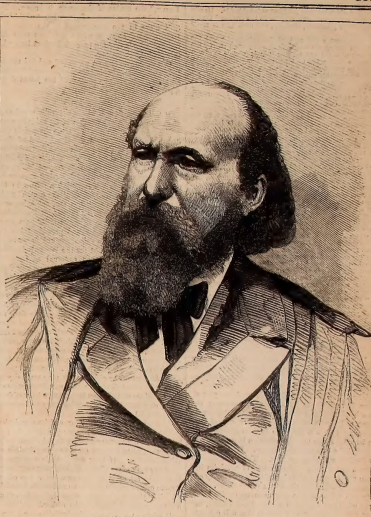
JAMES STEPHENS, founder and chief of the Irish Fenian Brotherhood, was born in the county of Kilkenny, in Ireland, in 1823.

He was a civil engineer, and was little known at the time O'BRIEN, JOHN MITCHEL, and a few other tried patriots formed the party of Young Ireland, and, after the famine of 1847–8, made an appeal to insurrection. A large number of enthusiastic young men responded to this appeal. At their head STEPHENS placed himself, determined to share the perils braved by O'BRIEN.

The arrest of O'BRIEN put an end to the movement, and STEPHENS found refuge in France, where he joined O'MAHONY, who had also fled thither, and who is now at the head of the American order of Fenians.

After a stay of some years in Paris STEPHENS returned to Ireland, and organized a secret society of vast proportions, which is to-day known as the Fenian Brotherhood. It is perhaps not generally known that STEPHENS is the sole author of Fenianism; that he alone understands all the secrets of the Brotherhood; and that three times already he has crossed the Atlantic for the purpose of organizing and developing, with the aid of his friend JOHN O'MAHONY, the Fenian Brotherhood in this country.

STEPHENS, as is well known, was arrested, and a short time afterward escaped from Richmond Bridewell, where he was imprisoned, in Dublin. The story of his escape would no doubt be interesting, but all we know of the matter is, that very little which has been told is exactly true.



The celebrated Fenian chief has been for some time in Paris. He has determined to leave France for this country; but not to stay here, it being his intention soon to return to Europe.

EXPLOSION AT ASPINWALL.

THE last Pacific steamer from Panama, the Arizona, brings the news of a terrible catastrophe at Aspinwall caused by the explosion of seventy cases of nitro-glycerine, which formed part of the freight of the British steamer European at that port. The upper works of this steamer were all blown into fragments, and the lives of about fifty persons were destroyed by the first explosion. Two subsequent explosions took place, adding still further to the loss of life, the last one resulting in the total destruction and sinking of the European, which had been towed out into the harbor. This event took place on the morning of April 3, just as nearly all the local freight had been delivered. The Panama Star and Herald gives the following account:

"The wharf at which the vessel was discharging, and which was some 400 feet long, was literally torn to pieces, the superstructure was completely demolished to within a hundred feet of the freight-house, and hardly a plank remained in the entire length of the structure that was not wrenched from its fastenings. Immediately in front of where the vessel lay a gap was cut through the wharf—piles, planking, etc., all disappearing. The ship and wharf both caught fire, and the latter was saved from entire destruction only by the exertions of several citizens, who got the fire-engine to work, and after a few hours extinguished the flames, regardless of the risk they incurred from another explosion of the burning ship. The Panama Railroad Company's splendid freight-house is left a pile of ruins. The force of the air caused by the concussion seems to have raised the roof—which was composed of iron and slate—upward, a few feet, thrown weight bringing it down with immense force into the building, and carrying with it both the end walls, leaving the house excepting a few side walls, which appear but little, if at all injured, a mass of ruins. It would be difficult to imagine a more complete wreck than that presented by the freight-house and wharf.

"Scarcely a building in the place escaped without more or less damage, those of a substantial nature suffering most; nearly all the brick and stone buildings were badly injured, but the freight-house is the only one we have sword of which has been rendered unbalustrable. Hardly a whole window of glass remains in the city, and the destruction of glassware, crockery, and such like is really wonderful.

"The most awful part of the catastrophe was the dreadful loss of life and suffering attending it. Of the number killed and missing it is impossible to give a correct estimate, but from present data the number may safely be put down at fifty, and is, we fear, more likely to prove over than under that number. Of the ill-fated steamship we owner of the Bluegown I have been killed and 12 are missing. The ship was engaged on the coast and 12 are missing. From the Press.

THE GREAT GOLD GIFT DISTRIBUTION.

We desire to caution our readers against confounding the establishment of the Cosmopolitan Manufacturing Company, associated with the "enterprise" which is advertised in the daily press, and which the purchaser finds on investigation to be mere earth-penny affairs, gotten up for the purpose of disposing of the big ends of worthless goods from the stocks and establishments of the East. So far as article is sold by Messrs. Calkins & Co. but is worth all it is represented to be; and, indeed, the known character and reputation of the firm itself is a sufficient guarantee for the responsibility of the associates they represent. Were each not the case, visitors would not favorably notice establishment in the city, at 169 and 171 Broadway, as they now do, nor would they go away with free-as-bright smiles of satisfaction.—Mining Press, April 1, 1865.

We want agents in every town and county, and in every business, and to those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every envelope ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will receive 25 cents for every envelope, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. X.—NO. 489.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 12, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

THE illustrations on this page and on page 292 are thus described in the following notes by our "Special," A. R. W.:

"WILD-CATS AT NASHVILLE.

"At a restaurant known as STEDMAN'S there was, among other animals, a magnificent pair of wild-cats, just caught in the neighborhood of Nashville, and awfully savage, the male showing his temper, if teased, by immediately attacking the female, who would then, standing up on her hind feet, deliver battle with heavy blows from her talloned paws.

LEVEE AT CINCINNATI.

"When I reached the 'Queen City' it was in a great ferment. FIFE'S Opera-house and other buildings had burned down the night before, and the magnificent city engines were playing upon the ruins.

"The good people of Cincinnati look upon their city as 'some pumpkins' in a business point of view, and point to their levee as an illustration. I should imagine that the levee does nearly as much business as six New York piers. At about 'starting time' there is a great confusion of bells, whistles, and Calliopes.

"THE CALLIOPE.

"Attracted by one of the latter, I went aboard to see how the thing was done. The reader will see how from the sketch I have made. Certainly it was the best iron-clad music I had heard; and, strange to say, the whistles were in tolerable tune.

"At 12 the next noon I went aboard the General Anderson, a Louisville boat, and bade adieu to the Queen City, which presented more of a picture than when I entered it. The tall tower of the Catholic church loomed up against the smoky atmosphere and indistinct outline of hills beyond the city, while springing out over the river the new suspension-bridge to Covington hung pendent from its massive towers. Swiftly slipping down the river, swollen and muddy, past the weather-beaten shanties, gas-houses, and shapeless coal-barges, and then on past the plateau on which Cincinnati stands, the bluffs rapidly close in upon the river, on the right hand presenting slopes devoted to the culture of orchards and the vine. This bank for some distance presents the appearance of suburbs, with buildings picturesque but, as usual, unpainted, and with roads leading up over the tree-crowned heights.

"Having heard much about the superior beauty of Western ladies, I had gone about Cincinnati with an artist's eye for the study of that interesting subject. I recollect how some Western people jeered at a picture in Harper's Weekly entitled "Types of Female Beauty." It was an amusing commentary on their remarks to find that a certain vendor of a quack nostrum advertised as a beautifier of the fair sex had transferred one of the heads from that engraving to his show-bill, as a specimen of the glorious results to be attained from the use of his manufacture.

"RELIGIOUS SERVICE ON THE 'RUTH.'

"The Ruth, one of the finest river boats, went down the Mississippi from Cairo with your artist, a full complement of passengers, and, it was said, 2600 tons of freight. As among this transient population there were twelve ministers on their way to the General Conference of the Southern Methodist Episcopal Church in New Orleans we had service on the Sabbath in the gorgeous cabin of the steamer. The President was prayed for, but Congress was ignored. The amens to the name of JOHNSON were many and emphatic. The congregation was attentive, among the most devout being some gamblers. At the close of the service a subscription was proposed for the benefit of the Methodist Church in Fredericksburg, Virginia, destroyed by the war. To this I noticed that two Jews contributed, anxious, I suppose, to stand well with their Southern brethren of the Gentile persuasion. As far the ministers they exhibited feelings of bitterness toward the North quite unworthy of their profession. One of them, shortly after the service, I heard relating an interview with the HARPERS in New York, in which he had openly avowed to one of that firm his regret that they should be obliged to purchase their publications. Mr. HARPER, he said, asked him if he was not one of those who objected to the education of the negro. His answer was that, on the contrary, they of the South wished to instruct that race to save them from being robbed by the North, as the white people of the South had been. This was received as happily by the others as though a fine point had been made.

"I could not but be aware of the curious social atmosphere which pervaded this company of travelers, composed of Southern and Northern people with a sprinkling of Jews and foreigners. Outward politeness was every where visible, but there was not one atom of cordiality between the different sections. The Southern people mixed with the others, but they showed more of curiosity and nervous desire to hear their sentiments than of friendly feeling toward their countrymen. They are very inconsistent. Professing the greatest desire to let by-gones be by-gones, they will yet tell you in the next breath, and without any apparent idea of the contradiction, that the hatred which the North has earned of the South can not be wiped away, and that the two sections are wider apart than ever.

their places on a pile of corn sacks at the bow, and, waving a flag, sang, as is usual with them on leaving port. They were a fine body of stalwart Kentuckians and Virginians, and had been hard at work the day and night previous getting in the cargo. The tone was monotonous, and the doggerel rhymeless, and devoted to suggestions to the Captain to come down with a treat of "brandy-wine." A big come down with a treat of "brandy-wine." A big of whisky fixed them, however, and they were soon spread about on the piles of cargo."

In addition to the illustrations of the South already alluded to, we give on page 296 a view of Shockhoe Creek Valley, Richmond, Virginia, of which a description is given on page 292; also on page 297 a graphic sketch by Mr. FORBES of a cotton team in North Carolina. Not the least interesting of our pictorial pictures is that on page 300, of the Negro Celebration in Washington, of which a description is there given.

THE CONGRESSIONAL PLAN OF REORGANIZATION.

THE propositions of the Reconstruction Committee will strike every thoughtful citizen as perfectly reasonable. They seem to us to justify the hope of the most truly intelligent and patriotic persons that Congress would propose no policy upon which the whole Union party of the country, including the President, might not agree. Some concessions of opinion were inevitable upon all sides. Those who held with Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS that there should be perpetual confiscation, or with Mr. SUMNER that impartial suffrage should be immediately established throughout the country, or with the President that no further conditions whatever were necessary, must have seen that the opinion of the country did not support them, and that all must meet upon some firm and reasonable middle ground such as the Committee now offers.

The objection to what is called the President's policy is plain and conclusive. It is that, by allowing the late rebel States to resume their full relations in the Union immediately, and without further provision, those States would have only gained political power by the act of the rebellion. This gain arises from the fact that every colored man, as a slave, counted as three-fifths of a man in the basis of representation; but as a freeman he counts as a whole man. In a State like South Carolina, therefore, where the colored population is half or even more than half of the whole, and where they have by the Constitution the same right of suffrage as the white race, the political power of a voter has practically twice the power of a voter in a State like Connecticut. This is an absurdity and injustice so conspicuous as to command instant application.

On the other hand, the objection to the imposition of equal suffrage by the National Government as a precedent condition of full restoration of full rights in the Union is practical and twofold. In the first place, it is hardly to be presumed that the States which prohibit equal suffrage, or limit it to a colored skin altogether, would insist upon its adoption by the suspended States; and, in the second place, such a proposition would have been very widely regarded as a radical blow at the most sacred of State rights, and a consummation of centralization. Moreover, there are many of the most faithful and liberty-loving Union men, who are the steady advocates of equal suffrage, and who, under the circumstances, do not doubt the entire competency of Congress to require this or any other condition which might seem to it necessary, but who doubt the wisdom of this method, and question the expediency of such a requirement, and who could not therefore heartily sustain it.

But we see no good reason for supposing that all reasonable and patriotic men should not sincerely agree upon the propositions presented. They have reference exclusively to national relations. They do not interfere in the State concerns, except in defense of national rights. They declare simply, in the first place, that no State shall abridge the privileges of citizens of the United States. Such a proposition is of the irresistible argument. Every citizen of this country should be equally a citizen every where in it; this is plain, and therefore all his civil rights as a citizen of the United States should be sacred wherever the national flag floats. Can the President, with all his warm convictions of the sanctity of States, object to so obviously just a provision?

In the second place, whenever the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of the male citizens of a State who are of age, except for crime or participation in the rebellion, the basis of representation shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizen shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age. In other words, if South Carolina shall choose to disfranchise 100,000 of her citizens because of their color, or New York shall choose to do the same thing because of want of property, then each of those States shall suffer in the national representation just in that proportion. Such a provision stimulates every State to enlarge the suffrage, and to extend education in order to make the suffrage safe. It is strictly harmonious with the principle expressed with to base representation upon the number of voters.

In the third place, the Committee recommend that until the 4th of July, 1870, four years hence, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the rebellion shall be excluded from voting at national elections. This article we understand to be meant to embody the President's desire that "treason shall be made odious," and that in the great work of reorganization the late rebel leaders shall "take back seats." In his frequent and vehement expression of that desire the President unquestionably spoke for the loyal country, and his sentiments are still further incorporated in the proposed bill to render certain of those leaders ineligible to office under the government of the United States. This third proposition is that one which seems to us likely to occasion most difference of opinion. That it is in strict accordance with Presidential views is probable; that it is true, but it is a point of doubtful policy, not essential to the general plan, and, it seems to us, might be safely omitted.

The fourth proposition is a matter of course, that neither the United States nor any State shall assume to pay any debt incurred in aid of the rebellion, or for any claim for the emancipation of any slave, and Congress is authorized to enforce the provisions of this article.

These are the propositions of the Committee, which are now generously and unanimously by the Union vote in Congress, because they are perfectly just and moderate, and because they do not claim to reap more than has been sown. They imply neither a revolution in the ultimate result of the war as recognized by the general conviction of the loyal country, and as has already been officially declared by President JOHNSON. They contain nothing vindictive, and if the Government of the United States has any right whatever to do any thing whatever to prevent the late States from again gaining political power by their rebellion, it may challenge the whole world and its late domestic enemies to show any reasonable objection to what, or ungenerous in the settlement it proposes. We believe that the vast body of the Union party of the country which carried the war successfully to the end, and which has consistently elected LINCOLN and JOHNSON, will most cordially sustain this policy of reorganization and gladly appeal to the country to ratify it. And however anxious the Administration may be to see loyal men from the late disturbed States admitted to Congress, we shall be very slow to believe that it will decline to submit any question to a plan which does not conflict with any of his known opinions, and which secures the admission of loyal members to Congress with the hearty desire and congratulation of the whole loyal country.

That the proposed settlement of the Committee should be thus unanimously agreed upon by those who have persistently declared that Congress is a bloody, factious, revolutionary body is natural. These objectors have counted upon perpetuating the disunion and destroying the Union party by fomenting every real or asserted difference between them. But there is the amplest evidence in the proposition. Here is the plain proof that Congress seeks only the speediest reorganization of the Union upon the most temperate and reasonable conditions. For we judge that there will be little delay in ratifying the report; and then, so great and unprecedented is the occasion, we trust that the Legislatures of the States will be immediately summoned in special session to act upon the proposed amendment, that Congress and the country and the world may know the will of the people of the United States upon this most vital point of national policy.

THE CHOLERA AND THE QUARANTINE.

FOR more than a year the arrival of the cholera at the port of New York has been expected. The memory of its former horrors was very vivid. The certainty of its terrible ravages when it should appear was indisputable. So great was the apprehension and the desire that the city should be protected by every means that a Board of Health of extraordinary powers, not, however, including those of a Quarantine, had been created. There was a health officer specially charged with the sanitary defense of the port from foreign ships. There had been a body of Quarantine Commissioners for two years, whose duty was to find a suitable site for the Quarantine buildings. Every precaution had apparently been taken, when, on the 9th of April, the emigrant ship England, with 1200 passengers, arrived at Halifax. The cholera was raging on board, and there had been fifty deaths upon the passage. The pestilence was plainly at hand, and the efficiency of our New York preparations would doubtless be soon proved. And so it chanced; for on the afternoon of the 18th the emigrant ship Virginia, with 1043 passengers, arrived in the Narrows, after having had upon it upwards of thirty-eight deaths by cholera upon the passage, and the disease still raging.

It then appeared that the sole preparation in this port consisted of the hospital ship Falcon, which was ready for service! As soon as possible, by putting on board a crowd of laborers, she was made ready, and on the 21st the sick were removed from the Virginia. As soon as possible, also, another ship, the Illinois, was prepared, and the well passengers were received upon her. If the fact were not tragical it would be unspeakably ludicrous. The chief port of the Western continent, after a year's warning, was wholly unprepared to deal directly and adequately with the approach of a fearful pestilence. The probabilities were that it would come, as it did come, in an emigrant ship. It was known that such ships are crowded, often with more than a thousand passengers. The most extensive hospital accommodations were the most pressing necessity, and they were not ready. The difficulties may have been many, but there are cases in which difficulties must not be pleaded, and this was one of them. Somewhere, somehow the State of New York should have been ready for the event, and it was not ready.

We say the State, because the Health officer, in his explanatory letter, says that the Legislature up to the time of its adjournment had left the Quarantine Commissioners without any money. They had not funds even to erect hospitals on Staten Island, or Long Island, or Coney Island—the only New York shores of the bay; and New Jersey had refused them a foothold upon her territory. On the day that the England arrived at Halifax the Commissioners had telegraphed to the Secretary of the Navy asking for vessels. Two days afterward two were offered, but they proved unsuitable; and then vigorous measures were adopted to fit the Falcon for immediate service. But this explanation is unsatisfactory. The Atlanta was here last November. The cholera was very sure to come early in the spring. There were no hospital accommodations but the ship Falcon. It was clear that more could be none upon the shores of the bay. Whose fault was it that the Falcon was not ready even on the 15th of April? Whose fault was it that no other ships were asked for until the 9th of April? If the Legislature perilously postponed the necessary appropriations, why was no statement made to the public that the imminent danger of the situation might have been known and proper pressure brought to bear upon the Legislature? The Virginia and England are now both in port. After the former arrived the Quarantine Commissioners asked the authorities at Washington for the temporary use of the Illinois, but omitting to say that it should be devoted to military and similar public purposes. The Commissioners appeal, therefore, to the Board of Health to allow them some point of land on the shore of the Board for the accommodation of quarantined passengers, declaring that the floating accommodations are insufficient.

The state of the case, then, is this: There are some 2000 persons detained in Quarantine. The sole hospital is the old ship Falcon, which accommodates not more than a hundred patients, to which, as we write, the Saratoga and Portsmouth are added. The shelter of well passengers is the steamship Illinois. There is a large quantity of hospitals on the adjacent land, and the Commissioners say that the floating accommodations are insufficient. Other infected ships are daily expected, and we have no other information. Meanwhile the Board of Health have asked for the use of the military hospitals at Fort Schuyler upon Throg's Neck, at the point of Long Island Sound. It is idle to assert that this dilemma arises from the destruction of the hospitals upon Staten Island; for that part of the island upon which they stood is now virtually a thickly-settled portion of the city of New York, and no effectual quarantine was possible there as long as there was a fever in the neighborhood proved. It is not to the acts of a population which had no other remedy against a mortal disease planted among them, but to the avarice and the selfishness of politicians and merchants that the absence of a suitable quarantine is to be ascribed.

The history of the New York Quarantine is briefly this: In 1758 the first hospital and offices were placed by the Colonial Legislature upon Bedloe's Island. In 1796 they were removed to Governor's Island, where they remained until the yellow-fever in 1799. The next year the Quarantine was established upon Staten Island, against the remonstrances of the inhabitants, a large of whom were destroyed by the yellow-fever from the hospital in the very first year of their erection. From that time onward the population continually protested, until, in 1848—when there were a hundred and eighty persons attacked by infectious diseases from the Quarantine—the outrage became so undeniable that, upon careful inquiry, a Committee of the Legislature recommended its immediate removal. In 1849 an act was passed for that purpose, and for the establishment of hospitals at Sandy Hook. Certain shipping interests in New York thwarted the operation of the act, and nothing further was done until 1856. In that year the Staten Island and Long Island shores were desolated by the yellow-fever, and the Legislature, in March, 1857, again ordered the removal of the Quarantine station. The Commissioners under the act applied to the Legislature of New Jersey to obtain Sandy Hook, and were again defeated by the same shipping interest, by the remonstrances of the Health Officer, the Board of Underwriters of New York, and the Commissioners of Emigration. Meanwhile the population became to prevent constant communication between the hospital-grounds and the other side of the wall, the seat of a dense population, mainly of a class which could not remove. The helplessness, suffering, and mortality of the inhabitants were such that the Board of Health of the town declared the establishment an intolerable nuisance, and called upon the citizens of the country to abate it without delay; and on the evenings of the 1st and 2d of September, 1858, without the least injury to the patients, who were carefully removed and protected, the buildings were burned to the ground by the people of the neighborhood. One man was accidentally shot by an employé of the institution, but the destruction was so little indicative of a riotous spirit that the property-holders in the vicinity considered that their property was enhanced in value fifty per cent. by the removal.

It is nearly eight years since the buildings were destroyed, and it is only during the session of the Legislature just ended that an act was passed to erect new hospitals upon the west bank of the Kill von Kull. The question of this act is not thwarted as all the others have been, New York may possibly be ready for the next pestilence. But for the present she is shamefully unprepared: and during the sweltering and the strict isolation of the ships have checked the progress of the disease for a time, the crowding of the passengers who may be subject to quarantine is already assured. The Health Officer says, "The roughness of the bay, from the high winds, makes it very unpleasant for all, and many are quite sick-sick." The present Quarantine arrangements are a disgrace to New York.

On page 302 the reader will find a descriptive Map of the Bay and the position of the ships.

MR. SEWARD'S DIPLOMACY.

MR. SEWARD'S letter of February 12, to the French Minister, the MARQUIS DE MONTHOLON, is a clear statement of the case, and replies with courtesy but with firmness the exact position of the United States in the Mexican complication. It has settled the question. France will leave Mexico without the appearance of compulsion, while the honor and peace of the United States are maintained. This is another of the signal services of Mr. SEWARD to his country, which will be gratefully remembered in extenuation of many harsh words privately spoken, and of much apparent alienation of sympathy from the cause to which he has given his life long ago. The policy he has pursued in the French difficulty is surely preferable to the Captain Bobadil method, which unfortunately urged upon him in some quarters—a method of managing such questions which does not tend to keep the peace of the world.

The United States, according to Mr. SEWARD, do not question the right of France to settle her accounts with other nations in any manner which pleases her. If Mexico refuses to pay debts justly owing to French subjects, upon such subjects are maltreated in Mexico, it is certainly competent for an independent Power like France to demand of Mexico satisfaction. The right, on the other hand, does the United States Government deny that any form of government voluntarily adopted by the citizens of Mexico must be respected. But the war in Mexico has become one of political intervention, which, in the judgment of this Government, menaces the interests of the United States; and which is no satisfactory evidence that the people of Mexico have established an empire, nor is such evidence possible while the French army remains.

As for the Monroe doctrine, upon which the French foreign Minister and others so loudly deplore, Mr. SEWARD bravely says that it is not to be denied that that doctrine has constantly and even wisely endured in the attempts to lay sure foundations of broad Republican liberty; and no foreign State can rightfully interfere in such trials, and, on the ground of a desire to correct them, deprive the people of their natural right of domestic self-government. The United States, therefore, must continue to recognize the Republic of Mexico, with which they have always maintained relations, and can not know the Austrian Archduke MAXIMILIAN as a Mexican Emperor.

The alternative is not stated, but it is plain. If the republic, our ally, should ask for aid in expelling an invader, it would be for us to consult our interests, which, as the wise and prudent ruler of France must see, would lead us to ——! The French Minister of Foreign Affairs, in his response replies that the withdrawal of the French troops will begin in November.

At the same time, hearing that Austrian re-crults, under the countenance of the Austrian Government, were to replace the Frenchmen, Mr. SEWARD writes a brief dispatch to Mr. MOTLEY, our Minister at Vienna, asking him to request a friendly and just statement of the position Austria intends to assume in Mexico, and to announce, in as equally friendly and just spirit, that hostilities in Mexico carried on by Austrian subjects with the consent of their Government will be considered war waged by Austria against the Mexican republic, of which the United States could not engage to remain silent or neutral spectators. Such friendly and just conduct on all sides will doubtless induce Austria, deserted by France and threatened by Prussia, not to sanction such hostilities. The Emperor MAXIMILIAN will then be about ready to take passage for home, and Mexico will resume, unmolested, her staggering journey toward national existence.

Less staggering than Mr. SEWARD's and a different temperament would have managed these matters differently. But his ability and adroitness in the Trent affair, and his tranquil tenacity in this French complication, rank him with the most accomplished diplomatists. It was a fashion some years ago to deride him as a doctrinaire; but it would be easy to find greater common-sense in the management of difficult affairs than Mr. SEWARD has shown in these transactions, and we regret all the more that he seems inclined to treat our domestic questions in a tone or petulant persiflage.

ON TAX-GATHERING.

THE public revenue from taxes, direct and indirect, during each of the fiscal years 1865-6 and 1866-7, is officially estimated at $525,000,000—say $16 50 per head of the total population of the United States—being 33 per cent more than is paid by the population of Great Britain and Ireland, and about 100 per cent. more than is paid by the people of France. It is clear that when JEFFERSON BRICK, in the next Fourth of July oration, refers to the "worn-out despotisms" of the Old World, it will be but prudent to omit the usual sarcastic allusion to "tax-ridden people."

Heavy as the taxes are, however, they are and will continue to be cheerfully paid, so generally is it understood that the money thus raised is incurred for a proper purpose, and that the national credit must be preserved at whatever cost.

But there can be no question of the inefficiency of rendering the present onerous tax system needlessly odious by unjust, inquisitorial, and insulting practices in the collection of taxes. Common sense indicates that the tax-gatherer, while doing his best to protect the Government's interest, should not go out of his way either to outrage the feelings or to injure the interests of the people from whom he collects taxes. It is not quite certain that our present tax-gatherers altogether realize that principle.

There can be no question, for instance, but the publication of the income-tax return last year was a gross outrage. It was a shameful invasion of the privacies of business. It may have served to bring to shame some rogues who had concealed their income for the purpose of cheating the Government. But for the sake of this barren revenge how many honest men were humiliated by the public parade of their misfortunes! A merchant's credit rests upon the proportion borne by his gains to his losses. To compel him to publish the results of his business each year is a method of despotism unparalleled in Russia, Turkey, or Morocco. Yet this is what our tax-gatherers did last year, apparently with the approval of the authorities at Washington. The outrage was regarded with amazement in England, where, with becoming delicacy, the collector keeps his returns as inviolable secrets. Can the Americans put pay taxes?" said a good English friend, on reading the income-tax returns as published in our papers; "the Americans will endure without a murmur invasions of private rights which would plunge England into revolution."

Nor was the form and principle of the income-tax returns last year less objectionable. On the back of the return were a number of questions which will be readily remembered. The gist of these questions was: "Are you not a confirmed liar? and have you not perjured yourself in the within return?" Now is there any common sense in thus gratuitously insulting tax-payers? If the original return be false the signer will not stickle at repeating on the outside the falsehood he has already stated in the inside. If the original return be true, the signer will justly feel indignant at being repeatedly charged with roguery. In general these income-tax returns must be matters of honor. No investigation, however inquisitorial, will enable the officers of Government to detect the false statements rendered by a rogue. Why suggest the idea of fraud? In actual business every one has learned by experience that the surest way to get cheated is to assume that you are going to be cheated, and to take all possible and offensive precautions. Revenue officers should remember this, and bear being also in mind that their calls on the public are of their nature unwelcome, should not render them doubly so by useless and irritating hints at knavery.

Last year, when the income-tax returns were made, a ruling of the Revenue Commissioner required a man to pay income-tax on all profits he had made, and did not allow him to deduct his losses from his gains. Thus, if a man had made $10,000 in teas and sugars, and had afterward bought ships and lost $20,000, the income-tax gatherers insisted on the tax on the $10,000 without regard to the loss of $20,000. No man, it seems, cared to resist so iniquitous and absurd a decision, and many men who had really no income at all paid the full tax nevertheless. A recent ruling of the Commissioner partially corrects this injustice. This year taxpayers will be allowed to deduct from profits all losses from their business gains. But they will not be allowed to deduct losses from fixed investments in stocks and bonds or real estate. Thus, if a man, in 1865, owned real estate which yielded him $10,000 a year, and at the same time lost by dealings in real estate or merchandise $25,000 that, in reality, he had in that year no income whatever—he will still be required to pay income-tax on $10,000. Whether such a decision as this can be maintained in the courts may be doubted. There can be no question whatever but that the practical effects of such decisions is to arouse animosity against a revenue system so harshly administered.

Judge SHALLEY has lately rendered a decision which is of much importance. Heretofore assessors, after accepting certain returns submitting them to collectors who conducted the money specified therein, have been in the habit of using detectives to examine the books of the parties who had made the returns with a view of detecting frauds. Judge SHALLEY has decided that, when an assessor has accepted a return, he can not afterward reject it. This, it seems to be common sense. If an assessor has reason to suspect the truth of a return made to him he has it open to him to call for evidence, and before transmitting it to the collector, make his inquiries and examinations. But after he has accepted it, he has no right to transmit it to the latter with a charge of a specific charge of perjury against its author. It is impossible to exaggerate the practical evils of the present system of detectives. JONES, let us say, is a distiller, and has been making returns to the department regularly ever since returns were required. They have always been received, transmitted to the collector, and by him presented for payment and paid. Now appears on the scene ROBINSON, who has been employed, a detective, and desires to examine JONES's books for the last five years to see whether he has not understated his operations. Every one who is engaged in business will understand the SMITHS and BROWNS, who are competitors of JONES in the same trade, could afford to give $10,000 to know exactly JONES's business standing, how much whisky he has made, to whom he has sold it, and at what prices. All this information the detective ROBINSON naturally acquires by virtue of his office. The $10,000 which competitor supplied with detectives of such tried virtue that it can be sure ROBINSON will not sell his information to them, would be, we more than think, still accept a douceur from JONES for keeping his eyes shut during the examination of the books!

It is very important indeed that Government should not be harassed in the collection of the revenue. But—strange as it may seem to the Revenue officers—there are things more important even than this. These is, that citizens of the United States shall not be subjected to a government of spies and informers. The privacy of the bookkeeper is not more essential to the individual liberty than privacy of his ledger to a merchant. Government must not venture to violate the one or the other. If it does so, it does it at its peril. The Government of the European Continent have no denounce as despotic—no more dare send detectives to inspect the books of a Paris merchant, under the guise of examining the books of a rascal the revenue, than it dare bombard New York without a declaration of war; and we are not, after all, very much more long-suffering than the French.

Revenue officials, and Congress—which will have this matter of the taxes before it at the time these lines are in print—must steadfastly remember that the country is now cooling down from the enthusiasm which existed during the war. While the war lasted, every objection urged against the acts of Government was tantamount to aid and comfort to the enemy, and loyal men bore and forbore, rather than aggravate the public embarrassments of the Administration. That season has passed away. Neither the existence of the nation nor the success of our arms are now in question. People have leisure to think of their private concerns. They can afford to demur to any official proceeding which they deem unjust, without compromising their character as loyal men. Congress must therefore beware of assuming that, because the acts of the Revenue officials met with acquiescence during the war, they will not be considered by the people as oppressive. Government and the revenue are very important things. But, as Mr. LINCOLN well said, "The ship is made for the carrying and preservation of the cargo." The people have some rights as well as the Government. And while Congress will but do its duty in securing a proper revenue for Government, it should not forget that it had better leave Government without any revenue whatever than secure that revenue at the cost of the private rights and liberties of the people of the United States.

"ALL RIGHT, AGAIN.—DE SAUTE."

DE SAUTE is still "all right." He is the most miraculous "toiler of the sea." DE SAUTE will never say die. He is already preparing for his next attempt. May his lines lie in pleasanter places!

The stowing of the new cable in the tanks of the Great Eastern began three weeks ago. At the end of June the steamer will sail and the experiment begin again. Meanwhile the engineers of the Company and other scientific men agree in the conviction that it will be very easy to recover the cable which is now lying at the bottom of the sea, and complete it into an electrically perfect telegraphic line between Valentia and Newfoundland. These gentlemen are further of opinion that the Great Eastern can lay a cable in any weather; that her paying-out machinery worked perfectly, and can be trusted to lay the cable across the Atlantic; and that with a steam-engine attached to the paying-out machinery the cable could be recovered however far it might have touched the bottom and be repaired at once. They affirm that the cable of 1865, although capable of bearing a strain of seven tons, did not sustain one of more than fourteen hundred weight in the laying in the deepest water; and that four nautical miles of that cable were recovered from a depth of more than two miles, and that the insulation of the gutta percha covering was not in the least affected by the depth of water or the strain of recovery. On the contrary, it is proved that the insulation of the cable improves by its submersion in the cold, deep water; while the wire of 1865 was a hundred times better insulated when made in 1858, which were then considered perfect and are still working. It is supposed that the length of the line between Valentia and Heart's Content will be about 1900 miles, and that eight words a minute can be transmitted. The intention of the Company, as we understand, is to lay one new cable, to recover and complete that of last year. For this purpose $730 miles of wire will be shipped, which, in all but a slight difference of weight in air and water, will be exactly like the last.

Last year 1200 miles of cable were laid from Valentia westward, and this, according to the authorities, is now lying in perfect electric condition in the very place in which a submarine cable can be kept, and ready to do its work as soon as it is finished to Newfoundland, which is 1900 miles distant from the west end of the wire. A system of recovery of the cable has been carefully matured, and every body considered a repetition of DE SAUTE's cheerful opinion, "all right." Certainly it deserves to be; and the undaunted energy of the managers is the best reason for supposing that a work which is now so near success will not be abandoned. may succeed at this third trial.

WHAT SHALL WE EAT?

THE question is often asked of physicians, Is such or such an article healthy? The idea being that some articles are always readily digested, while some others are, as a matter of course, somewhat of difficult digestion, and therefore occasion to all more or less of trouble. The questioner usually, however, has no fixed principle of discerning whether kinds of food may be deemed injurious, as should be done if conscience is to dictate here as well as in other matters. The question should be, Is the food wholesally the unhealthy articles, giving a large preponderance to those which are healthy. But the idea of such a proportion of food into two classes is wholly unfounded. The question as to a suitable diet is not so classified one. What may be readily digested by one is not by another, and positively therefore, disgust in the stomach. The latter is an ordinarily large if not a large range of diet than the sedentary man, because with his greater general vigor there is commonly greater vigor of digestion. What, then, shall be the test? The test is expressed, with most persons, in some occasional turmoil in the process of digestion, and to them it is, therefore, an unhealthy food. Cucumbers are often condemned unsparingly, but by many they are easily digested; and if so, the refreshment they afford is certainly beneficial. We have known even invalids to be really very much benefited by them from this cause. The effect was so marked in the case of one of them that he said that she was always better in the season of cucumbers than at any other period. We sometimes meet with some singular idiosyncrasy in regard to food. We knew a lady who could eat rich cake with impunity, and yet plain bread would make her sick.

Though milk is a full combination of all the elements of necessary food, it should be depended upon as the only food in no other period than infancy. We should not, then, as every body, the indications of nature. Teeth are made for use, and are supplied at the right time. Therefore as soon as the child has a sufficient number to serve well in cutting and grinding there is a call for solid food. The change should be made gradually, and not be inaugurated in full till the milk in the mouth is completed. The most common error is to make the change too early; for it is obvious that when there are only a few small teeth there is not an apparatus adequate to the proper mastication of the solid food that is often at this period made a part of the diet.

Sugar is an important article of diet, as indicated by its liberal use by all in nature. Its wisdom, therefore, of some restrictions that are sometimes put upon its use in the diet of children is doubtful, though there is no question that the excess of it at irregular times between meals is very injurious. But while we use it literally, we should avoid using it in such a manner as to beget a dislike for articles of food in which it is not present.

Fruits are to be regarded as prominent as they should be as a portion of our daily food, especially in the summer season. Observe that we say as daily food. For the occasional free use of them, with long intervals of abstinence from their use, is apt to produce derangement of the digestive organs.

Some are very restrictive in their diet, especially in relation to fruits, when such diseases as dysentery and cholera are prevalent. This is an error; for the best diet as a prophylactic is that which nature dictates as the most suitable to the digestive organs under ordinary circumstances. And experience has shown, where what nature offers as the regular use of ripe, well-conditioned fruit is really a good preventative against irritation of those organs as it will when such diseases are present as when they are not.

2. That when any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the said amendment as aforesaid, no person or any part of the direct tax, under the act of Aug. 5, 1861, which may remain due and unpaid in such State, shall be assumed and paid by such State, and the payment thereof into the National Treasury may be enforced by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, may be withheld from any moneys due from such State to any person or persons who may have been in the service of the United States.

SHOCKOE CREEK VALLEY.

IT is not overrating the city of Richmond to say that, in point of diversity of scenery, in and around her, and for picturesque beauty, she stands unrivaled by any city of her size in the United States, and but few in the world. Situated, like Rome, upon her seven hills (Shockoe, French Garden, Union, Gamble, Oregon, Church, and Navy) wherever the traveler moves he is met by some fresh coup d'œil totally dissimilar to any thing he had seen before, and altogether destructive of that unpleasant monotony which is experienced in all large, flat cities, laid out in regular squares with mathematical precision.

One of the most interesting of the many views is the one which we present elsewhere, from a sketch by MR. J. R. HAMILTON. It is taken from the eminence on which the Medical College stands, and immediately adjoining the famed residence of JEFFERSON DAVIS, the garden-front of which is seen on the bold promontory to the left of the picture. The hill on the opposite side of the valley is called Union Hill, and was, during the war, one vast encampment, when its side dotted with tents must have presented a most animated appearance. On the crest of the hill, at the extreme right, is seen Howard's Grove—a cluster of beautiful pine trees —which was used as a camp and a hospital during the war, and is now occupied by the freedm a.

In the centre of the valley runs the great Central Railroad, leading to Gordonsville, and thence by the Orange Railroad to Alexandria and Washington. The varied fortunes of this great artery during the war are too well-known for recapitulation. In the distance is seen the great work-shops and engine-stores belonging to the Company.

ley as well as the hill upon which the residence of the late Confederate President is situated, is a self-willed and pugnacious little stream that is either in good or bad humor as it chooses. During the summer months it meanders through the valley, a peaceful, inoffensive little stream, barely sufficient to turn the old-fashioned mill which is shown toward the right of the picture, and little children gambol about its cool waters; but when winter sets in, and the floods come on, Shockoe Creek has often been the source not only of consternation but serious damage to various parts of the town. On its way to join the James River it passes under Franklin, Main, and Cary streets, and in flood-time creates havoc in the lower portions of these streets. Last winter it became so furious as to demolish several houses in the valley, inundated the cellars of Franklin and Main streets, and visited the old market, sweeping off butter, eggs, vegetables, and even the contents of the butchers' stalls that were not suspended high enough above its depredations.

Along the crest of Union Hill runs the Mechanicsville Road, parallel with it. It was along this road that, in 1862, LEE marched his army to encounter MCCLELLAN upon the occasion of the ever-memorable seven days' fight. Upon that occasion the whole population of Richmond, men, women, and children, turned out upon the eminences from which our sketch is taken to mark the movement of the troops; and the flight of bursting shells in that famous encounter was distinctly visible to the spectators.

Shockoe Valley is also the locality for public executions, a quarter of a mile out on the extreme left of the picture—being called "Execution Valley." It is rarely that public executions occur in Richmond during peace.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Or late Mr. Neely—a beef-contractor now, and getting rich much more rapidly than when he taught school; no man striving more desperately than he to keep himself in the very van of Southern sentiment—finds himself suddenly mystified and left behind. For several weeks now he has observed myself up from time to time on every dead wall about Somerville a mysterious placard of red paper, sword-shaped, bearing mystical letters:

Turning whithersoever he goes to keep Mr. Neely out of some unknown Paradise, blazes this awful portent, until the contractor for beef can stand it no longer. He has questioned others in vain. Why had he not thought of it before? Tim Lamum!

Even after he found Tim, in the bar-room of Staples's Hotel, industriously engaged—Tim is a commissary agent these days, by deputy his sole business by day being to smoke, with poker added at night—it is some time before Mr. Neely can get through with Burnside's repulse on the Rappahannock. This is the last news; and to Mr. Neely fighting it over again with terrific slaughter Tim only puffs a languid assent. In fact, the war has become a bore to the ex-provost marshal; for that bubble of blood has burst before this, at least until another and more popular one can be blown. The Yankees being so invariably and utterly routed in every fight, the independence of the Confederacy being beyond all question, very tired indeed is Tim of the whole subject.

And now, when Mr. Neely at last arrives at his point, and desires admission to whatever secret society lies behind the mystic sword, this Dragon of the Hesperides has that one fatal question to ask:

"Where were you born, Mr. Neely?" though he already knows perfectly well; and on Mr. Neely's reply assures the applicant that his admission is therefore an impossibility, and walks off.

That matter of birth—it clings to Mr. Neely as to Œdipus during his career. So little born out of wedlock, no offspring of one who dies by the hand of the hangman, so unfortunate. Yes; if his mother had been a harlot instead of a brothel, if his father had been a criminal whose last dying speech and confession had been published in all the papers, Mr. Neely could have concealed the blot and shame upon his name in some distant region, and lived and died respected and in peace. But his New England birth! The "damned spot" will not "out," nor can it be concealed. New England training will not permit him to tell a point-blank lie in the matter, even if he did not know from bitter experience that a certain Yankeeism clings to him in spite of unceasing and long-continued exertion, an ointment of his right hand, which bewrayeth itself on what he can. Cruel misfortune! and he so little to blame for it, too! Was it he or his parents who sinned, that he should have been born in Connecticut? He would not have insisted on South Carolina, if that were too great a boon; if he could only have been born on the northernmost edge of Maryland, or the southernmost possible coast of Florida! Better have first seen the light even in the most desperate county in Arkansas.

In the name of Reason and St. Logic what is it constitutes one a Southern man? What the very essence and marrow of the thing so much more desirable to Mr. Neely than was the being a Roman citizen of old? Surely, Mr. Neely reasoned, it must be in the actually owning a negro. Yet, while many a man who enjoyed the enviable blessing of being Southern born, either could not or would not own a slave, Mr. Neely both could and would and did. The first moment it was in his power, with money ruinously made and hoarded for that one end, Mr. Neely bought a negro. Not a negro man; Mr. Neely was not actuated by any such vile view owning of the article to venture that at first. He bought a negro woman, of the jettest black he could get for the money.

Language fails to describe Mr. Neely's feelings on that eventful night when his woman Cicely, paid for and delivered, was made herself at home in the kitchen of his residence, while he sat in his room and thought it all over. He went back to the happy hour he came into possession of his deceased father's huge silver watch, had it actually ticking in his distended fob, his own watch. He recalled the day he put the first horse he ever bought in the stable, and stood without in the snow listening to it munching its hay; his own animal, hoof and hide, from the tips of its ears to the end of its tail; his own quadruped, to ride, harness, plow, swap, sell, exactly as he pleased. But here was something far superior to all that. A woman, a living, breathing, speaking, working woman. There was the "help" at his old home, Keziah, but she could drop her work, place her arms akimbo, and give Mr. Neely's mother just as good as she got—could, and on the occasion of a final spat did, hurry her things in her trunk, slam to the lid, snap her fingers in the face of the Neely household, and depart, leaving them cookless and in the middle of a heavy washing. But here was a Keziah, only of another shade of complexion, who could cook, wash, iron, ay, plow and hoe, and his own, own property. His own woman to keep or to hire, to sell or to swap—from the crown of her head to the sole of her foot as much his own article as was his watch or his horse. And then, all her children as they might come into the world his also!

That night hundred dollars had bought him more gratification than he had ever dreamed it lay in the power of money to purchase; it gave a value to money which it never had even to Mr. Neely's eyes. Mr. Neely sat up late thinking it over, not unconscious of how much elevated he was thereby above any of his old acquaintances still resident in his old village. He would like to be there—they knowing of his purchase—if it was only for a few days to enjoy it. He woke a dozen times that night with the thought. He even went out once or twice during the night to the door of the kitchen to make sure she was there, heard her deep breathing within, and returned satisfied. You who own merely homes, lands, bank stock, railway scrip, and the like, wait till you own a human being before you can claim to understand the pleasure of property. Only we the South got so used to it!

With Mr. Neely there was at first the fleshed eagerness of a school-boy with a stolen watermelon; the sense, too, of having achieved a kind of moral impossibility, which added to the excitement of the purchase.

But these weeks, up to and after the date of the sword on the walls, roll by very slowly indeed, very wearily, too, with the burden of heavy hearts. A vast and increasing difference between Union men and all others. Business, ruined with the Union people, was never more thriving with good Secessionists. Hardly one of these last in Somerville but has an office, a contract, an agency—something or other which pays. If Tim Lamum has bought one fine horse in the last year he has bought twenty, the best to be had in all the land. Captain Simmons also. Hitherto it was with utmost difficulty; was able to pay his board bill at Staples's; in fact, Joe Staples, his hair standing a thousand ways with indignation, exhalter on him, has been loud in comment upon the Captain's delinquency, fearless of consequences. During the last few months, however, the Captain has "settled up like a gentleman," as Staples himself proclaims; has bought several new negroes, drives a splendid pair of blacks—not, of course, of the last-mentioned race—and is now habitually drunk, and therefore habitually the most Chesterfieldian in his intercourse with others of any man in Somerville. Bob Withers expresses only the experience of many thousands like him the South over.

"As for me, gentlemen, what's the use denying the thing among friends? Secession has put me on, by George! my legs for one?" Only a Yankeeism is Bob; yet in some mystic manner he has got capital from some source, with which, ceasing from drinking even for the time, in the eagerness of a new excitement, he has speculated in flour, salt, and whisky, until, if we may credit his statement, he is "Rich, by George! You can always count on returns trading in the actual necessaries of life, gentlemen. Yes, rich; you'd better believe so. Don't pretend to say how long it will be before Tim Lamum there wins it all from me at poker; but until that or some other providence happens to relieve me of it, for the first time in my life, by George! rich, yes, Sir, rich!"

There is Smithers, the postmaster, as ordinary a little sandy-haired man as you have in all your circle of acquaintance. A strange article wherewith to fill a post-office is sugar; yet Smithers has several rows of hogsheads thereof and thereto. Seven cents a pound Smithers sells it at? No, paid it. It is forty-five cents a pound wholesale, fifty cents a pound retail, he sells it at. Smithers's interests are—negroes. In fact, he is always in the market for a woman to do the housework. An unfortunate man he invariably is in his perpetual purchases of the same. As fast almost as he can buy them do they run away—owing to Mrs. Smithers, whom even Mrs. Warner has described as being "one of those women who will not have a moment's rest herself, nor let a soul on the place have it either, day or night. Deliver me from such creatures!" unconscious that that respected lady is as much like herself in that as is a pin to a needle, a thorn to a splinter.

If Smithers has one woman "lying out" he has half a dozen. And where is the use of having the dogs to trail them? You have to pay more than the woman is worth to catch her. And when she is caught and whipped, Smithers doing it with his stout, Mrs. Smithers finds her tongue, the first thing Mrs. Smithers finds when she wakes of a morning is the kitchen hearthstone cold, and Polly, Molly, Cynthy, Aggy, whatever it is, gone again. And thus does Smithers's sugar dissolve away.

Look at Joe Staples. Happy day for Staples when he laid aside shears and goose, leaped from his counter, rallied to himself the other eight parts of manhood, and went to keeping tavern! With money—gold it was—lent him by Mr. Ferguson, he provisioned his house so thoroughly when prices were low, and changes so enormously now when prices are high, that he too is getting rich. Since he has straightened his crossed legs he has actually grown inches in height, feet in circumference, beyond all sub-measurement in the estimation of his household and himself. His very hair is more electric than ever with increased life at its roots.

As to little Joe Staples—the forward, dissipated, little offspring—under the new hotel régime, "he has money in great rolls, you'll bet," is the touching plaint of elder boys to their parents; "he buys game-chickens, candy, cigars, and a new pony whenever he wants to!" He is not quite nine yet, but already disdains the hotel gong on the arrival of glorious news. Generally he is the first, after Bill Perkins has announced it, at the Brick Church, holding on with the grip of a cray-fish to the knot on the end of the rope, rising high above the heads the air at each semicircular sweep of the great bell.

And there is good Mr. Ellis. Four daughters has Mr. Ellis, and two sons. Henry, his eldest, is back home now, a hero from the repulse on the Rappahannock, but a cripple for life with a shot through the hip, and dreadfully emaciated by months in the hospital. Charley Ellis, his brother of twelve, no longer an attendant on Sunday-school or at church—it being impossible to go to Mr. Arthur's church any longer, since he will not pray for the Confederacy—shows terrible evidence thereof in mourning, is, in fact, a distress to his father. A care-worn, haggard, stooping man now, from whom collectors of the perpetual subscription-lists for war purposes shrink most when they are abroad—as, for one such object or other they always are; because they know how Mr. Ellis shrinks from them. He really can not, will not! The money is misappropriated, or the object does not exactly fit his way of thinking. More intensely, bitterly, even fanatically Secession than ever before; yet Mr. Ellis is getting the reputation, justly or not, of being the most penurious man in Somerville. In fair shabbier attire than he ever wore in other days Mr. Ellis, from talking at street corners all the rest of the time, is frantic to disprove, all unfavorable, and to magnify all favorable news. On Sundays also, discussing Burnside and Lee with lying Sam Peters, Tim Lamum, Dr. Peel, Captain Simmons, and the rest, while the bells are ringing, and afterward too. As to that, the MAKING CAPS.

Union people in Somerville are also thrown together these many months now in new combinations. Society, thoroughly broken up from its foundations, is crystallizing into totally new forms.

Mr. Neely is flourishing as a beef-contractor in war times should. Possessing Confederate money in great shocks, he has bought quite a snug tract of wooded land near Somerville, and sells wood off it by the hundred cords. True, it is land belonging to Guy Brooks, Esq., but to bridge, as is well known now, a chasm such as the Federal service, his property has been confiscated and sold.

It is true in horses, lands, sugar, or even—which he declares in the Star to be the best of all investments—negroes, that Lamum, the eloquent, has a tender mercy. Cotton is his weakness. Report whispers into your ear that he has hundreds of bales safely to his account in some place over the water—but reports are the same thing of most of the Secession leaders; it may all be false. With Government teams an immense deal of cotton is certainly going to the nearest ports, the Government stores coming back on blockade-runners being singularly disproportionate. In fact, a cry of swindling and corruption and favoritism is already begun, which swells every day; only among the people, however, and the press has long since ceased to have their hands.

Dr. Ginnis's big, pompous, spending his money—on all sorts of Medical Boards these days—in improving his place in Somerville, asserts that Dr. Peel, who has half a dozen contracts, has made half a million—but who can say?

"Even an infidel," reasons Mrs. Warner to her husband, "can see the Almighty's hand on our side by the way He is blessing us. Every mail brings news of glorious victories, and scarce a Secessionist is killed—I mean those who took a leading hand—but is coming money. As to those miserable, God-forsaken Union people—look at them! I say, only look at them!"

Well, yes. As a general rule these last have sacrificed to their pipedreams, to their perverse principles, more than they could afford in a way of popularity, common respect even, but of business also. But their infatuation, their obstinate convictions, their concern in the boom, seem destroying their victims; and, like cancers, are incurable—only the more deep-seated as the days roll by and disease develops itself. Their love for what they still persist in calling their country glows still unquenched, unquenchable.

You who live outside the South during the war, reading all varieties of papers, speaking exactly what you happened to think and feel, imagine, if you can, yourself to have been placed as these were. You were no more accustomed all your life hitherto to freedom than were these. Your conviction upon the whole matter could not clearer than were those of these men; only, living within the disease itself they knew more of its misery than you could. To them it is as if rebellion is devastating their own soil. Think of yourself as, under like circumstances, not daring to speak your deepest and dearest sentiments at your own table and fireside lest your very children should, by their unguarded lips betray you to death. Imagine yourself doomed every day of your life to hear read aloud from the papers and spoken by every tongue that which you knew to be lies; forced to see the commonest of common sense hourly trodden under foot; compelled continually to see the approved things subversive of all morality, powerless to help yourself; obliged to hear positions assumed by the mean and vulgar, whom by Christian ministers and in churches on the Sabbath —positions assumed, sentiments advanced, plans proposed, which, in common with every principle in Christianity outside the malaria of Secession, you knew to be exactly that which Christianity was given to overthrow—principles which you knew, as well as you could know any thing, to be of the devil, fathered upon a holy God! All this, and you required to sit under it all like a statue!

The next time, dear reader, your home news, glad or sorry, which causes all your heart to beat for joy, oblige me by trying yourself the experiment of wearing thereupon and therefore the saddest of countenances, as if for death in the most disastrous. On the next occasion you hear pious much rings a death-knell to your fondest hopes, be so kind as to assume the demeanor of one who has just heard what he most desired. Or, say for the lot of Union people at the South all the war through. Or, say, for your husband, off from you in the Confederate ranks, enduring all the privations of a soldier's life, fighting, in spite of yourself and himself, in a cause you abhor; fighting against all of succor that is coming dutifully toward you! But you can not imagine it as we felt it.

"Never was my poor faith in God so strong as it is now!" exclaims Mrs. Sorel says to Mrs. Arthur in these days of the repulse of Burnside. "Because I feel that nothing but his special grace could support me as I am sustained. Only my boy—my Frank—but the other day standing beside me, with his dead father's eyes and hair and very voice, father's strong nature begging to beam upon his forehead—my pride, beside Robby—my sole hope on earth—that he should be standing all those hours in the Virginia, and for what?" And the tear which trickles down her cheek as she bends lower down over her sewing is, alas! but one of the drops as abundant as rain which, from the same cause, fall over the whole South.

Because Frank Sorel has been trained to be true to his name in all his dealings with his mother, as with every one else, and writes, accordingly, as truthfully as he would have spoken, had he been at home. Letters filled, as all truthful letters from Confederate armies must be, of care, with tales of nakedness, hunger, loathsome food, exhausting marches, cold, and wet; letters telling of filth, vermin, disease, death by hundreds, like that among infected sheep; letters after battles in which valor the most desperate avails as nothing against artillery, and persistence even after frequent defeat, and telling of all the after-horrors of wounded, dying, dead; letters at least hinting at the gambling, hideous profanity, and incontinences, before which even white-headed Christians give way, even Chaplains not rarely go down; letters written on a blanket spread on the ground, on saddle flaps, all blotted and blurred. If Mr. Ferguson, now, could only have made up a library of volumes of the war letters!

"And we have Davis's assertion that the war may last for years," says Mr. Arthur.

"Even if it is over, the Confederacy secure, our young men have still to be soldiers, partly to watch the North, partly to stand perpetual guard over the negroes, their property, which more in need of being guarded than ever. May Heaven deliver Frank and Robby here from such a country! The ruin of our glorious land, and all this for—slavery." How evident that Mr. Arthur is becoming a fanatic!

"Pardon me, Mr. Arthur," says Mrs. Sorel, gravely, "but we will not speak on that subject. You know all my feelings and principles on the matter. If our peculiar institutions are displeasing to Heaven, it will do away with them in its own time and way. I would not raise a finger in the matter. Meanwhile, to talk upon the subject—pardon me—is disagreeable to me. You know I am a Southern Christian, and we have been so basely abused by the Abolitionists! I am too old to change my views, too old even to think of changing my subject."

Not the only Union heart in the South which at that day shrank from all investigation on that point. Not the only Union eye away when the bandages come to be unwrapped from an ulcer or a wound long neglected. We are so constituted, some of us, that we faint, sicken, faint—we can not do it. We prefer to let the bandages stay, and hope for the best. Put on the bandages, and let the ulcer, and, for Heaven's sake, let us say no more about it.

Mrs. Bowles is whitening in her hair these days as well as Mrs. Sorel, with double odyssebewilderment. Things were so perfectly settled in her younger days there in South Carolina. If Mr. Neely was a Union man, Mrs. Bowles was; it was a satisfaction to her every waking hour of her life; she escaped as much as she can out of the present which so stuns her into that blessed past.

"Dear Mrs. Sorel, pardon me while with me, for I will not, I should do. There is such a difference between the two opinions; they are in such conflict one of them must be victorious over the other before I can speak. Is it right, is it right one? Won't you tell me something? Is it Alice who says it, seated on a stool at Mrs. Sorel's feet, at the hostess's own request. Her friend sews and muses with bowed head, muses almost unconsciously, and answers Alice in a voice that the little girl she was it seems but yesterday.

"You know you have always been another mother to me. You used to advise me in all my little troubles, and always advised me right," Amanda Allen, "and you will do it without doubt. I think upon these terrible things?"

"Do you think upon them at all, Alice," says Mrs. Sorel, "my little women. Let the men think and vote and fight."

"In so awful a state of things even we ought to know at which is right and which is wrong," begins Alice.

"It is a theological affair in part; why not leave it, then, to men?" says Mrs. Sorel, with something of the smile of other days as she looks her fair visitor in the eyes upturned to hers. Alice drops her head the less for that, drops the long lashes over her eyes, but answers none the less promptly:

"A minister has already advised me on the subject—that Mr. Barker. You know mamma has not attended Mr. Arthur's church for some time. Mr. Barker is doing good taste to make her a pastoral visit in consequence. But you know mamma, good Secessionist as she is, she has a horror now the less for some ministers. Dr. Peel, Dr. Ginnis—especially for Mr. Barker, almost as much aversion as for the Abolitionist preachers. I am not to suppose I am to be excused. He did not understand it in the least, and left behind, with his compliments for mamma, his last sermon!"

"Well?"

"Oh, I actually read it through!" says Alice. He preached it on one of his visits to the capital of the State, and it was published, as the Prefece informs us, at the request of the Governor and all the other officials there."

"And what is it all about? Colonel Juggins always quotes from Mr. Barker's sermons as fast as they are published, as the highest authority of the kind, but I'm ashamed to say," adds Mrs. Sorel, "that I have never read one of them yet!"

"All about the Institution. It is like what I have read about the clergy of Charleston, saying that kings rule the people by Divine right. They proved from Scripture that despotism is not of man at all, but of God, and to be obedience. All who believe in and fight for despotism are God's peculiar people. All who oppose kings are infidels. The combination of preachers for slavery so earnestly reminds me of the Holy Alliance of Europe. Am I wrong, Annty?"

"I have been trained from my birth, my dear," says Mrs. Sorel, gravely, "to believe that the Bible does not countenance slavery. It is true I have never read but on one side. I may add, that I have at times had some painful doubts on account of some of the things which seem inseparable from slavery, yet you know there is no institution but is liable to be abused. Two things settled my mind: the Abolitionists are a bad, violent, blaspheming people—avowed infidels many of them, running into a thousand sects and errors. With such a people God can not be. And, then, what to do with the blacks if they were freed?" But we won't talk about it, dear; there is nothing I dislike more. God will do what is right."

"Only this, Annty—it does look so much as if men in authority, and nothing else in the Bible were using the preachers as a convenient set of tools to establish their own purposes. And I could not think," adds Alice, after a long pause, "if the Church in the South—God's own Church—should turn out to be the chiefest instrument in doing a great wrong—"

"My darling Alice," interrupts Mrs. Sorel, nervously, and placing her hand upon the lips of her young guest, "you must not read Abolition papers, you must not read Abolition books, you must not read Abolition sermons. I am an old woman now. You young people belong, for what I know, to a new order of things; but you must let us old people keep to the old ways. Have you about Robby's fight with Charley Ellis? I would like you to see how he has grown; but he has gone fishing with Mr. Arthur and some one in his world like Mr. Arthur. And you actually did this transferring yourself—take off your collar, dear, that I may see it—and you did not shed one tear other think of the terrible prices? Mr. Arthur insists on not having any sugar in his coffee. He thinks it a luxury. Ten pounds of sugar are actually bought up the last fifty pounds in Somerville for me. But just to think: wood ten dollars a cord, and Mr. Arthur objects! Such a bit of flour. Molasses four dollars, beef fifty cents, fifteen dollars for the coarsest shoes."

"And you are not to trust your own independent I am; pretty good for a first attempt, are they not?" and Alice, holding aside her skirts, puts forth the tiniest of little feet.

"And Alice, dear, your mother did have fo sell Charles?" Mrs. Sorel asks in the lowest of tones, gently as a mother could.

Ah, how the bright young face at her knee clouds!

"I will tell you. Aunt Sorel. Ma says it is because Charles has been so insolent of late, and she has no one to control him; but we were comfortable, and could do very well. Ma could with her to let me sell my piano instead; she would not let me even speak of it. And such trouble we had with Charles's wife over since! but what could we do? And, then, she may revenge herself on us."

"Revenge herself on a child?"

"Revenge herself on a child? Why, you know, Annty, that Mr. Warner has been so troubled as makes Mr. Barker's sermons Mrs. Sorel. Mr. Barker's sermons Mrs. Sorel. Mr. Barker's sermons Mrs. Sorel.

frank, and honest voice, "'t a servant of servants shall be—" By George! Simmons, hold the candle nearer, can't you! "Blessed be—One half inch more, Simmons, and you would have set the beard on fire. If I was too drunk to stand, by George!" adds Noah, with aspirit, by, "I'll lie down." And Ham rein away at last, the curse being endless and overwhelming, in deplorable plight.

Next Abolition, with a voice and gestures singularly like those of Brother Barker, in spite of beard and mask, reads the negro-psalm, and therefore him in another part of the room a lengthy lecture, embracing the rest of the Biblical argument for Slavery, closing with a severe animadversion that the South, in obeying the Divine command in this matter, was therefore God's peculiar people, those nations who do not do the same are under the wrath of Heaven. Shall we relate how George Washington, risen from his grave in the person of Dr. Lieber, appeared in bag-wig, knee-buckles, and portentous voice—the immemorable wrongs of the North and the rights of the South? Nor shall we longer abstain from referring to a sarcastic Eulogy upon the Union delivered by the Evil One himself, to personify whom the only alterations I can think of Thinks it necessary to make in himself are a tail and a pair of horns. After which the novice is instructed in all the commercials and pips, and learns also that the mystic C. C. stand for Children of Calhoun, and also for Curse of Canaan, and the red sword to be passed on to the next to point North—but that needs no explanation.

Next follows the arrangement of certain mongrel matters relating to the whites—the number of soldiers, in which the sums specified bear ludicrous proportion to the grandeur of their distribution.

"Children of Calhoun. Business," says Dr. Peel at last.

Whereupon, to the astonishment of Henry Ellis, the lights are put out and the conclave left in perfect darkness, during which the ministers membership are evidently employed in changing their seats.

"Business!" says the Glorious Calhoun Peel at last.

"Glorious Calhoun!" A voice from the darkness.

"At my post!" replies that individual.

"Silas Jewet, conscript, sought for. Fled!" says the voice.

"Isaac Smith, over conscript age, but disloyal. Warned to leave. Fled!" says another voice from the darkness, which Henry Ellis has heard before from the lips of Joe Staples.

"Glorious Calhoun!" from the far end of the room.

"At my post!"

"Hol Robbins, known as Catfish Robbins, exempt on account of sickness. Sickness, in the speaker adds, in a lower tone for the information of his near neighbors. But, after this, name after name is called out, now from one side and now from the other side of the darkness, with comment like the above. Then there is called one name more which makes most sensation of all.

"Parson Arthur!"

"Make charge!" from the presiding officer.

"Opposed to Secession from the first, and persists in his crime. Silent but influential for the Union."

"Business proposed!" from the Glorious Calhoun.

"I move he be regularly warned to leave:" the speaker carefully disguises his voice, but is loud and deeped. Whereupon rises a hubub over the whole hall, some urging with violence, some opposing the suggestion. One voice has at last claimed the mastery; it seems certain in the darkness as if its owner had mounted upon his seat.

"I tell you, fellows, you'd better not; by George, no! No man can regret the parson's course more'n I do; but that man has buried too many of our dead, nursed too many of our sick, warned too many of our couples for that! I ain't a Christian, but I know one when I see one, and parson Arthur is one. Parson Arthur is no favorable to the Confederacy, I know, but you all know he is a Christian, a Christian gentleman. Can't afford it, fellows; and, by George, we won't!"

"One word more, gentlemen"—another voice from the darkness—"I'm Henry Ellis, you all know that by my crutches, there!" and a double knock is heard upon the floor. "You all know I have been fighting for the South in Virginia. Well, for one, the man that disturbs Mr. Arthur, unless he breaks some law, has me to disturb too. I won't more!"

A vote is taken. According to the Ritual of the C. C. on any thing moved for the benefit of the Curse the vote is taken by the ayes and nays, and North instead of nay. On this occasion a voice in the darkness, evidently the original proposer of the motion to rid Somerville of Mr. Arthur—a thing often before done by the C. C. in the case of other obnoxious persons—and which is headed and individuals in a clime exceedingly unlike Somerville and very far above it, or in still another place not so grand as Somerville though below it—on this occasion, we say, the original voice votes South, with an emphasis which makes up for its being the only vote to that effect. Most of the C. C. do not vote at all; but enough vote North, and with emphasis of their own, too, to decide the question for Mr. Arthur's further stay in Somerville. Let it be distinctly recorded here that we do not assert the learned vote to have been cast not by the Patriarch Abraham; for the sake of sweet St. Lucy let the matter at least remain in doubt.

This matter being disposed of:

"Glorious Calhoun!" from the darkness, which, like that of Egypt, is both intense and swarming with angry spirits.

"At my post!"

"Mr. Ferguson." We all know Joe Staples's voice.

"Make charge."

"Against the revolution from the first. Bitterly against it still. Won't touch Confederate money. Won't give the least belief to any good news. Always says it's a trick."

Joe Staples, who is deeply in debt to Mr. Ferguson, has never probably read Sallust, and imitates unconsciously those of whom that historian records that they joined the conspiracy of Catiline to get rid of their indebtedness. Not Staples only, but many Secessionists in all the South and from the outset, and a little before, than those owing heavily, especially to Northern creditors. But—

"He ridicules all the good news," adds another voice.

"And pastes it all in a big book," contributes a third from the darkness.

"And won't give one single cent toward the war," adds a fourth.

"A cross-grained old Abolitionist, heart and soul against us!" cries still another.

"Business proposed!" from the chair as soon as the Glorious Calhoun can make himself heard.

"Frighten out of his boots!"

"And outright, that's enough."

"Those in favor will say South!" Overwhelming vote.

"Those opposed will say North!"

"North"—only one voice, Henry Ellis. "One word, men," he adds. "You all know I have fought, will fight as long as I can pull a trigger for the South; but only on the open field, and where I can see. I resign." And the speaker is hobbling on his crutches toward the door as well as he can guess at it.

"Children of Calhoun," says Dr. Peel promptly.

"At our posts!" from the members, evidently part of the Ritual.

"Because, not fighting for the South in the field, we must work for it at home!" In full chorus, after Dr. Peel.

"Well, it's a sort of work I won't do for one. And I tell you, gentlemen, just this. I find here among all your anathemas a touch of ferocity, a kind of devilish bitterness there isn't the least spark of in the army, and you know whether I fight or not. I'm not the man one, your secrets are safe with me, but I am gone;" and a stumble and slam announces that the speaker has managed to find the door and leave—those nearest the door not unconscious that several seem to be leaving with him.

It is a singular fact that since that night the C. C., notwithstanding the immense amount of work yet to be done, and the appalling outlooks dawning upon the country, has steadily always to extinction. In vain Brother Barker especially exerts himself; by far his powerful appeals, but without effect. He has brought always from outside, such an alteration as admits him and Mr. Neely and others of Northern birth. It may be in no way violence of these hastens its end. Even the dullest Secessionist knows that Union men have been initiated, at least men who were always the same treachery upon these.

"For one, gentlemen, I am firmly persuaded," said Captain Simmons, "that the Union men there was not a Yankee Secessionist in all the South, whoever he was, and whatever he said or did as editor, private, general, President, minister, citizen, or what not, but went into Secession, and acted as he did during it with the full though secret determination of bringing it to a bloody end and overthrow Slavery. In fact, gentlemen," continued Captain Simmons, with a firm grasp upon the door of the porch in front of Simpkins's, "one peculiarly dignified because particularly drunk: "I have become fully satisfied that Slavery never will get up and down again by Yankees, South and North, expressly to procure the destruction of Slavery and the triumph of Abolition. Now, gentlemen, gentlemen, every soul of them. Their bended eyes salute the skies, their lifted knees the ground, as they pray that the horrors of war was among the deepest sentiments instilled into me by parents now saints in heaven, where one thing has convinced my mind, gentlemen," adds the Captain, with a wave of his left hand, "being a Secessionist myself, and that I am none the less free to say it, that the Yankees are what they claim to be—the smartest people on this planet. None the less dear to my soul loathe them; to the last degree are they offensive to me."

Whether any of said Yankees who afterward claimed any thing of all this for themselves individually spake truth or not who can say? Oh that we could but read the heart! Alas! he who pens these lines can not read his own. Enough for us that He who has the final settlement of all things can.

"Secret and Special Committee of Three will meet here to-morrow night at twelve. Be vigilant, Children of Calhoun, much and great work remains to be done." This from the chair, after the candles have been again lighted.

"Any business, you?" The editor, Lamum, who is thus addressed, sitting in his place under that flag, is silent.

"England, what from you?" Jem Budd, gunsmith, seated opposite France, under the Cross of St. George, is compelled, by the painful facts of the case, to remain silent.

"Ourselves," says Dr. Peel, with enthusiasm, rising from his seat broad and jeweled as midnight, "your flag, Ourselves!"

"Rappahannock!" prompt and loud from the whole C. C.

A fervent prayer from Brother Barker—in closing, as there had been one from the same source in opening, and, with certain mystical signs gone through, the C. C. is no more. A Federal is being first spread before the door, each of the C. C. in passing on tramples it under foot, stamping and grinding it into the dust and spitting upon it in a manner in strict conformity with the Ritual and the feelings of—some of them. Only let it here be recorded that the fealty of discipline in some men, and during some epochs, is vigorous beyond all estimation.

"Oh yes, do what you please to old Ferguson!" is heard in the noise of departure. "We are at war, by George! We've got into this mess, and all we've got to do is fight out of it as well we can. But not Parson Arthur, by George! not the parson—"

SIR RALPH'S HERIOT.

A LANCASHIRE TRADITION.

In the "good old times"—that far-off pet of which so many people talk and read about with pleasure, but which, by the way, if any, would like to return—Ashton was the seat of the Ashtons, or Assheton, family. A Sir John Assheton, in the fifth year of the Sixth Henry, became possessed of the Manor of Assheton on payment of one penny annually. This worthy knight is said to have built the old church, and to have been the first to introduce seats for the common people. With a gallantry which adds fresh lustre to his spurs, the number of these seats was limited to those given to the women—the tenants' wives and daughters.

Sir John was succeeded by his son Sir Ralph, who seems to have been the ne-plus-ultra of the Black Knight. It is supposed that the annual ceremony observed at Ashton on Easter Monday, of "Killing Heriot Ox," simply commemorates the popular odium in which Sir Ralph was held; this custom bearing a close resemblance to the "Guy Fawkes" proceedings in Somerset shire, the.

Sir Ralph was feared and hated by his tenantry. He was permitted, by royal letters patent, to execute supreme jurisdiction, and he misused his trust. One of the most oppressive forms of taxation, originating in the feudal age, but perpetuated, he inherited, was the custom of heriotage. This was neither more nor less than a fine for dying. A certain class were subject to it, among the best of the manor on the property of the deceased tenant, and it fell with great severity on widows in humble circumstances. Now the law of the land-widows and the landlord stepped in to take away best part of the scanty store the dead man had scraped together.

There was, about this time, a poor widow near Ashton. Her husband had held his little farm under Sir Ralph Ashton, one of the most rapacious landlords of his day. The character borne by Sir Ralph was worthy of the old doggerel which set forth public opinion with regard to him—

"Oh, there's Sir Ralph Ashton,
And for thy bitter passion,
He's sure to die on one of the Tower,
And from Sir Ralph of Ashton!"

He spared neither age nor sex; he had no pity for the sick or the dying; he showed no mercy to the widow and the orphan; wherever he shadow fell trouble came; wherever his voice was heard, weeping and lamentation were the result. When Sir Ralph heard that his tenant was dead, he sent an imperative order, commanding that the heriot should be paid immediately. The widow was therefore waiting with which she could satisfy his claim except one cow, and the cow was the chief sustenance of her family. She had also four children to feed—some of them an infant not many weeks old, the eldest an idiot boy, harmless, but useless, strong and active, and therefore valuable to the farm. His poor but tenderly beloved of his mother, was to her more trouble than all the rest.

It was a sad day on which the widow's home presented on the Christmas morning of 1681. Sharp, coldweather—weather unusually severe, the country in the midst of snow, and the sun, as it rose, only streams bound in icy fetters; the bleak wind sweeping and moaning through the trees and over the hills, as if it were chanting a Lenten dirge rather than singing a Yule carol. Cold outside the miserable home of the widow, and cold within. Besides the sad her children had taken a little milk and eaten a little porridge, and they sat huddled together over a few sticks of fire on the hearth.

Suddenly the door, which had been closed, was flung open, and Sir Ralph Ashton looked in—tall, squarely built man, with sinewy limbs, and a great quantity of dark hair on head, and lips, and cheeks, and chin. His eyes glowed like fire, and there was a scowl on his face that betokened a storm.

Harsh, hard, fierce, and cruel were his words. He had himself come to claim his own, and he would have it; the heriot was his, the cow was his, none should dispute with him of his rights. If it was not in his bond. Leniency, delay! nothing was said of either in his fearful charter. Charity, for the sake of Him whose feast they kept that day! Sir Ralph laughed his own harsh laugh, and said he had no time for feeling. So a couple of fellows, who had accompanied Sir Ralph, drove out the poor beast from the shed, and the knight, with a threat of expelling the family from their miserable hut, turned to depart. It was the idiot who stopped him.

"Beest thou our liege lord?"

"Ay, fool; what bust thy pert tongue to say to that?"

"The liege lord will die, mother—will die!"

"Hush, boy, hush!" said the widow.

"Nay, let the boy speak out. What of it, boy —what if I should die?"

"Then thy liege lord will claim heriot."

"And who says he be?"

"Old Hornie—Beelzebub!"

"And what heriot should I pay to him?" roared the knight, half angry, half amused.

"Thy soul."

"And thy body shall smart for it, imbecile!"

"Oh, he pity his body—he's daft!" and the widow threw herself before the knight, who roughly spurned her with his foot.

"Enough of this. All of you shall suffer for this. There, no whimpering." He strode away across the snow, and never once looked back.

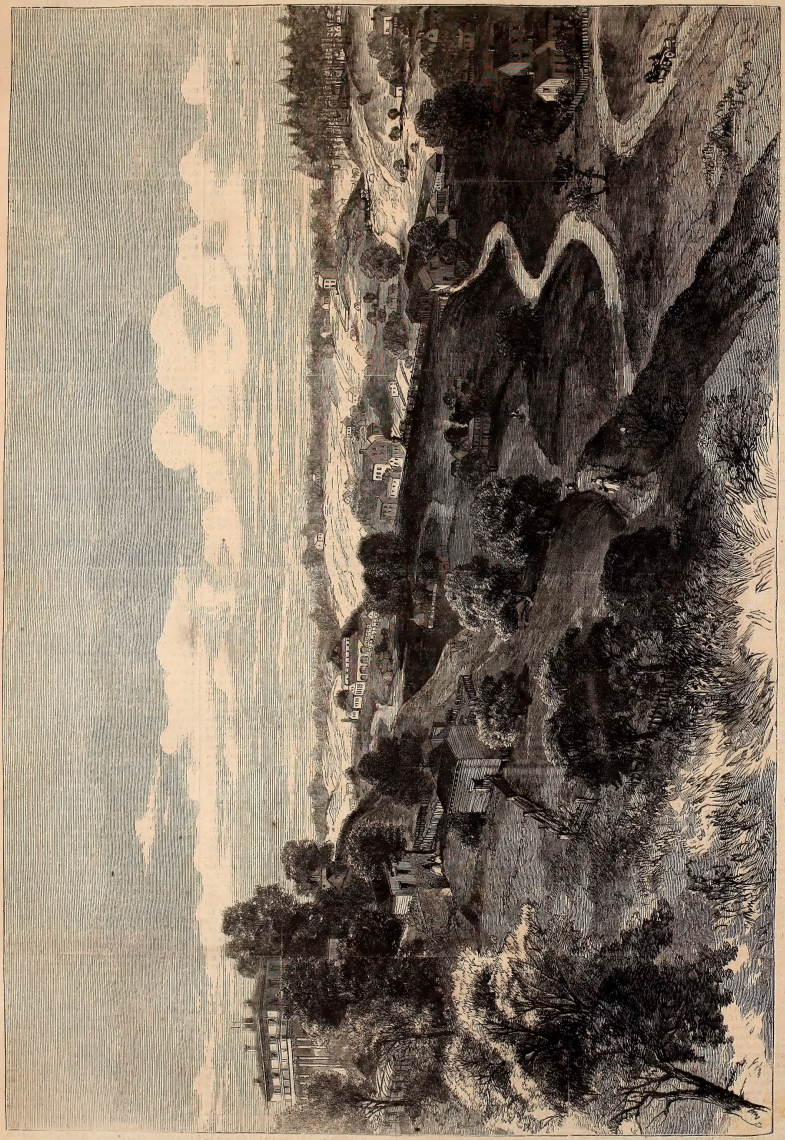
There were strange doings that night at Ashton Hall. It was rough weather—snowing hard and freezing hard. The entertainment was held numerous, for when the lord of Ashton dispensed his good cheer woe to those tenants who slighted his hospitality! A huge fire was kindled in the broad hearth, but it gave forth no bright and cheerful light; it sputtered, and could not be made to blaze. The air was raw and cold, and the usual sound to have lost its flavor, and the Christmas plants looked shriveled on the walls. The guests spoke in low whispers, and affected little rather than engage in any merry-making sports; the minstrels, in their little oaken gallery, rubbed their benumbed hands, and played on. There was no dancing; there were mummers in quaint devices of all sorts, hobby-horses, and what not; but there was no mirth.

About six in the afternoon Sir Ralph came into the hall and found every thing equally dull and gloomy, and his indignation broke out in a storm of reproach. Was his beauty to be churlishly received? In his own hinds? Had he not slain the Saint, and Dragon, Miller, and Jack the Woodman, and Hobbe o' the Leghes, come there to a feast or a funeral? Were blindworms, and hedgehogs, and lizards, and toads served for these gentry? Was not the Christmas-pie large enough or good enough for their tastes? By his halidome he should go hard but he would teach them better manners!

While the angry knight was thus addressing his guests—and no one could equal Sir Ralph in the art of the mummers, a little fellow, clad in black, with a mask having horns, and, besides, a long tail with which he constantly crept and glided, and, while stealing unperceived behind the angry host, seized him by his cloak, and prayed him on the instant to come with him to a dark alley where life been so humiliated. Every face about him turned white at the spectacle. He regained his feet in an instant, and with a curse on a stout oaken cudgel, dealt about him with no weak hand. The guests flew before him in dismay, and were scared when he found the hall in the greatest confusion. Some fell, some escaped into the open air; but the black mummer neither fell nor fled. He was, or seemed, proof to be, every where at once. He was safely in a corner one moment, and Sir Ralph was making sure of him, when out and in the long gallery, dodging, diving and weaving between the knight's legs, perhaps upsetting him, perhaps, for an instant, leaping on his back—here, there, every where, appeared the black mummer, his shrill laughter.



At last no more than a dozen of the guests remained, with the exception of those who were badly hurt and lay groaning on the floor. Sir Ralph paused to take breath and look about him. The black mummer, with his legs hanging over the front, sat the black mummer, swaying his body to and fro, and laughing as if the whole of this extraordinary affair he had ever seen in his life.

"Pull down the rogue!" called out Sir Ralph. "Cut him down!" Some of the guests drew. By the Rood, he shall pay for his sport!" The figure leaped from the gallery, and stood face to face with Sir Ralph. The knight called for his sword, and took a stout blow, but the knave avoided it. Again Sir Ralph strove to strike, with the same result. Then, with a fearful voice, heard distinctly by all, the black figure cried:

"The heriot! the heriot! Sir Ralph, I came to tell you that the heriot would take his heriot at Easter." And with these words and a diabolical laugh the figure vanished.

Sir Ralph Ashton quitted the hall. He was troubled. Hurriedly he sent for his priest. What passed between them is not known, but the priest returned to his vicar's house returned to her; in the course of the day assistance was sent to her from Sir Ralph's almonry. He was charitable, but he was also free to his religious duties. He forbade any allusion to what had occurred on Christmas night; but as the year advanced he noticed to change in their respects: he became weak, the rigorous fast of Lent told on him, and at Easter he died.

Such is the popular tradition of the Black Knight of Ashton. It is related by various authorities with different embellishments, and is confidently believed by many supernatural, and occasionally the reverse. Who was the strange visitor—the black mummer, with his quaint antics and dreadful message? The Evil One, say some; a "Boggart" full of mischief, say others; only a few incline to the opinion which to us appears the most probable—namely, that the mummer was no other than the idiot boy—witless enough, but not so "daft" as to be incapable of the benevolent conception of such a ingenious trick—mad enough, doubtless, but with method in his madness.

COTTON TEAM IN NORTH CAROLINA.—[DRAWN BY EDWIN FORBES.]

A STRAY LETTER.

SWEET CCC, I really meant to write,
In answer to your last,
A week ago this very night;
Dear me, how time has passed!
You see I've been so busy, love—
And now you know the reason
Of my neglect—from morn till night
Preparing for the season.

Mamma and I together shopped
For one whole week and more,
And all that we were stopped,
But went from store to store
All through Broadway, both up and down,
On either side the street;
And oh, such patterns! I declare
None ever were so sweet.

We bought, dear me! now let me see,
Twelve dresses for Mamma;
And for myself just twenty-three—
You should hear Papa
Go on about the bills, he talked
Like one bereft of reason,
As if we both could live without
Our wardrobes for the season.

Oh dear! the men are heartless quite;
I fear my heart will break.
To think, sweet CCC, I lay last night
One whole long hour awake—
For oh, to hear Pa talk such stuff,
And prophecy distresses;
I vow I haven't half enough
With fifty different dresses!

I feel so tired, so very tired
With working hard all day,
I fear I sha'n't make out to write
The half I've got to say.
I never saw, gracious! no,
I leave that to Miss Prink—
But then it is such weary work
To have to sit and think.

To think what buttons, white or brown,
For that, and that,
What sort of trimming will look best,
What flowers for your hat.
And then to-day I've wound four skeins,
And one of them was double,
While all required the nicest pains,
And gave me so much trouble!

And oh, the trying on, it's worse
Than all the rest beside!
This neck is high, this waist too short,
This sleeve a trifle wide.
I'm like a martyr at the stake,
Alas! it's no use sighing;
I'd rather sit all day and make
Than be forever trying.

To think a whole week has gone by Since I received a call,
For we're so busy, Ma and I,
We don't receive at all.
I'm almost dying, too, to know
About my friends the Chases,
What good-for-nothings, we met, at least,
In fifty different places.

Of satins, silks, delaines, barege,
My brain is always teeming,
Of tarltons, poplins, muslins, tulle
I am forever dreaming;
In visions through the night I see
All round me cherub faces,
With wings of gauze, look out and smile
From clouds composed of laces.

The clock's at twelve, my ormolu,
Its silvery stroke I hear;
And now, sweet CCC, I'll say adieu,
Kisses, dear, kisses, dear.
Ma chère amie, I've nothing more
Particular to tell,
So for the present au revoir,
From yours sincerely—BELLE.

OUR MAY-DAY FESTIVAL.

I.

DECIDEDLY, I had the blues.

If I knew a nicer word I would use it; but there is no other word that will express the exact state of the case. It includes ennui in the direct degree, with a superaddition of mild hysterics. But every body knows what the word means.

I stood by a window in the reception-room (our house is an English basement, with the front-door on a level with the sidewalk), looking out upon the west street. It was the first of May, and the skies were dark and gloomy, and the trees drip, drip, dripping in the most lugubrious and dismal whimpsy way. The broad and polished panes were cold and damp, and I wrote words on their humid surface—such words as were coming through my mind at the moment—and my own name, "Sabine Brainard," and that of another person, "Orville Clark"—the last the oftenest. But even his name did not dissipate my wretched feelings.

"Oh dear!" I cried, turning away from the window, and going to a table whose marble surface bore a vase of brilliant hot-house flowers, that gave me a fragrance before as I bent over them—"how I do wish I lived in the country!

"In the country, dear?" said my mother, who had just come to look at the flowers; "sighing for the country on such a rainy day?"

"I don't believe it rains in the country," I said, pettishly, as I hid my face among roses and azaleas and lemon blooms; "it wouldn't rain in the country on May-day, I'm sure. And Clara Clark writes in her letter such a glowing account of the festivities that are to be held to-day in the grove near their house. They are going to have a Queen of the May, and a May-pole, with songs and garlands and fresh outdoor flowers—not such dainty, delicate blooms as these, which die almost while one breathes their incense."

"You are out of spirits, dear. You danced too much last night. Get an interesting book, and forget the rain for a little while. There will be parties soon, no doubt."

"No one will call on such a day," said I, "and I don't want to see them if they do. And I have been reading all the morning besides, and I am tired of books. I am tired of every thing. I am tired of life; there!"

With this I actually burst into tears, and went back to the window to gaze into the gloomy street —a proceeding not calculated to work a speedy cure of my distress—similia similibus curantur to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Oh, foolish child!" said mother, caressingly, putting her arm about my waist.

"I know it is foolish," said I, "but how can I help it? I wish I could, with all my heart. I would rather have a toothache."

At this juncture a smile suddenly drove the gloom out of my face, though the tears still stood in my eyes, and I nodded cheerfully to a young man who entered at the gate and touched his hat to us under his umbrella.

"There is Orville Clark!" I exclaimed, "and he saw me crying! What will he think?"

"Oh, yes, dear!" ejaculated Orville, in his gay fashion, as he entered the room. "What's the matter, Sabine? You look quite interesting, but not very happy. What is it?"

"Did you see me cry?" I asked, most superfluously, and a little ashamed.

"I did; and when that sunny smile sent its light over your face, while your eyes still sparkled with tears, what do you suppose I thought of?"

"A great baby, I suppose."

"Oh, méchanceté! No! Sunshine breaking over a meadow after an April shower, while the pearly drops still glittered on the blades of grass."

"One might know you were a poet," said I.

"Say rather might know I was afflicted on a farm. But you forget to tell me what the matter was. Or mustn't I know?"

"Oh, nothing is the matter, except that horrid malady they call the blues. And I was sighing for the country too. I got a letter from Clara this morning, giving a glowing picture of a May-day festival in the grove at Beverley; and when I thought of the pleasures of that scene, and contrasted it with this dismal, foggy, dull day, it made me feel as if—as if—and besides, I was lonesome, and it is real good of you, Orville, to come in on such a horrid day."

"You're super good," said he, in his odd way, "the strangest combination of woman and little girl I ever knew—beg pardon for saying so—and the sweetest. I came on business, too."

"But you were not at Mrs. Delmon's last night; and I thought you had gone home on a visit so as to be at the country May-day in the woods."

"I had another engagement last night. But as to going a-Maying, my errand this morning is to ask you to go to a May-day festival this afternoon."

"Oh, where?" I cried, in delight.

"That's a mystery. I can tell nothing further than that the party is to meet at three o'clock at Beaujour's; but whither to proceed is the mysterious point. In fact the thing is a surprise, and there's something very odd about it every way. The invitations are the greatest curiosity of the season; and not only that, they were delivered in a most unprecedented style. Colonel Frank Rothsay goes galloping about the city in the rain with the notes, on that black horse of his, and every one that old blue-ever-coat that has got I don't know how many bullet-holes in it.

While speaking he handed me the note of invitation. It was written in a graceful, delicate hand—evidently a lady's—and read as follows:

"Mr. Orville Clark is hereby requested to absent himself with a lady companion and two or more well-stored picnic baskets, and to conveyance at Beaujour's restaurant, Broadway, at three o'clock, P. M. to-day, prepared to participate in a glorious May-day festival.

"Ladies are requested to wear plain, serviceable attire. Our motto to-day is, Down with Dignity—and Dresses!

"We are ever such an odd thing?" said I.

"What can it mean?"

"Don't know, I'm sure," said Orville. "Both say handed it to me on the street, and bade me read and accept on the spot; and I did as I was bid. 'Full baskets, remember!' he sang out, as he rode off. 'And never mind the rain.'"

"Whatever it is," said mother, "it is sure to be genteel, with Colonel Rothsay delivering the invitations in person."

"You will go, Sabine?" asked Orville.

"Yes."

"And don't take your blues along," said he.

I laughed. "I think they are gone already," said I.

"Not to Beaujour's, I hope!" he exclaimed, in pretended dismay.

II.

EVERY body knows Beaujour's Assembly Rooms —where that graceful Monsieur teaches the young idea how to behave. The dancing-master was not present in person on the occasion I am telling about, however. He had surrendered his rooms into other hands.

You should have seen the curiosity painted on every face in the gathering of wealth and fashion which had responded to the invitation at Beaujour's that afternoon about 3 o'clock. The crème de la crème of our best society was represented there; such a lady or gentleman every-where, and one that was not the representative of very considerable wealth. Despite the injunction to plain attire, there was a certain agreeable display of toilet and display, that showed how completely mystified all were—how determined not to be caught in the trap of that odd invitation billet, if it were a trap. Most of these May-day merry-makers had a lurking suspicion that there was a good deal more in the affair than those billets promised. And indeed there was; but how little they dreamed what!

Colonel Frank Rothsay and his tall and beautiful sister Blanche—a prominent belle—acted as hosts on the occasion, and received us with the heartiest cordiality, and an absence of ceremony that prompted every thing delightful. They, at least, were dressed with the greatest plainness. In response to the numerous and eager inquiries launched at them by the guests, they vouchsafed no better response than "Wait and see."

As for the "well-stored picnic baskets," Orville declared that no country picnic ever saw such a collection since picnics were. Huge hampers came up the stairs on the backs of servants, and disappeared into the long dancing-hall, where no one was allowed to peep on any pretext. Not till the company had all arrived, and the carriages had been dismissed with injunctions to call at six, were the doors thrown open. Then the throng was admitted to the hall.

Though the little ante-rooms had seemed so crowded, there was but a small party after all when they had joined into the hall—only about a score, all told. We found a long, rude table, improvised of boards and carpenters' "horses" (I think they call them), but covered with the finest and whitest cloths. At one end of the hall the baskets of provisions were gathered.

"Now, then, ladies and gentlemen," sang out Colonel Rothsay, rapping the table to procure silence, "our fun is before us. We have this table set with our own hands, after the orthodox custom of May-day merry-makings in the country. Our guests will arrive at 6 o'clock, and by that time all must be ready. So to work!"

There was a buzz of surprise and wonderment in the room.

"What does it mean?" I asked Orville.

"Blessed if I know," was his answer.

But when Colonel Rothsay coolly proceeded to take off the coat, and fell to unpacking one of the biggest hampers, while his sister, pinning back her skirts and tucking up her sleeves, received the contents from his hands and began to arrange them on the long table, we all followed suit, with a deal of laughter and merriment.

Such a splendid "spread" (as Orville said) as that table presented after an hour's labor on the part of these amateur workers! There was every thing to tempt the appetite, and the greatest profusion of it too. Whole roast turkeys, chickens, and games; profusion of buttered biscuits and rolls; bureens of raw oysters; vases of celery; cakes and sweetmeats without stint. And, besides, there were vases filled with the choicest hot-house flowers, standing at intervals along the table, and loading the air with their perfume. I confess I was proud of the share I had had in producing this elegant collation.

By five o'clock the work was all done; and meantime the arrival of footsteps in the ante-rooms told that our mysterious guests were gathering. Blanche Rothsay was out there receiving them; but there was no communication allowed. The door was locked and the key in Colonel Rothsay's pocket, so that no curious eyes should solve the mystery in advance. Curiosity was on the qui vive now more than ever.

"Well, we are all ready, I believe," said the Colonel, at last. "Allow me now to station you at proper points along the table. You are to serve as waiters for this occasion only; and while I thank you all very much for your confidence in my discretion, and your obedience to my will thus far, I will add that the moment approaches when your self-command, and the generosity of spirit are to be put to the strongest test."

So, when we had all been placed behind chairs at proper intervals, the door was thrown open, and in came the guests, escorted by Blanche Rothsay, her black eyes sparkling with animation.

You should have seen the eyes of this astonished company of genteel table-waiters as there came filing into the room a decorous procession of women and children in gala attire, themselves in large-eyed at the sight before them as were their entertainers; for this roguish Frank Rothsay had kept them all in the dark as to the precise nature of the entertainment to which they were invited. Colonel Rothsay, acting as head-waiter, superintended the arrangement of the guests, at a hundred in number, and then once more he addressed us.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said he, "you are standing in the presence of widows and children of men who have fallen in the rebellion. They have accepted my invitation, extended in your behalf, to partake of this May-day feast. I confess that my own breast swells with pride and emotion, as I look upon these faces, and feel that all who sit here have known what it is to give their dearest country. They have not shed their blood in battle, but they have given those who were dearer to them than life, and I look upon them as no less heroic than those brave men who shouldered their muskets and went out to face the foe. I am proud of my relation to these ladies present, and I know that all your hearts will beat in unison with mine."

A brisk pattering of applauding palms from the table-waiters greeted this little speech; and then the Colonel, addressing the guests, added,

"And now, my friends, to serve you."

They were a little timid at first, and accepted the good things pressed upon them half shrinkingly, yet with a grateful moisture in their eyes. But there was no resisting the genial influence of the hour; the timidity all wore off, and the poor creatures ate of the bounty spread before them with our souls glad.

It was a scene I never shall forget as long as I live; and more than once I found the tears welling into my foolish eyes—but not such tears as those petulant drops that Orville Clark bohold in the morning, and of which I now felt heartily ashamed.

When the guests had finished their repast, Colonel Rothsay had another speech to make;

"What remains of the dinner," said he—"and there is an abundance left, I am glad to see—is to be given to our friends, to take home with them. For my part, I have resolved to add to the gift dishes, baskets, and all. But I presume some of you—not knowing the nature of the occasion—have sent dishes, silverware, and so forth, that may possess a family value. I would request that all such be set apart, and the rest be distributed among our friends. We can not give them too much; and the more we give the better we shall feel to-morrow, and the pleasanter this merry-making will be to remember for long as we live."

"Mr. Head-waiter," said Orville Clark, "I propose that we carry the thing a little further. Here is a fine dollar bill—the price of a ball ticket—which I offer as the bottom of a pile, to be covered by the gentlemen present."

He put it on a plate, and passed it around. It was speedily covered. Charley Nash (you know what a beau he is in society—just imagine) thought he had a soul above a value—but he is immensely wealthy) put a hundred-dollar bill on the pile; and, on all, over three hundred dollars were raised.

"Can't we give any thing?" said I to Orville.

"Certainly," said he, "whatever you like."

So I put my diamond ring on the top of bills. Several of the other ladies followed the example, amidst a great deal of laughter; and I do believe our jewelry mounted up to more than the gentlemen's money.

On the way home, that happy May-night, Orville whispered, as he took my hand in his:

"Your diamond is gone, Sabine. Will you let me give you another?"

The words might have meant little in themselves, but the look and tone which sent them deep down into my happy heart thrilled me with joy, and I murmured "Yes."

"And are your bad spirits quite exorcised?" he added.

"Quite," said I. "And never in my life have I known so happy a May-day as this has been."

I shall be twenty next December, and we are to be married then.

TOO LATE.

BY JEAN INGELOW.

AY, I saw her, we have met—
Married eyes how sweet they be!
Are you glad, my heart?
Then you might have been with me?
Silence! make no more ado!—
Did she think I should forget?
Matters not, though I knew,
Margaret, Margaret!

Once those eyes, full sweet, full shy,
Told a certain thing to mine;
What they told me I put by,
Oh, no careless of the sign.
Such an easy thing to take
And I did not want it then;
Fool! I wish my heart would break
Scorn is mad on hearts of men.

Scorn of self is bitter work,
Each of us has felt it now,
Bluest skies she counted mirk,
Salt-betrayed of eyes and brow;
As for me, I went up hill
And a better man drew nigh,
Fain to earn, with long essay,
What the winner's hand threw by.

Matters not in deserts old
What was born, and waxed, and yearned,
Yea to what its meaning told,
I am come—its deeps are learned—
Come, but there is naught to say—
Look-keeper eyes with mine have met.
Silence! oh, I had my day,
Margaret, Margaret!

A DAY'S SHOOTING IN MAY.

MR. B. FRANKLIN BERJARVIS is a young man and a job printer—somewhere in Pearl Street, if I am not misinformed. He recently married a wife, as all young men and job printers ought to do if they can; and for some months past has "kept house" in Williamsburg. His mother lives with him. Now it happened to a certain third cousin of Mr. Berjarvis's mother that in his old age he took a notion to be married, and, in a style befitting his wealth, in the village of ——, in a neighboring State. Mr. Berjarvis's mother, wishing to attend her cousin's wedding, invited Mr. Berjarvis to go to the funeral at ——, since she did not feel able to go herself. Mr. B. complied with the request. It was the middle of May-week, and a jaunt countryward by no means a disagreeable thing to endure.

On the funeral who should Mr. Berjarvis behold but his long-time acquaintance and fellow-citizen, Mr. Wooster Booksmith? Mr. Booksmith is chief accountant in the well-known wholesale cloth-house of Overhill and Hammond, northeast corner of Duane and Church streets. Besides being a skilful one and Church streets. Besides being a skilful one Mr. Booksmith is an enthusiastic disciple of Audubon. Natural history is his pet hobby, and has been from boyhood. He has a fine collection of birds pinioned tastily in glass cases at his house in Williamsburg, together with several zoological specimens in an inanimate stuffed condition, and boasting such labels as "Arctonyx Ludovicianus: Prairie Dog"—"Strix flammeu: Barn Owl"—"Procyon Lotor: Raccoon"—&c., &c. Berjarvis had often been over Booksmith's little museum, and took quite a neighborly interest in it.

As soon as opportunity permitted the friends came together and exchanged salutations.

"Why, Berjarvis!"

"What, Booksmith!"

"What you doing here, old fellow?"

"Why, the old gentleman was a third cousin of my mother's. She wanted me to come, and I came."

"Precisely my case—only the relationship is on my wife's side; and as she was so anxious I should show respect for her grand-uncle, of course I couldn't resist—especially as the country is so delightful to visit just now, eh?"

"Just so. Exactly. Found any new bugs?"

"Not yet, though I've come across a rather interesting specimen of the familiar cutrus bovis, which I'll show you after the funeral. But I mean to go out on an excursion in the woods and fields to-morrow. Will you go along?"

"All right. I want to do a little shooting now I'm out here."

"Shooting? Pooh!"

But so the engagement was made.

The next day our friends hired a horse and buggy at a livery stable in the village and started for the green regions.

"You haven't any gun?" said Bookmith.

"Oh, no; I wouldn't be just the fellow to bring your gun along when you come to a funeral, you know. Besides, I haven't got any gun to bring. The fact is, I am not much of a sportsman anyhow. But I brought my revolver. It's in my coat-pocket. And then there's Carlo, you know."

"What's Carlo?"

"Why, my dog. Don't you know Carlo? There he is, running along by the fence. I don't know what breed he is—"

"Not a pure breed, I should say," broke in Bookmith, anxious to air his erudition; "a cross, recrossed indefinitely, I should say. Part fox, part spaniel, cana extrarius; by his nose, more of a bulldog; by his tail, a Siberian. Remarkably fine tail that."

"It is a handsome tail," said Berjarvis, gratified at this testimony from science, and gazing with a new interest on the fine bushy tail which curled high and gracefully, over Carlo's back. "A decidedly handsome tail. I bought him particularly on account of his tail. Mrs. Berjarvis says it's a perfect poem of a tail—and she knows what poetry is. But that's neither here nor there. As I was saying, the dog's breed is a matter of question; but there is something about him that seems to me to indicate reserved power in the way of pedigree. I don't know how runs along, always putting his nose to something or other and sniffing it. If that isn't an indication of a blooded dog what is?"

"But see here, Berjarvis," said Bookmith, who has a great horror of fire-arms," are you sure that pistol is entirely safe? You say you're not used to shooting."

"Well, I guess I can handle a revolver," said Berjarvis, a trifle indignant. "I am not wholly an ignoramus with regard to the hunt, Bookmith. I have shot off a pistol fifty times. I have also shot off one in a shooting-gallery once or twice, and I call myself a good marksman, though I say it that shouldn't. I seldom miss the bull's eye, I assure you. When I say I am not entirely at home, man, I mean I am not familiar with game, and in fact never did say thing in the woods in my life. But that is only for want of practice. Can you shoot?"

"No, I never shoot."

"Well, now," said Berjarvis drew from a cavernous receptacle in the side of his coat a huge navy revolver, "what's—"

"Good Heavens! What a monster!" cried Bookmith.

"Just the thing to hunt with," said Berjarvis, calmly. "Why, that pistol carries a ball that would knock over a grizzly bear. It would nearly shoot a monkey's head right off his shoulders."

Mr. Bookmith looked at the formidable weapon with great apparent respect; but he was manifestly relieved when Berjarvis put it back with his handkerchief.

They rode on for some time, conversing on various topics born of the hour and the scene—its verdant fields, its sparkling brooks, its wooded hills, its broad, pure, balmy atmosphere. They passed bright orchards which slanted them with delicious blossom-color; smiled over rustic homesteads; at last drew up at a quiet-looking red farm-house, back of which, half a mile across the fields, was a promising stretch of wild woodland.

A farmer in a flannel shirt, and with his pantaloons tucked into his boot-legs, came to the gate to see what the strangers wanted.

"Good-mornin'," said the farmer.

"Morning, Sir," said Berjarvis, who being fluent of speech took upon himself the office of spokesman as his patient sight. "We want to leave our horse in your care, if you please, and then we will go over into those woods yonder. You will give the horse something to eat if he needs it—does a horse need any thing at this time of day, Bookmith?"

"I don't know, I'm sure."

"Well, you know what he needs, friend" (to the farmer). "We'll pay you for your trouble when we return from the woods."

"Goin' into the woods?" said the farmer man, with a look of profound curiosity. "Goin' shootin'?"

"Why, you see," said Berjarvis, good-naturedly, while he winked at Bookmith, "my friend here is a naturalist. He is a disciple of Agassiz, and he is going out to search for bugs and things, and I am going to see what I can find in the way of game."

"Oh, you're a disciple of raound, eh? Where's your gun?"

"I brought along nothing but my pistol," explained Bookmith. "We are from New York, and only out for a day's shooting."

"And your friend's a natural, is he?" said the farmer, looking with compassionate eye on Bookmith. "Poor feller! Now he looks as if he knowed as much as you or me. Hunts for bugs, eh? Does he eat 'em, or what does he do with 'em?"

"Oh, ha! ha! ha! You misunderstand me, my friend. Not a natural—a naturalist. Quite a different thing, I assure you. He collects bugs in a scientific way, and sticks them on pins in glass cases for preservation."

"Oh, that's it! Wa'al, I'll 'tend to your hoss for ye. I s'pose you won't be back right off, and I'll give him a bite about noon-time."

"Yes, do. And see here, Bookmith, hadn't we better come back and dine here?—that is, provided our friend won't object to turning his house into a hotel to that extent." And the courteous printer looked inquiringly at his farmer.

"That's all right," said the honest yeoman, "I'll have th' old woman cook a couple o' chicken for ye."

"Prime!" said Berjarvis, smacking his lips in anticipation of the glorious appetite he should bring to them that hour. "Now, then, though, what game have you in these woods? You see I'm not much used to this section. Most of my shooting has been done in York State."

York city, he would have said, had he deemed it important to be precise.

"Wa'al, I don' know's there's much of any thin' worth shutin' now 'round here, 'thout it is squirrels."

"Squirrels vulgaris," interjected Bookmith, tired of holding his tongue.

"Wa'al, that's for you to say," said the farmer, scratching the crown of his head and guessing the rest. "Gray squirrels is to'bl eatin'."

Berjarvis whistled to his dog.

"Is that your dog?" said the farmer.

"Yes."

"Proper fine fait he's got, hain't he?"

"Yes, a good tail—and a good eye, eh?"

"Wa'al, I don' know much 'bout dogs anyhow," said the non-committal farmer. "But his tail is a purty."

With this the farmer drove off with the horse.

The sportsmen got over a fence and started for the woods, accompanied by Carlo, frisky and given to smelling at all sorts of objects.

"I tell you what it is," said his proud owner, "if there's a gray squirrel in these woods that dog will unearth him."

Bookmith was musing deeply, and he did not take any response beyond the comfortability of a gray squirrel's needing to be unearthed.

"See here, Berjarvis," said he, gravely, "do you think it the least right to shoot gray squirrels in May?"

"Why not?" said the other.

"Why, don't you know they are attending to their little families about this time? Their young are taken care of and fed by the parents till they are four or five weeks old, and I should think it a pity to can't be more than a few days old by this time, I should say. I'd like would you feel to know that you had shot the father or mother of a little interesting little family of squirrels unable to provide for themselves?"

"Oh, if you put it on humanitarian grounds," argued Berjarvis, "I don't know as it would be right to shoot at any time of the year—or, in fact, any thing else. But I'm not so soft as that comes to. I wouldn't shoot a harmless little bird, as I know of, during the time of incubation; but a squirrel is different. And seems to me I've heard that squirrels suck birds' eggs, and kill the little birds. Who wouldn't shoot such a marauding villain?"

"The gray squirrel, Berjarvis—sciurus nigratorius—lives entirely on nuts. You've no excuse at all for shooting at the harmless little fellow."

"Oh, don't preach, Bookmith! Don't spoil a fellow's fun. Here it's the end of the hunter's voice to shot at any thing anyhow. Don't you run bugs and butterflies through with pins like a butcher? What's the moral?"

"That is different, Berjarvis," was the calm reply. "We may do that in the interest of science which would be wrong to do out of mere sport."

"Ha! what's that?" cried Berjarvis, excitedly, drawing and cocking his big revolver.

They had reached the edge of the beech eye of the sportsman had detected a little striped fellow running along the rail fence, cheeping like a juvenile chicken. At the sound of the hunter's voice it shot out of sight like a flash.

"That was a ground squirrel—tamias striatus—commonly called a chipmunk. Ah, I wouldn't shoot a chipmunk, I hope? It isn't a squirrel proper anyhow. Its food is not good to eat, and it is as harmless as a dove—you, I'm sure, would not shoot you, Berjarvis, don't shoot a chipmunk."

"Oh, bother! Now, Bookmith, you go to catching bugs if you want to, and leave me and Carlo to our sport (But where is the dog? Carlo! Carlo! Ah, there he goes!) Now you stick to your bugs—there's a good fellow!"

"Hist!" uttered Bookmith, eagerly, laying his hand on his friend's arm; "there's a beautiful specimen—a—a dove—yes, and Bookmith pointed his finger at a gay-colored little bird that sat on a limb at no great distance. "Fetch him down for me," he whispered, hurriedly. "I want that fellow."

Berjarvis, all excitement, blazed away.

Nothing came of it.

"Ah, you missed him!" sighed Bookmith. "A beautiful tanager as I ever saw—tanagra cyanescens, I think. He would have mounted beautifully."

"Now look at that!" cried Berjarvis. "Just look at it! It's no harm to shoot a pretty little bird when you want to stuff it and put it away for some thing and set him on a wire! There's your consistency! I'm glad I didn't hit him. I'm ashamed for having shot at him. If I had hit him the bullet would have knocked him into raw hash! There goes a squirrel!"

"Crack! went the pistol.

The sportsmen rushed forward. No squirrel to be seen.

"You don't seem to ever hit any thing!" said Bookmith, reproachfully.

"There goes another!" cried Berjarvis again.

"The wood's full of 'em! See him?—running along on that fence log!"

It was running along, rather slowly for a squirrel, on a log which formed the basis of a rail fence in the wood.

Crack!

Another rush forward, and simultaneously Carlo set up a most agonizing "Ki-yi! ki-yi!" but the eager sportsman had no ear for the dog, whatever his momentary distress. Bookmith struck a fallen tree and went over it sprawling.

"Don't I ever hit any thing?" cried Berjarvis, triumphantly, grabbing through the fence at the furry something he had "brought down." "Don't I? What do you say to—"

He stopped short, staring at his trophy.

"What's the matter?" asked Bookmith, coming up limping.

"Carlo! Carlo!" cried the dog's master, without replying to his friend, "come here, poor fellow! Come here!"

Carlo was a dolorously unhappy dog at that point in his history. He was suffering untold agonies. He had been running along behind that fence log, and his acute sight apprehending a bonne up above the log, had been shot at as it ran. Now there was a bleeding stump where the beautiful tail had been; the tail itself was in Mr. Berjarvis's murderous hand.

"Ha, ha, ha!" roared Bookmith, "you did hit it this time!"

"Don't laugh, Bookmith," said Berjarvis, almost with tears in his eyes, as he patted his poor dog's head, though the pain was not at that end.

"Oh dear! oh dear!" moaned the laughter-consumed Bookmith, "how can I help it? It was such a perfect case of a tail!"

"Hush up, will you?"

"And that pistol would knock a monkey's head off!"

"Bookmith, I'll tell you what it is, I've had enough of this," said Berjarvis, starting up angrily; "I'm going home!"

This sobered the book-keeper instanter.

"Oh, pooh!" said he. "Don't get mad, Berjarvis. Here, Carlo! Where's my trophies?"

"Hang your trophies! You've got as many as I have. I say I'm going," and he suited the action to the word.

There was no help for it. The naturalist followed the disciple of Nimrod back to the farmhouse.

"You're back quick," said the farmer. "Shute any thing? Why, 'tastin' wonder I where's your hoss?"

"Never mind the tail," said Berjarvis, bitterly. "Fetch up the horse."

"Why, you hain't goin' off 'thout yr' dinner, be ye? It's a-cookin' now. Don't ye smell it?"

The delicious savor of roast fowl from the kitchen did indeed assail the nostrils of the sportsmen, and even in his distress Berjarvis wavered visibly.

"Come, my friend, friends," said the farmer, assuming the office now of host, consoler, and friend, "you better set by and have a good dinner, and give the hoss time to assemble' too to soothe him. Ain't I hain't fodered y'r hoss yit either. An' I've got some fust-rate salve I'll put on the dog's accident, an' he'll be well 'gain' arter a little rest. An' then, arter dinner, if you say so, we'll all go over the hill yonder to one of the sassiest trout-creeks in these parts. Ain't it, Josiah?" (to his wife), "ain't I all hate, but fishin's tip-top."

"Trout!" ejaculated Berjarvis, beaming delightedly on Bookmith.

"Splendid!" cried the book-keeper.

So they went into the house and rested their heated frames in the cool, pleasantly cool little "front room" while dinner was made ready. Carlo was cared for with gentle art, and when the trio sallied forth, out after dinner the dog trotted contentedly, albeit soberly, behind them. The farm-house contained many of the requisite tackle, it being, in fact, a frequent resort of anglers from the neighboring village; and though our friends were but indifferent sharers of the cod they succeeded very much to their own satisfaction. With theofarmer's aid they took back a fine string of brook-trout on their return home at night.

I do not know how Mr. Berjarvis accounted to Mrs. B. for the loss of Carlo's tail, but I sincerely trust he told her the truth, like a brave man.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

REAL ESTATE.—Puns is such a thorough testimonial that it is not to be wondered at rather prefer a watery grave than be preserved in spirits.

A COVERT MEANING.—What is the difference between a hotel and a lawyer? Why, one is the latter case you come to the cover before the meat, in the former to the meet before the cover.

A bachelor, up Penn Street, Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, picked up a thimble. He stood a while, meditating on the probable history of the owner, when he pressed it to his lips, saying: "Oh, that it were the fair cheek of the fair fair!" At a window, Bridget, a fat, colored lady looked out of an upper-story window, and said: "Bore, you please throw out dat fimble of mine in de entry: I jist saw drapt it."

ORIGINAL DEFINITION FOR A KISS.—Report at headquarters.

An Irishman being in church where the collection appeared to be unusually short, on his horse, on its being handed to him, whispered in the carrier's ear that he was not naturalized and could not vote.

"William, my son, how can you be so muddy your dress so?"

Willie stopped a moment, then looking his father in the eye, very solemnly replied:

"Your whickers are unprofessional," said a client to his legal adviser. "Why so?" "Because as a lawyer can never be too barefaced."

A "JOURNEY BULL" CAPTURED BY A FENIAN.

At a recent examination of children at Swansea, England, the question was asked, why the children of Israel made a golden calf and worshiped it after they had been forbidden such flattery by Moses? A precocious little fellow promptly answered, "Because they had not enough gold to make a bull with." The laughter which followed put a stop to the examination for that day.

A NEW INVENTION.—The latest invention is a "palpitating bosom" for the ladies, which is set in motion by a concealed spring when an extra display of "emotion" is required.

An orator in appealing to the "bone and sinew," said: "My friends, I am proud to see around me the hardy yeomanry of the land, for I love the agricultural interests of the country; and well may I love them, for—(pointing for I was born a farmer; the happiest days of my youth were spent in the peaceful occupation of a son of the soil. In fact, to speak figuratively, I may say I was born between two rows of corn!" A pumpkin, by accident, released an inebriated chap, just in front of the stage.

TEN RULING PASSIONS.—A great financial reformer is so devoted to figures that when he has nothing else to do he eats up his eyes.

A railway accident lately occurred, caused by the axis of a leader giving way, derailing the train several hours. A lady inquired of a gentleman, who was not to be delayed, by gravely replied, "Madam, it was occasioned by the axis being broken." A serious consequence—the sudden breaking of a tender attachment."

A gentleman, talking to another on the subject of marriage, made the following observation: "I first saw my wife in a storm; carried her to a hut to keep her sorted her in a storm; married her in a storm; lived in a storm all her life; but, thank Heaven, I hurled her in pleasant weather."

Why is the James River like a bag of linger beer?—Because it flows into the Dutch Gap.

"Are them all Bibles?" asked a countryman the other day in the registrar's office, pointing to the big volumes of wills upon the shelves. "No, Sir," answered one of the clerks, "those are testaments."

SCARCITY OF WATER.—It is said that in New South Wales an old maid is a much rarer animal than a black swan. It is asserted that the fair emigrant from England receive offers of marriage through speaking-trumpets before they land from the ship; and the scarcity the proposal she signifies it by holding up the finger on which she expects the wedding-ring to be placed.

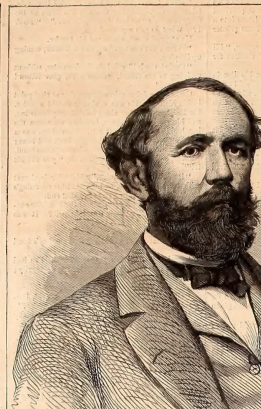
"Pat, what's the matter with your eye?" "Faith, Mick, I can't." "Well, then, it's because of the scarcity of the raw commodity."



When is a blow from a lady welcome?—When she strikes you agreeably.

HENRY A. SMYTHE, ESQ.

HENRY A. SMYTHE, Esq., who has recently been appointed by the President as Collector of the port of New York, was born in Hobart, Delaware County, in this State, in 1817, and is now in the fiftieth year of his age. His father, one of the earliest settlers in that section of the country, was a popular and able lawyer, and his maternal grandfather was the HON. ANTHONY MARVINE, also a distinguished lawyer, and who for some time represented the Delaware district in Congress.

At an early age MR. SMYTHE, after receiving a good academic education, came to this city, commencing his business life as clerk in one of our large jobbing and importing houses. This house having been burned out in 1839, Mr. SMYTHE became connected with a large importing house, in which he subsequently became a partner. After remaining here about SIX years he joined the domestic commission house of F. SKINNER & Co., of Boston, to whom, soon after, he suggested the propriety of opening a branch house in this city. The success of this enterprise was so striking that many of the merchants of Boston formed similar connections with New York. He remained in this firm until 1857, when he established the large and extensive house of SMYTHE, STRAGUE, & COGGIN. Mr. SMYTHE, in this new position, as heretofore, was the managing man of the firm, the business of which was most profitably and successfully carried on, even through all the great commercial excitement and revulsions of the period from 1857 to 1864. During the latter year he retired from the partnership, and was immediately elected President of the Central National Bank—an institution which was brought into existence mainly through his efforts, and he still remains at its head. The ability with which he engineered the affairs of the bank is the strongest evidence that could be given of MR. SMYTHE'S business tact and energy of character, as well as his executive ability, which constitute the very qualifications requisite for the Collector of the port of New York.

Honorable in his own actions and dealings, it is expected that MR. SMYTHE will exact the same standard from his subordinates in the Custom-house. Socially, he is of a genial and benevolent disposition. Fortunately he is not known as a politician. His political bearings are rather conservative, and he is understood to be a supporter of President JOHNSON. This, however, has not prevented his receiving the support of all parties in his claim to the position to which the President has appointed him. It is but rarely that our Collectors have ever been chosen from among merchants, but those few who have been thus chosen were, without doubt, the most popular and efficient ones we have had. Certainly there is room for reformation in the New York Custom-house; and the man best calculated to bring this about is not a politician, but one such as we believe MR. SMYTHE to be—a man eminent for business tact and rigid integrity.

HENRY A. SMYTHE, ESQ.

THE NEGRO CELEBRATION IN WASHINGTON.

THE occasion of the celebration, which took place April 19, was the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Two regiments of colored troops and various colored civic associations, with many other colored citizens, assembled in front of the Executive Mansion, making a dense mass of colored faces, relieved here and there by a few white ones. After the firing of cannon and the playing of several martial airs three cheers were given for the President of the United States, who, having been escorted to a prominent position, addressed the assemblage.

The President, after thanking his colored friends for the compliment they were paying him in presenting themselves before him on the day of their celebration, reminded them that their truest friends were not those who had selected them "as a hobby and a pretense by which they could be successful in obtaining and maintaining power." He claimed to have himself contributed more than any other man in procuring the Constitutional ratification of their emancipation. He had done this not to gain power, but to establish freedom—a cause for which he had perilled his all. He concluded as follows:

"Then let me mingle with you in celebration of the day which commenced your freedom. I do it in sincerity and truth, and trust in God the blessings which have been conferred may be enjoyed and appreciated by you, and that you may give them a proper direction. There is something for all to do. You have high and solemn duties to perform, and you ought to remember that freedom is not a new idea. It must be reduced to practical reality. Men in being free must deny themselves many things which seem to be embraced in the idea of universal freedom. It is with you to give evidence to the world and the people of the United States whether you are going to appreciate this great boon as it should be, and that you are worthy of being freemen. Then let me thank you with sincerity for the compliment you have paid me by passing through here to-day, and paying your respects to me. I repeat again, the time will come when you will know who have been your best friends, and who have been your friends from mercenary considerations. Accept my thanks."

Very many of the audience approached and shook hands with the President.

The procession then re-formed and took up the line of march along Pennsylvania Avenue. In passing the Capitol cheer after cheer rent the air in compliment to their legislative friends. There were probably 4000 or 5000 colored men in the procession, while 10,000 of the same race were interested spectators, manifesting their joy and gladness by waving their hats and handkerchiefs and cheering lustily the passing procession. The celebration was closed with religious services and the delivery of addresses in Franklin Square in the presence of a vast multitude. The stand on the south side of the Square was calculated to seat a large number of persons, and was handsomely decorated, a large national flag being displayed on either side, and one hanging in festoon at the front corners, with one in front on which was a message of President LINCOLN as follows:

"Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives: The act entitled 'An act for the release of certain persons held to service in the District of Columbia' has this day been approved and signed. A. LINCOLN.

"April 16, 1862."

Over the top of this stand was the inscription:

"LINCOLN, the Liberator of millions: his great work is done, and he sleeps in peace in the great prairies of the West. We are loyal to God and to our country. This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes."

Also:

"We have received our civil rights. Give us the right of suffrage, and the work is done."

The audience were then addressed by the REV. HIGHLAND GARNETT (colored), Senator TRUMBULL, and the HON. HENRY WILSON.

Remarkable Cure of Stiff Knee by Allcock's Porous Plasters.

How many persons, from stepping on a piece of orange-peel, have been lamed for life. A case which might have been of that kind has just been brought to our notice. A gentleman, from placing the heel of his boot on a piece of orange-peel, was suddenly thrown down, and violently sprained his knee. He was six months confined to the house, though he had the best medical advice. As a last resort a very eminent physician was called in to see if any thing more could be done. After examination he said: "My opinion is, your knee will never be bent again." He recommended that the whole leg and knee should be encased in a roll of Porous Plaster, which would encourage the permanent stiffening of the knee, and said that the sooner it was done the better." But the patient, before trying this application and having a fit done for life, obtained it in our Porous Plasters, and in less than two months his knee was perfectly cured.

The Miseries of Despondency,

Growing out of a disordered condition of the liver, are to be shunned. They are very distressing, and often "life looks upon all things with a jaundiced eye." Nothing will relieve the blues and dispel despondency sooner than a bilious bath to quickly as that most extraordinary of all the bilious remedies, HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS. Its operation upon the liver is direct, salutary, and powerful.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat which ended with a dangerous cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation, to combine the medicinal healing virtues of pine, might be so compounded as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. The value of it in the diseases alluded to, I compounded a small quantity of the Medicine and I had been gratified to find it a most triumphant success. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within five days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after I had been asked by a Methodist Clergyman, J. H., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, accompanied by a sudden cold, and had almost become wrecked with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about two ounces of it, and got well. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Sandusky Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the use of seven years in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for the kidneys, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and scurvy it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

"The Three Little Spades."

UNDER the above title will be commenced in the next issue of the Weekly a new serial story by Miss WARNER, author of "THE WIDE, WIDE WORLD." The idea upon which this story is constructed is a novel one, and it can not fail to interest many of our readers—and we know there are many such—as are interested in nature as developed in children and flowers. The story is more especially addressed to young people; but the gracefulness and piquancy of the style, the dramatic interest of the narrative, and the plain and pictures of rural life given in the pages, will make it attractive to all. It is a work unsurpassed by any of this very popular writer's previous efforts in literature. The story will be continued for several weeks, and will form the most delightful summer reading.

MAY'S ADDRESS TO THE COTHAMITES.

COME away to the country!—away! away!
My carpet is spread on the lea!
The trees are in fashion and the air is perfume,
All nature rejoices in me.
The birds in the bowers are telling the hours
Since I have arrived with my lap full of flowers
To scatter ere dawn of day.

Come, Merchant! your carriage is waiting—
Nay, sigh not, 'tis no time to grieve!
Health is better to hold than your silver and gold,
And a super effect to leave.
Your lady's pale cheek it shall bloom in a week,
Not a bosom so sere as the balm-breathing air
Which floats on the surges of May.

Come away! Leave your exile and your parties,
Your concerts and operas gay!
Hear the brooks and rills sing charming close into song—
'Tis Nature's own music, free!
No Ethnic can sing like your bright ripples skip—
All taste them but dash that red cup from your lip
If you'd relish the nectar of May.

Come, Lawyer! we need you. The weasel
Has foreclosed his mortgage on rabbit;
He founds the bag claim of his right to all game—
Cap. 9. Sec. 3. Statutes. Gridelin—
Or perhaps you'll define the estate of the vine,
Gain a rule to show cause why its tendrils should climb
O'er the arbors in frolicsome May.

Come away! Leave your tolling and mulling,
And, Shop-keeper, shut up your store:
You have got a fair wife, buy a long lease of life,
And what can a prince wish for more?
If you'll take a short drive from your overgrown hive
You shall note how the bees in their brisk business thrive,
For 'tis the busy spring trading in May.

Come, Doctor! I've cured half your patients,
Your practice must speedily fail;
Then into your phaeton, and drive like a hill-fox
With tresses of good bounds at his tail.
Leave word for the sick to come out pretty quick,
For you have a fine disease in your hospital to kick
If he scents but the sweet breath of May.

Come away from your college, gale Student,
And learn many lessons more true:
Leave Homer and look into Nature's bright book—
I'll open its pages for you.
Your Wyatt's a rake, but his works you may take,
It was toying with me that he stole half you see
From the theme of blossoming May.

Come, Parson! your sermons are mouldy,
Your sheep do fresh pasturage need;
They have lived through the fall-ripe Sherlock and Hall,
And Scott was, in winter, their feed.
If you'll meet me at night, when the moon's shining bright,
You shall hear the old trees holding forth to the breeze,
And eloquence study in May.

Come away to the country!—away! away!
My carpet is spread on the lea;
The trees are in bloom and the air is perfume,
All nature rejoices in me.
The birds in the bowers are telling the hours
Since I have arrived with my lap full of flowers
To scatter ere dawn of day.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1866.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

WE should be very sorry to believe that the President intended to remove honest and capable men from office because they did not agree in all points with his view of the true policy of reorganization. It would be so flagrant an illustration of the perils of Executive patronage to which we recently alluded, that it would be the plainest duty of the Senate to interpose even the Constitutional impeaching. The removal from office of a member of the Union party, who voted for LINCOLN and JOHNSON in 1864, and of the same political faith now as then, and who has industriously and faithfully done his official duty, because he differs with the President, for instance, upon the conditions which should determine the admission of the late rebel States to Congress, is a blow at every Union man in the country. It is a frank announcement that agreement with the Executive upon theoretical points is the tenure of office. It is the organization of a vast service army of office-holders, and subordinates the whole official service of the country to the will of one man.

In the partisan view such a course is the paralysis of the party which elected the President. It is turning the guns of official patronage upon the Union camp. It is requiring that the Union party shall accept and adopt the theories of the President as its platform, when he and the whole country see that upon some important points, as in the case of the Civil Rights Bill, the great body of the party differ from his theory. Even Mr. RAYMOND, the only Union representative from a former free State who voted for the veto, and upon a constitutional ground, says: "The adoption of some such measure as the Civil Rights Bill was unquestionably desired by the great body of the Union party throughout the country." Yet the President was very distinctly opposed to it, in principle as well as in form. Are his views upon that subject, then, to be regarded as the platform of the party, and is agreement with them the test of fidelity?

Mr. RAYMOND is regarded as one of the chiefs among "the President's friends." He says in the letter to his constituents, from which we have quoted, that he knows the President regards himself as a member of the Union party, and that he has a right to act on his own judgment in all matters of public policy. Unquestionably; but Mr. RAYMOND also says, that agreement to such measures as the Civil Rights Bill has never made any portion of the Union platform, and that freedom of individual judgment upon it will be undoubtedly exercised. Certainly; but if the measures adopted by the almost unanimous voice of Union representatives in Congress, elected at the same time with the President, are not to be regarded as the platform, and may be questioned or opposed within the party, it is very evident that the opinions of the President can not be considered the platform. If Mr. RAYMOND has the party right to differ with the Congress upon a vital point of policy without paying any penalty, why may not the postmaster at Jerusalem Four Corners differ with the Union President without losing his place?

The question of the situation is, what do the loyal people of the country wish? not, what do the President or Congress wish? Mr. LINCOLN and JOHNSON has frankly said, and we are very glad to believe, that his object, like that of his predecessor, is not to impose his own view but to ascertain the national will, and that this can be done by putting men who differ out of office. Such a course makes a body of obsequious office-holders, but it does not make public opinion. Mr. TYLER tried the same country, and LOUIS PHILIPPE in France. Mr. TYLER's experiment is historical. LOUIS PHILIPPE had the most docile National Assembly ever had. It was beautifully harmonious. He was "the best of kings," France was the best of countries. The time was the best of times. But his whole system ended at a crash like a mummy. President JOHNSON, even if he wished to do it—and we sincerely hope that he does not—can not make public opinion. Mr. TYLER tried to reorganize nor coerce public opinion. It is a serious error also to suppose that the public mind will reject a settled conviction because it is vehemently denounced as a delusion. The cry of "mad dog" is pretty effectually exploded for the present. When the Union party saved the country it was called Abolitionist. That was not very dreadful. Now while the same tried and true Union spirit is securing the country in peace it is called Radical. That is still less appalling. The party organization may, indeed, be paralyzed by a certain use of the executive patronage. But experience shows that a President prospers by ruining his party. We believe that nobody knows this better than President JOHNSON; and therefore we hope that it is a mistake to suppose that he has adopted the policy of which we have spoken.

A STALE SOPHISM

IT is amusing to observe the triumphant air with which certain papers ask the question whether, if the United States fought to prevent some of the States from seceding, and were successful, those States are still in the Union and, if so, whether they have not the same rights in the Union that all other States have?

The best answer to this not very profound or conclusive question is a reverent appeal. If the rebel States did not succeed in seceding were they not as much in the Union when the attempt failed as they are now; and, if so, by what right were they subsequently denied for them without their consent; by what right are certain qualified voters of those States disqualified by the United States constitution, and by what right were those States compelled to accept the emancipation amendment before resuming their representation in Congress? If the failure to secede did not restore the rights of the rebel States to the Union, why does the President say to the Texas delegation that he hopes the State will soon be restored to its "normal condition in the Federal Government," but that to this end much would depend upon the people of the State in demonstrating their loyalty to the Government? Unless all this means that Texas, being prevented from seceding, is therefore at once and without further consideration or condition to resume an equal share in the National Government?

The truth is, that the rebel States did not succeed in making themselves independent of the Union; but if the rebellion did not disturb the relation of those States to the Union, all that the President has done is unconstitutional and not binding. If it did disturb that relation, the particular condition which the Government has exact for the same purpose of national security is equally constitutional. The denunciation of Congress upon constitutional grounds for requiring the assent of those States to an amendment equalizing representation is equally a denunciation of the President for demanding their assent to the amendment abolishing slavery, or to the repudiation of the rebel debt, or to the revocation of the acts of secession.

The question of these conditions is wholly one of expediency, and not of constitutional right or authority. And can there be any thing inexpedient in requiring that a voter who was lately a rebel shall not have twice as much power in the Government as a voter who has been always loyal?

NEUTRALITY.

IF the United States intend to regulate the wars of nations according to American ideas of justice and propriety, or by the judgments of American statesmen, that policy should be announced and understood. But while we acknowledge neutral obligations even in wars that seem to us unjust, we must in honor be governed by them, and we must insist that our military and naval chieftains shall respect them. If those gentlemen are to decide both upon the justice of the claims of other nations and upon the propriety of the belligerent measures they may adopt, we shall at once become implicated in every contest.

In the war between Spain and Chili the United States have taken a position of neutrality. It may be a wicked war, ourselves, unjust, horrible. We have resolved to be neutral. Commodore ROGERS says that he was sent out under the strictest injunctions of neutrality. Indeed, to resolute and radical injunctions in this war that, as the special and urgent instance of the Secretary of State, a ship owned by American merchants—the Metaro—is detained, and not only refused, upon the mere suspicion that somehow, somewhere, she may be of some service to Chili. Yet there is evidently very general regret that Commodore ROGERS did not violate his orders and contravene the policy of the Government by giving battle to the Spanish fleet. Now if we do not choose that Spain shall attack Chili, why does not Congress say so? No single act of an unjust war can be so horrible as the war itself, and if we may forcibly withstand any act we may forcibly oppose the war. It is a very cheap virtue which assents to the war and protests against any usual measure of war; for we can not see that the bombardment of Valparaiso, unannounced and before, and succeeding but two or three deaths which might have been easily avoided, was a peculiarly barbarous act of warfare.

Of course, a sudden and unadvised bombardment, imperiling women, children, neutrals, and non-combatants, is ferocious and inexcusable. But suppose that war with Chili, the war being of necessity naval, and Valparaiso being the most vulnerable point of Chili, was it against the law of war to strike at the city in the only practicable manner, after four days' warning for the removal of non-combatants, neutrals, and neutral property? That the city was not bombarded for days before, and was only bombarded after four days' warning, we have fault was that? That there was no Chilean fleet at hand is also true. But is Spain bound to attack only where an attack may be successfully resisted, or to wait until forts are erected or fleets built? Bombardment is a fair act of war. Valparaiso is the chief Chilean city and the most exposed. Does not the bombardment of Valparaiso a peril which Chili should have considered before going to war? Is it and that war was made upon her, and that she is the innocent and aggrieved party? That may be, but the United States have not chosen to take her side, and if our naval and military commanders wish to undertake the adjustment of other powers, let them begin with somebody of their own size; with England, for instance, or Russia, or France. Or if the republics of America choose to form a league of offense and defense, let it be done. But while we are still warm with the denunciation of a false neutrality in our own war, let us at least have the decency not to blame our Generals in command here for respecting our plainest neutral obligations.

EARL RUSSELL AND MR. BANCROFT.

LORD RUSSELL has made a sad mistake. His speeches and letters during our late war were perfectly familiar upon both sides of the Atlantic; his phrase that the United States' Government was fighting for empire has become historic; that he habitually spoke of us as "the late Union" and "the late United States" was undeniable, and yet when Mr. BANCROFT spoke of him as making haste to send word of our agony to the other courts of Europe, LORD RUSSELL asks Mr. ADAMS to convey to Mr. BANCROFT a plain denial of the truth of his assertions, and to refer him to facts of a totally different character.

LORD RUSSELL should have remembered that Mr. BANCROFT is trained to consult authorities, and to make no statement without the verification. Upon the occasion in question he was a historian reciting history, and in the preparation of his discourse he followed his constant method of study and composition—saying nothing for which he could not produce the proof. He therefore responds to LORD RUSSELL'S letter in a brief, nervous, and trenchant letter which utterly refutes it. The question between them is simply whether the tone of LORD RUSSELL'S speeches and dispatches indicated a conviction that the Union was practically dissolved, and the few and local opposition of LORD RUSSELL'S words, which Mr. BANCROFT makes, were conclusive of the offensive assumption which Mr. BANCROFT asserted in his oration. It is a repentance that Earl RUSSELL should have denied the question. It was permitted him to doubt our probable success, since there were many of our own countrymen who shared his incredibility. But why repeal against his own words so freshly spoken and so familiarly remembered?

We have heard of other conspicuous Englishmen making the same mistake, although in a less public manner. Mr. GLADSTONE, for instance, was very doubtful of our success in the late war. He reasoned as a scholar and an observer. No nation hitherto, in his judgment, could have subdued so formidable a rebellion, and he doubted even if Great Britain under the same circumstances could succeed. So he exclaimed in a moment of excitement, not as exactly hostile to us but without any very warm sympathy, "JEFFERSON DAVIS has created a nation!" Mr. GLADSTONE was mistaken; and but summer he privately undertook to explain his position to some friends of the United States, and even sought to show that our ultimate triumph while manner he had been peculiarly friendly to the Union. But when he finished his good-humored explanation one of the hearers exclaimed merrily, in the rhyme of HORACE BURLOW,

"If a man kin when pervishens is riz so,
Kin his own words, 'tis a mercy he is so!"

YET, to one passage in Earl RUSSELL'S unfortunate letter every honorable American will heartily assent. It is his expression of a wish that in time of peace the people of Great Britain and of the United States should keep up "sentiments of irritation and hostility founded on a mistaken apprehension of facts, and tending to lay the foundation of permanent misunderstanding and ill-will." So it had in itself we shall all say Amen. But if it be intended as a rebuke to Mr. BANCROFT it can not be received. Certainly the gentlemanly and generously vituperated by the British papers for his vile ill-manners in denouncing England in a discourse which the English Minister was invited to hear. They expressed at the time our opinion of the perfect propriety of Mr. BANCROFT'S conduct. But his own view should be be given in his own words:

"I was appointed by the American Congress of the life and character of ABRAHAM LINCOLN it was my unavoidable duty to refer to the conduct of the British Government to which our country looked for the administration of justice. I was wounded his feelings, or exercised his judgment, or kindled his festivity.

"I was asked to address the two Houses of our Congress, and those only. When I learned that the British Minister at Washington was likely to be one of my hearers. I requested Mr. STORY to advise him not to be present; and through another friend I made the same particular message, which he received and perfectly understood."

WE are glad that LORD RUSSELL has furnished Mr. BANCROFT this opportunity of explaining a matter which has been curiously misunderstood and vehemently misrepresented.

THE ROSS ROBBERY.

BEFORE the final adjustment of the losses growing out of the KETCHUM frauds, Wall Street has again been startled by a development of rascality even more ingenious than that of EDWARD B. KETCHUM, though involving and involving a smaller amount of money. JOHN ROSS, a speculator in gold and in stocks, has robbed the street of $300,000 or more in gold and in currency, and has successfully escaped with his booty.

But little is known of the man's antecedents. He seems to have had for many years intimate acquaintances. He had been an operator in Wall Street for some years, and, until their failure, was a customer of KETCHUM, SON, & CO. Whether he learned the trade at the feet of EDWARD B. KETCHUM is matter of conjecture. When the house of KETCHUM exploded ROSS transferred his account to D. CHAMBERLAIN & CO., and opened through them to some extent.

His chief speculations, however, were made without the intervention of a broker. Wall Street is no confiding a business, and brokers are so simple a race of men, that any one who hires an office and hangs out a sign can immediately set his checks afloat for thousands of dollars. The people deal with him as unreservedly as if the mere possession of an office and a sign were certain guarantees of probity and capital. In the gold-room and at the stock board Ross bought and sold with the oldest and wealthiest man in the street. He had an office in Exchange Place, and a bank account at the Union and another at the Continental Bank, so that he was prepared to receive his own stocks and gold. He must have made some money, for on many occasions prior to his explosion he gave genuine checks, genuinely certified, for both.

Money, however, came too slowly to this ardent chevalier of fortune. A short cut to wealth was what he coveted. And on a little reflection he discovered not one, but two. A slight examination of various railroad bonds enabled him to discover a bond which was not disfigured by tawdry pictorial embellishments, but which, plain and unadorned, was capable of exact imitation by any printer. Such a security he found in the 8 per cent. bonds of the Michigan Central Railroad. To his friends DAVID GROESBECK & Co., he gave orders for the purchase for his account of $20,000 of these bonds. They bought them and duly delivered them to Ross. This supplied with genuine originals, Ross proceeded, probably with the aid of accomplices as yet undiscovered, to manufacture spurious bonds. Disposing of his genuine bonds through another broker, he took $20,000 of the forged bonds to GROESBECK & CO., and borrowed $19,000 thereon, the house naturally supposing that these were the very bonds they had bought for him. Another and a larger parcel Ross took to the Union Bank and borrowed money on. It is likely that he disposed of more forged bonds elsewhere, but if so the victims have as yet made no sign. The Michigan Central bonds are so plain that any printer can imitate them to a nicety, and it is remarkable that they have not been counterfeited before.

One royal road to fortune being thus discovered and exploited, the other was next explored. A bank check is said to be "certified" when the pay-teller writes his name across it. This constitutes an acceptance on the part of the bank, and renders the check as good as the bank-note of the accepting bank. It occurred to JOHN ROSS that it was no very difficult matter to counterfeit the acceptance of the paying-teller of his bank. He tried it, and after some practice succeeded perfectly. His counterfeit certifications of his own checks on the Union and Continental banks, he succeeded in obtaining from GROESBECK & CO., BLACK & STEARNS, and others, at least $150,000 in gold, with which he took his leave for parts unknown.

It may be remarked that of all the banks in the city there are none whose certification is more difficult to counterfeit than that of the Union and Continental banks. The Union Bank uses a stamp of peculiar shape, and the signature of MR. GERMOND, the paying-teller, is a miracle of caligraphy. Not less remarkable and difficult of imitation is the autograph of the paying-teller of the Continental Bank, which is in a peculiar blue ink, and utterly inscrutable to persons who have not seen it before. The signatures of the paying-tellers of other great banks—the Bank of Commerce, the Bank of the State of New York, and the Bank of the Commonwealth, for instance—are so plain that any school-boy could imitate them perfectly after a few hours' practice. In practicing his rogueries on the Union and Continental banks, JOHN ROSS evidently "spoilt the Egyptians," as French brilliard players say. He could have accomplished his purpose much more easily had he forged certifications on the Bank of the State or the Bank of Commerce.

The KETCHUM affair caught bankers that they must not lend money to any one—however high in station or credit—without a careful inspection of his collaterals. The ROSS affair should awaken Wall Street, and especially the banks, to the painful looseness of their manner of doing business. A new rule should be adopted with regard to the certification of checks. No mere signature—easily counterfeited—should alone constitute certification. A private stamp, constantly changed, and of which the secret were only known to the banks, should be added. If this precaution be not adopted JOHN ROSS will have many imitators, and their frauds will far excel his in magnitude. With his boldness and skill it is amazing that he contented himself with $300,000, and did not take a million.

As to forgeries of bonds and stocks, there is nothing to be said except that dealers in such securities should not receive them from parties whom they do not personally know. There is no security in our market that can not be successfully counterfeited. Even Michigan Central bonds were certainly very easy to copy. But there is skill enough among the rogues who now abound in this country to forge bonds of a much more elaborate appearance. We know that the larger descriptions of the national currency have already been counterfeited with such exactness that even the Department has been puzzled to detect the counterfeit from the genuine bill. Yet these notes are said to be in the highest style of the art—covered with intricate scroll-work, and indorsed with an elaborate picture by the hand of the first engravers in the country. What if the knaves who counterfeited these notes turned their attention to Five-Twenty bonds or Seven-Thirty notes? The only possible security for a banker or broker is to refuse absolutely to receive bonds or stocks from parties whom he does not know. Even this security would fail in some cases, as a rogue might, by following the example of ROSS and hiring an office in Wall Street, establish in the course of a year character enough to enable him to circulate counterfeit Bonds. But it would be an improvement on the present loose practice.

We are a little curious to see how the chase of ROSS will end. The LORD robbery and the Madison Avenue robbery have bred queer notions in many people's heads as to the proper functions and the rewards of the great detective police. In the former case the thief, or one of the thieves, is understood to have proposed a negotiation with the police, by which, on condition of his absolute release, his share of the booty was to be divided between himself and the detectives. We have not heard of any prosecution arising out of this affair, though the law against the compounding of felonies is clear enough. If ROSS should turn up, and if he should propose to pay the detective the reward offered for his apprehension—$5000, and to restore half his booty on condition of retaining the other half—would the offer be accepted? And if it were, what would be the effect on the minds of the thieving community?

REFORM IN ENGLAND.

THE Government Reform Bill of MR. GLADSTONE has passed the British House of Commons by a meagre majority of five votes. Its fate in the House of LORDS seems, therefore, almost inevitable; and in that event the Ministry will probably resign or appeal to the country.

In the former case it would be impossible to expect public contentment with a Tory administration; while a Liberal ministry would undoubtedly bring in a still more stringent bill. In the latter case the extraordinary spectacle would be presented of a small minority of the able adult population of the country deciding whether any addition to their number should be made from the vast majority. The peaceful solution of such a question would be a most striking and instructive event, for it would show how deeply seated is the reverence for order and law in the general British mind. It would also show an astonishing progress in that direction since the Reform Bill was passed in 1832.

The Reform question in England is not one of an enlarged voting list only, it involves the very character of the Government. As it now exists the British government is a class of classes. The practical point of moderate Reformers is to secure the balance between the aristocracy, the wealth, and the middle class of the country. The fear of the Tories is that the whole political power will fall into the hands of the working-class, which includes the great bulk of the population. The practical point of BRIGHT, therefore, as really aiming at the structure of the Government itself.

But the inevitable tendency of all constitutional governments should teach wise men in England that, as political power will be more and more extended, the true national policy is not closer restriction, but freedom to make the extension safe. Education and intelligence are the final security of national welfare; for they see not only the righteousness but the policy and interest of justice, which is the sole enduring corner-stone of peace. Meanwhile there was never a better time for electoral agitation in England. JOHN BRIGHT, JOHN BRIGHT, JOHN STUART MILL, THOMAS HUGHES, WILLIAM E. FORSTER, and MR. GROSEMITH are sincere and able leaders. They all sit in Parliament, and they thoroughly understand the necessity of the reform.

A "WELL-CONSIDERED OPINION."

THE popular political comedian, MR. JOHN VAN BUREN, is reported to have said, the other evening, in one of his most successful acts of mockery, that he was glad to see that the Republican Party was committed by the Administration of President LINCOLN to the policy of the present Administration; and gave it as his well-considered opinion that CONGRESS had no more to do with the restoration of the States to the Union than they had to do with the construction of the new court-house in the city of New York."

This was not original with MR. VAN BUREN, but it is sufficiently answered by the truth, which is simply as follows. On the 9th day of the 11th of April, 1865, MR. LINCOLN made his last public speech from a window of the WHITE HOUSE. In the course of it he said:

"In the annual Message of December, 1863, and the accompanying Proclamation I presented a plan of reconstruction, as the phrase goes, which, if adopted by any State, should be acceptable to and sustained by the Executive Government of the nation. I distinctly stated that this was not the only plan which might possibly be acceptable; and I also distinctly protested that the Executive should not be considered as committed to any thing more should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States."

He proceeded to say that he had submitted the plan "to the then Cabinet," and that it was distinctly approved by every member, although one suggested "that I should omit the protest against my right to power in regard to the admission of members of Congress."

The exact point upon which President JOHNSON differs with Congress is the one which President LINCOLN expressly declared was the exclusive concern of Congress. Yet the excellent jester, MR. VAN BUREN, assures us that the friends of MR. LINCOLN are committed to the support of MR. JOHNSON in his difference! Of course MR. JOHN VAN BUREN is peculiarly qualified to speak for the friends of MR. LINCOLN; and of course, as he gave us, at Pooghkeepsin, the "well-considered opinion" and "well-considered opinion" that MR. JOHNSON was a violator of the Constitution, he must be believed when he gives us the "well-considered opinion" at Brooklyn that MR. JOHNSON is the Saviour of the Constitution.

Jordan is a very hard road to travel, MR. VAN BUREN!

THE UNITED STATES AND RUSSIA.

MR. STEVENS's resolution of congratulation of the Emperor of Russia upon his escape from attempted assassination will probably excite more attention in Europe than it does here. For it is another illustration of the friendly alliance between the two vast Western and Eastern powers which was so conspicuous during the late war, and which is naturally a spectacle of profound interest to other nations.

The attempt to assassinate the Emperor was made by a man who considers himself injured by the emancipation of the serfs. But when he was confronted with his intended victim, who mildly asked him, "How have I ever injured you?" he had nothing to reply. It would have been among the most remarkable coincidences of history if the chiefs of the two great nations which have recently abolished slavery and emancipated serfs should each have fallen by a hand inspired by the brutal spirit of the foe they had overthrown. And certainly, as one has escaped, it is peculiarly becoming in the countrymen of the other to offer their hearty congratulations.

THE VASSAR COLLEGE.

THE Vassar Female College at Poughkeepsie, New York, is now fully organized, and established in its noble building. The number of students is already three hundred and fifty, and President RAYMOND thinks that seven hundred is speedily apparent. There is naturally the warmest feeling toward MR. VASSAR, the founder of the College, and on his late birthday, when he drove out to visit the institution, he was surprised by a most festive and friendly reception from the whole fair body of scholars. They greeted him with the grateful song of welcome. Afterward there were congratulatory speeches and songs in the chapel, from which the company repaired to the dining-hall, where a tasteful and modest collation was prepared. This was all the work of the young ladies of the College; and it was a very graceful and appropriate tribute to a man who, like MR. COOPER and MR. PEABODY, has chosen to devote a large private fortune to a noble public service.

HEALTH AND BUILDING-FOOD.

THE different varieties of food are divided by LIEBIG, in reference to their nutrition, into two classes—substances which are used for maintaining the heat of the body, and those which supply the material for building up the tissues.

The former class, which includes substances such as starch, sugar, and oily substances—are found on analysis to be composed of carbon, oxygen, and hydrogen; while the latter—the gluten of grains, the fibrin of meat, the casein of milk, etc.—are composed of these with the addition of nitrogen. These latter are therefore called nitrogenous food, and the former carbonaceous, from the quantity of carbon they contain. The heat of the body is supposed to be produced by an actual, though unseen, combustion going on every where; that is, by a union of oxygen with carbon, forming carbonic acid, and with hydrogen, forming water—just as in what we ordinarily call combustion. The carbonic acid is accordingly exhaled in part from the air and tear, or waste, of the system, and in part from the food. As the oxygen, which, as in ordinary fires and lamps, feeds the combustion, is introduced into the blood in respiration, the heat-making food is called by LIEBIG respiratory food.

The vitality of the blood is supplied by some elements and physiologists; but without entering into any discussion of them, we would simply say that there is good reason for the belief that what is called carbonaceous food is used to some extent, though not entirely, for producing heat. The evidence of this is found in the fact that in regard to fatty substances than those which are starchy and sugary.

We have some practical illustrations of the distinction between the two kinds of food, which are of an interesting and instructive character.

In the Greenland Esquimaux not only food, in the forms of fat and train-oil, in large quantities, simply because the abstraction of heat from the body in that severe climate requires an amount of heat, and therefore an abundance of heat-food, or fuel for the fire. Accordingly ample provision is made by the Creator for their wants in this respect, for the animals from which they get their chief nutriment—as bears, seals, and whales—are full of fat or oil, while there is but little of this substance in the animals that furnish meat to the dwellers in Southern climes.

When there is a deficiency or a suspension of the supply of respiratory food, the fat which has been deposited in the system is burned up, as we may say, to furnish the requisite heat. This is seen in the case of some hibernating animals, as the woodchuck and the bear. When they come out of their torpid state in the spring they are lean, though they were very fat when they went into it. So also in sickness, the fat previously accumulated in the body furnishes fuel for the maintenance of its heat, in place of the respiratory food, the supply of which is now more or less cut off.

The common popular idea is, that the use of food is simply to furnish material for growth and repair; while really a large proportion of it is only fuel to keep the body warm. And there are many facts which show the importance of supplying this fuel-food in due quantity. Such facts as the beneficial influence of cod-liver oil in consumption and other diseases have led to the more general consideration of the relation of oily food to health. Without adopting the extreme views which have been advanced by some on this subject, we think it to be well settled that the abstinence from fatty substances, so common with many, predisposes them to those diseases which originate primarily in a low state of the system, as scrofula and consumption. The habit of eating only the lean part of meat is positively injurious, unless a sufficiency of oily food be taken in some other form—as butter or milk, which contains this substance in combination with others. Persons who commit this error of diet are apt to have a flabby and blanched skin, and cold hands and feet, with an irregular and fastidious appetite.

Infants are sometimes made the victims of this error by a confirmed dislike to a fashionable diet. Barley-water, rice-water, arrow-root, etc., can never take the place of milk; for, to say nothing of other important elements in milk, there is in it none of the butter which is so essential a part of the milk, that beautiful natural emulsion, which contains all the elements of nutrition, even to the iron for the blood and the salts of lime for the bones.

Laboring men require more nitrogenous food than those who lead sedentary life, for they have to burn more repair necessary, and therefore more need of material for it. For this reason men that live almost entirely on articles as potatoes and rice or plantains, which have comparatively little of the nitrogenous element in them, can not do or endure as much as those who have a generous diet of meat and vegetables in their diet. So, also, a horse that is not well fed will be in good condition from hay and potatoes, but if he is worked he will lose flesh unless grain be made a part of his food.

There is a happy articles of diet a mixture of the two kinds of food. This is true of milk and of the grains that are used in making bread. Even in the potato of most kinds there is some fatty matter with the muscular fibres. And men instinctively follow out the indications of nature in this respect. Thus the Irishman and the Italian fix potatoes for use for the oasis that is in it, or cabbage, which is one of the vegetables that is rich in nitrogen. The Irish dish of potatoes and fish, as boiled potatoes, cabbage, and pork, seasoned with salt and pepper. JOHNSTON says of this: "Take a pot-boiled potato-eater and feed him on this fish, and he will become not only stronger and more active, but he will cease to feel hungry. This is the refreshment of labor which God he lives upon." So the Italian eats cheese with his macaroni; and the Spaniard onion, a highly-nitrogenous vegetable, with his bread. Rice is commonly eaten with cabbage or beans, butter with bread, and oil with salad.

LITERARY.

THE interior spirit of the rebellion was never so appallingly revealed as in the book of "INSIDE," now publishing in this paper. In reading the smooth testimony of witnesses before the Reconstruction Committee like General LEE and Governor HAMILTON STEPHENS, who state their belief in State sovereignty as perfectly sincere, we are apt to forget what very honest people in the North and South and East and West should remember—that the plea of State sovereignty was urged to protect and defend the social and industrial institution of slavery. That is the eternal disgrace of the rebellion. Had State sovereignty been invoked as a remedy against oppression, as an assertion of the rights of man, as a defense of civilization and humanity, however mistaken as a policy the Northern people would have appeared it would have commanded the respect which attends all earnest efforts for the improvement of man. But the infamy of the object blasted the whole act. And the passions which slavery had fostered wreaked themselves remorselessly, not upon the slaves, who had been subject to them in the slave States, who were born and bred in presence of the system, and who were not troubled by it, but upon those who had fled to their country. The fate of such men was tragical. They were hung, drowned, burned, tortured, exiled; and the horrors indicated in the forgetfulness of "INSIDE" published recently are confirmed by every witness of the interior of the rebellion whom we have seen or heard, and are personally known to the author of this story. It is not desirable, in the interests of peace and national reconstruction, that these facts should be forgotten. They were the natural and inevitable fruit of the huge wrong which was more the enemy of the region in which it existed than of the rest of the country. If that region says that it was itself the best judge of the matter, the unanswerable reply is that a wrong is a wrong, if it be judged by opinions of its rightfulness, but by its results; and they are curiously blind who do not see that there can be no security or safety to the happiness and prosperity of any community as a system which generated the frightful atrocities of which Union men in the rebel States during the war were the victims.

"MISS Marjoribanks," a delightful novel by MRS. OLIPHANT, is just issued by the HARPERS. Those who have followed it in its serial publication are unanimous in their praise of the interest of the story and the skill of its development; and surely no one who has read "KATIE STEWART" will doubt the fascinating power of the author.

BOMBARDMENT OF VALPARAISO.

THE long-threatened bombardment of Valparaiso by the Spanish fleet took place on the 31st of March. After the suicide of Admiral FAREJA Captain MENDEZ NUNEZ had become Acting Admiral, commanding the Spanish fleet. On the 27th of March NUNEZ gave four days' notice of the bombardment. Every diplomatic representative of foreign powers at Valparaiso entered a strong protest against the unprecedented outrage, in which the rights of neutrals were directly involved. NUNEZ in his notification of the bombardment based his action upon the refusal of Chili to grant redress for the grievances suffered by Spain, and upon the fact that he had been unable to come to blows with the allied fleet. General KILPATRICK, our Minister to Chili, and Commodore JOHN RODGERS, commanding the United States Pacific Squadron, united in efforts to bring about an amicable negotiation between the contending powers. This might have been effected but for the fact that NUNEZ insisted upon Chili's first saluting the Spanish flag, which Chili persistently refused.

At the instance of General KILPATRICK Commodore RODGERS entered into an arrangement with the British Admiral DENMAN to prevent the bombardment by force. The French Government had but a single ship, vessel, the Egeria, off Valparaiso, and could not, therefore, offer any very material assistance in a conflict with the Spanish fleet. The attitude taken by Commodore RODGERS and Admiral DENMAN, he said, "is not less than thirty seconds and with a less than thirty minutes' warning" the mast-heads of the Spanish iron-clad Numancia above the water, hesitated to enter upon the conflict unsupported.

Commodore RODGERS gives the following official account of the bombardment:

"This morning at nine o'clock the Spanish Admiral opened upon the town with shot and shell, directing his fire principally upon the public buildings and churches. After a continuous bombardment of two hours and fifty minutes the firing ceased, and the Spanish Admiral withdrew his vessels.

"Four of the stone buildings connected with the Custom-house were entirely destroyed, with their contents. Other adjoining buildings used for the same purpose were very much damaged. The value of merchandise destroyed in these was vaguely estimated at some twenty-two millions of dollars. The Intendencia, or Governor's residence, the Bolsa, or Exchange, and the railroad buildings were damaged to a considerable extent. Naturally and inevitably parts of the city which the Spanish Admiral declared he did not intend to injure received some of the missiles. Several blocks of private buildings were destroyed by fire, and stores and convents and hospitals were not exempt from injury. Few lives were lost—not more than eight or ten."

The Spanish fleet consisted in all of six vessels—the Numancia (iron-clad), the Resolucion, the Villa de Madrid, the Blanca, Vencedora, Paquete de Mallo, and the Berenguela. Only four of these participated in the bombardment.

Our correspondent, writing from Valparaiso, gives the following account of the assault:

"The squadron having taken a position near the city, at 9 A.M. they opened an effective fire on the beautiful houses, Custom-house, Intendencia, Post-office, Naval Academy, railroad buildings, barracks and all other public property. The bombardment continued until meridian without cessation. At 11 the hospital was destroyed on the southern portion of the city were enveloped in flames, the dense smoke from which arose and settled over the defenseless city like a pall. Although the fire was directed toward public property alone, the shot and shell in many cases injured private buildings to a very great extent. The fire in the southern portion of the city consumed many large wholesale warehouses and private residences. The flames spread rapidly, and for a time defied all the efforts of the Fire Department to check them, assisted by a large number of sailors from both the American and English men-of-war in the harbor. The conflagration continued until Sunday afternoon. The total amount of loss is estimated at not less than $50,000,000. The fire was not confined from the shore, but the Chilean fleet boasted defiantly on the brow of the hill overlooking the harbor, and for a long time attracted the fire of the Villa de Madrid, a first-class 60-gun frigate; shot and shell fairly rained about the flag-staff, but still the tri-color and 'lone star' could be seen amidst the smoke and dust caused by the explosion of the shell. At about 11.30 a portion of a shell wounded the staff, causing it to lean over a little, but the bullseye and stays supported it through the fire. The flag-ship Numancia (iron-clad), of 4,834 tons and 1,200 horse-power, the largest in the squadron, but kept underway in front of the city, directing by signals the movements of the different vessels. The fire from the frigate Blanca and the corvette Vencedora was observed to have been particularly effective, doing vital damage to the Custom-house and the Intendencia, which buildings, together with those in the immediate vicinity, were riddled with shot and shell. It is estimated that at the least 1,000 projectiles were thrown into the doomed city.

"Such was the bombardment of Valparaiso, which was witnessed with absorbing interest by the American and English squadrons in the harbor, and by the wretched inhabitants of the city from the hills overlooking the town."

The report of the Committee appointed at a meeting of British subjects, held at Valparaiso March 28, includes among others the three following significant resolutions:

"That Rear-Admiral DENMAN'S plea of want of sufficient force to oppose the Spaniards is humiliating to his country's own and unavailable, considering that the co-operation of a powerful United States squadron was pressed upon him by its commanders, and that this meeting cannot express in sufficiently strong terms its indignation that such an atrocity as the bombardment of a defenseless town with a population of 80,000 inhabitants should be permitted in the presence of a British squadron.

"That it is a matter of regret that between the British Charge d'Affaires and this community there has long existed an estrangement which has rendered him unfit to represent its interests, and that in the present emergency the disadvantages accruing therefrom have been more sensibly felt by his passive submission to the abuse of the Spanish squadron, while other neutrals have been placed in much more favorable positions through the exertions of their representatives.

"That a deputation be appointed to wait upon the United States Minister, General KILPATRICK, and upon Commodore RODGERS, and express to them, on behalf of this meeting, its high appreciation of their energetic endeavors to prevent, by co-operation with the British force, the bombardment of this city, deeply regretting that those endeavors had not been more successful."

INSIDE.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

MR. FERGUSON AVERSE AT HIS WINDOW.

CHAPTER XIX.

It is not long after the adjournment of the C. C. that Mr. Ferguson, seated in his room reading the well-worn little Bible which, while yet a youth, he brought over, a genuine fragment of Scotland, with him, preparatory to going to bed, hears a noise as of the gathering of a crowd beneath his windows.

It is the upper room of a large stone building which he had built, by far the most substantial edifice in Somerville, to rent as a store. And it had brought Mr. Ferguson in a good rent until Secession closed it up, as it had closed up almost the whole legitimate business of the South. "The temporary inconvenience," Colonel Rob Roberts remarks in his public and private speeches, "which precedes independence and unparalleled prosperity" and he bowails it is," adds the Colonel, coming down upon the stand with clenched fist, "either a fool or a Union man and a traitor!"

Very true, of course; yet it will sadden one. To say nothing of the vast tracts devastated by actual war, the appearance of the country far from such scenes is mournful. Fields, as you ride along, with broken-down fences, and acres wholly given up to sunflowers and cockleburs, or making but faint fight against them. Nor did you ever before see white girls so young carrying water, or boys so very small driving oxen, or mules, not African, cutting wood and hoeing. The decolation loom in the little towns through which you pass. The homes are there still, but in painful need of glass and palings and paint. The shops are all still there, but almost all shut up—no sound from within of hammer, plane, or saw. Nor have the offices emigrated; they are all there still, with their rusty signs of lawyer or doctor; but the lawyer, generally speaking, is colonel now, speculator, or quartermaster; while the doctor is killing more rapidly than before in the ranks, or practicing wholesale surgery in the distant hospitals. And the stores remain, but mostly shut up, their enterprising proprietors gone into battle, or, most likely, into cotton. The shut-up doors and windows of the town may, like the closed mouths and eyes of those in a swoon, be only temporary; but it looks, all the circulation stopped, very much like death. And that there is not in every village at least one shop, store, grocery, gathering-point of some sort left, wherein customers together the whole town's population on the errand of the stage, to get the papers and to hear the much more diversified and thrilling news brought by the passengers. An hour is spent by the neighbors so assembled in anticipating what the stage will, and should, and "has to" bring in; then it drives up; then two hours, after it has gone, in discussing what it actually does supply them. Blessings on these, the mass, the more virtuous and industrious portion of the people, the country, in fact, yes, Heaven abundantly bless these, even though it be in ways they dream not of! But upon the leaders—editors, military magnates, political preachers most of all—upon these rest the justice of Almighty wrath.

But Mr. Ferguson. He listens a while to the noise growing louder beneath his windows, then kneels for his evening devotions, perhaps longer perhaps longer upon his knees than usual. Rising at last, he listens and considers. All the doors and windows of the building, for fire-proof purposes, are coated with sheet-iron and securely fastened. The truth is, Mr. Ferguson has long calculated the possibility of an attack, and is not unprepared. He glances at his iron safe—yes, his scrap-book, to say nothing of other valuables, is secured there, and the Scotchman deliberately hides the key in a crevice to which he has called the attention of Mr. Arthur long before. As the noise below increases into groans and yells he coolly produces from their hidingplaces and lays upon the table, cleared of every thing for the purpose, two of Sharp's rifles, a pair of revolvers, a claymore brought from Scotland; the two Derringers he secures about his person, with the handles ready to his hand.

"Twelve and twelve," he says aloud of the provision on the table for his coming guests, "are twenty-four; two in my pockets, twenty-six; claymore at least one to that—say thirty in all." And so he rubs the hearth, takes his seat, and listens. Yes, it is the night of the C. C. he remembers that. But then it may prove a false alarm.

He listens. Yells, oaths, blows upon the door, cries for ladders and axes. Not the C. C. only; there is a Camp of Instruction some dozen miles from town, and stray soldiers therefrom drop in to take a home-spun practice for actual war.

"Oh, nobody's going to kill the man; only going to give him a good scare," is the remark made to Dr. Warner, who plucking himself out of the coils of his wife wound about him in nightgown and hysterics, has come down to see what is afoot, and that gracious is tossed off from the crowd like a straw; and while he catches desperately at the attention of this and that individual, mistaking a stump speech in defense of his friend, the tumult increases until he is fairly drowned and washed away.

"Now, then, what do you want?" hails the Scotchman, who has raised a sash, opened the leaf of a shutter, and looked out.

No one pressing necessities of the mob thus appealed to are various.

"A hundred dollars for the soldiers!"

"In gold, old boy, mind!"

"And holler hurrah for Jeff Davis!"

"And down with old Lincoln!"

"Promise you will leave in twelve hours."

"And never come back." It is Joe Staples, this last; it will be several thousand clear gain to him if the Scotchman complies or is killed. And thereupon follows a perfect storm of suggestions from the many-headed. The Scotchman waits patiently till he can be heard.

"Men!" he begins, at last.

"Stand firm, men!" shouts a powerful voice from over the way; and it is followed almost instantly after by the awful blasphemies of Dr. Peel, in the centre of the crowd, upon the man who said it.

"Men!" continues the besieged, "you are half of you deranged, the other half drunk. On that account I don't want to kill you. Do what you please. Only put my life in danger, however, and I will kill some of you. Howl away!"

And the Scotchman draws in his head, closes and fastens the shutter, lowers the sash. Not an instant too soon, for the missiles rattle upon it like hail.

DR. PEEL AND JUM.

Considering within himself, the Scotchman drags a large desk so as to fortify himself in a corner commanding windows and door, upon which he disposes in easy reach his weapons, having first carefully examined the caps of his fire-arms and unsheathed his claymore.

"Yes, I mean not forget it," he says, relapsing for a moment into a dialect the very burr of which has almost worn from his tongue; and taking the key from its crevice over the mantle, he unlocks the safe, takes out a written paper, notes and signs it, with a line under in explanation.

"It's not as regular as a mon can wish, but it's the best a mon can do. Ah, yes!" and he lugs out his ponderous collection, writes a rapid bulletin of matters up to date of siege, pastes it from his musilage apparatus at hand with dexterity of long practice in its place in the volume, and replaces it and the paper in the safe, relocks it, puts the key in its place, and is comfortable once more.

"What fules men are about their Wills," he says as he takes his place behind his shutter, "and I as great as any," he growls.

Meanwhile the uproar without is enough to appall the stoutest heart. If yells and curses could have beaten down walls it would have been all over" with Mr. Ferguson. That next?

Towering on the horse-block in front of the store, Dr. Peel, with terrific profanity, announces to the C. C. present that, having mendidly accomplished their project of frightening the old scamp, the next thing is to adjourn in quest of drinks.

But Alonzo Wright, being already supplied on that point, most strenuously objects, his thirst is now for blood. "Our own boys far away to-night," he shouts from the horse-block, "fighting for us, pouring out their blood in rivers. And here in this house is an insolent old scoundrel worse than the worst of Yankees. It is time to make example of these Union men, sneaking scoundrels, traitors, abolitionists," and a deal more to the same effect. Furious curses, ardent appeals, passionate entreaties—there is splendid eloquence in the raving of the man, and the audience are in the mood to appreciate it. In fact Joe Staples is making a free thing of it at the bar of his hotel near by, is even pressing his liquors upon all who come in perpetual relays from the crowd and back again. The ex-tailor sees a chance of his making the happiest hit of his life; he even dispatches a negro with a demijohn down to the crowd.

"Axes, men, axes, and our cry to-night is Rappahannock!" And the speaker springs from his rostrum among an excited crowd of excited spirits. Some little time is spent in obtaining axes, those near by having unaccountably been mislaid. Next, it is slow work trying to get the iron sheeting off the stout doors, especially in the rush of the crowd, each thinking he can do it better than the other, Dr. Peel as active among them as Alonzo Wright.

Meanwhile Mr. Ferguson within ponders his course: "Had I not better fire on them from above? If they get those doors down they'll be upon me in such numbers—wait on the Lord till the last moment before you take to your pistols. God forgive me, I have been too cross with these poor demented bodies all along! Too close in business matters, mon. Not meet to be partaker of the inheritance of the saints too— It is good, it is continued to murmur to himself, 'doth to hope and'—arranging the weapons to his hand as—"quail for the salvation of the Lord. Forgive my contempt for these fules, Lord, but Thou seest they are such fules."

The door is fast and heavy on the door. Stop! They must have given up the axes, and are now using a ram of timber. The Scotchmen has known of too many similar atrocities, has dozens of them in printed form and written in his Scrap-book, not to know, specially since he has heard Alonzo Wright among the crowd, that his own death is about as much a speedy certainty as any thing human can be. The doom fatuity as any thing human can be. The doom tainty as any thing human can be. The doom is near, the low eyes, the bonny smile—it seems nearer, clearer to Mr. Ferguson than for many a long year now. Hearen! But unfortunately he can not think of heaven without a grim remembrance of the Secession of angels therefrom, and the fate of such superior Secessionists, too, and the fate of such superior Secessionists, too, and the fate of such angel Secessionists, too, that Up the one great gulf should swallow us all up completely these days.

But the bolts? What can they be ringing the bolts so for? That begins to be an inquiry among the excited mob, passing a little to listen and ask.

First: the determination upon the sky, dark shadows beginning to fall from the houses that way across the street. First: fire! And falling upon the excited before Mr. Ferguson's doors, as when the sun shines on the hearth-stone, the greater glow extinguishes the less. First: fire! fire! fire! Alonzo Wright, disabled some time ago by an accidental blow upon the shoulder from the axe of Dr. Peel in the intense ecstasy of the last night, after cursing for a time the rapidly-diminishing crowd, is compelled to limp after it. In little more time than it has taken for a record of the assault on Mr. Ferguson has begun and ended.

"Dr. Ginnis's! Dr. Ginnis's!" is the cry into which that of fire has now subsided.

"Dr. Ginnis?" Then, as we too hurry on to the spot, one word about him; it can soon be said, before we go some more than a square. Low of stature, stout of frame, red of face, puffy of breath, loud of tongue, excitable of temperament, "a character from the start," of course. From the outset it is with pain that Dr. Ginnis tears himself from the knot at the street-corner to visit a patient. He is hardly in the sick chamber before the topic is introduced. As soon as possible the compliments and the prescription to the patient are got through with as an altogether secondary matter, that the Doctor may get to European intervention on the South, the corruptions of cotton, the Scripturality of slavery, the religious apostasy and hastening downfall of the North, the untold blessings Secession is to bring from its cornucopia upon our glorious Confederacy, and all the last great Confederate victory too, reason ever again with all its canons in the ears of the stunned patient. The Doctor is enthusiastic, as even his political friends allow. Secession has taken possession of every globule of his blood, fold of his brain, holds as a rider does the reins every fiber and tendon of the Doctor's gladiatorial frame. A big bubble, Dr. Ginnis, oscillating wonderfully when the wind blows as it often does, glittering in the sunshine of good news. He is big. Still good to see and hear of.

"Glory be to God!" he shouts, clapping his hands together, snatching his hat from his head, and forcefully and waving it with enthusiasm. Then off like a shot, a large one, from the Postoffice to spread the tidings wherever wonderful news arrives, as does almost every mail.

"Have you heard the news?" he cries to people on foot across the street, on horseback, in carriages, wherever he sees as he goes, never waiting till he can get near enough to see whether they be acquaintances or not. "Gloriana surrenders! Lee loses cut to pieces again! fifty thousand killed!" Not apt to be up early as a general thing himself, up now for Dr. Ginnis when the time comes to get in before day. "Wake up, all of you!" he shouts at the doors of the houses as he returns home with the great intelligence. "Wake up!" banging tremendously on the gates and doors. "Great news! Lonsville captured! Lincolnnot captured! Washington City in ashes! Hurrah! Wake up! Glory be to God!" And the Doctor hurries on to stir up the rest, making great billows of joy like, literally waves.

"Twenty-seven regiments bayoneted where they stood; cut down and cut to pieces; the carnage tremendous!" And Dr. Ginnis in an hour a liar way of drawing his coat-sleeves up his arms, turning down the cuffs of his exposed shirt-sleeves, as he says it, and moving his mouths and eyes as he was about taking part therein himself, unctuous to behold. Being a member of Brother Barker's church, no one, not even Sam Peters nor Brother Barker himself, more fervent in prayer than Dr. Ginnis—only he begins too violently, and in fifteen minutes into hoarseness, and ends in wheeze. There is this slight inconsistency in Dr. Ginnis as the very outset of Secession, in indignant denial of the possibility of war resulting from the same, he had loudly and frequently promised contemptuously to drink every drop of blood that might be shed.

"If you will turn to Psalm fifty-fifth, fifteen, you will see that David said exactly the same thing, 'Let death seize upon them, and let them go down quick into hell,'" remarks Brother Barker when informed that Dr. Ginnis had been distinctly heard to say "Damn him!" in reference to Butler in New Orleans. "You will hardly deny that David was a holy man. And these are most extraordinary times. We can not judge men by the rules of ordinary times; it would be foolish as well as useless to do so," reasons the divine. Nor was he the only professed Christian who used the same reasoning in reference to the intemperate but pious language of many of the church, even chaplains in the army, on rejoicings over victories. In fact, it was said of Beecher, Cuyler, and of many others like him, that, not content with supplicating yellow-fever and death in every form, as well as what is called sin, for the infidel foe, he and others had prayed for something that sounded marvelously like an eternal damnation of the same foe. Let us say one word about the day clear recollections of what passed during the great delirium say, was this actually to or not to be?

Turning a corner on our hurried way from Mr. Ferguson's we find it is Dr. Ginnis's house that is on fire. Upon the whole, the handsomest two-story residence in Somerville, handsomely furnished, the Doctor has not occupied it more than a year. And the Doctor is reported as never the most glorious news had ever moved him before. Consequently the wheeze is upon him already, and the Doctor's hands now near the fast-consuming remnant of his home, stunned, silent, in utter collapse. The Doctor is not a bad or unjust man, but that he is as much affected by bad news as by good, the elation produced by the last being fully counter-acted by the depression produced by the first—according to the inexorable law of mechanics whereby action and reaction are equal. Dr. Ginnis is one of those good Secessionists rather like falling in with Dr. Ginnis when good news is afoot—we couldn't avoid doing right by him, because he elevates every nook and corner of Somerville—we would rather not fall in with him when the news is bad. In this last case, Dr. Peel, in justice, we are not apt to, however, as he stays pretty closely at home then, if possible.

But Dr. Ginnis is not alone in the fire at all. Dr. Peel has arrived on the spot among the first, and has been hard at work from the moment he arrived. Dr. Peel, Dr. Ginnis's partner in the man, has come to be the life and soul of Somerville long before this; no public dinner, no soul-stirring to mercies of any kind, but in the war day distinguished personage or personage going to become distinguished, no ball or tableaux, no entertainment of any kind, Dr. Peel is not the grand carrier-on as well as the originator. We have come even to accept the essences, jewsharps, broadsides, and tunes of Dr. Peel as in consideration of his undoubted patriotism and his nicely liberality of feeling and of funds. It is long to be generally understood that Dr. Peel and Anne Wright are engaged to be married, and Alonzo Wright has risen a hundredfold in public estimation since he has taken up the cudgels in behalf of his rival, gentle, and doubly lovable in appearance from her contrast to magnificent and ponderous Dr. Peel, as he bears down the arm or stands by him in the dance in public assemblies.

And Dr. Peel sustains his well-earned reputation for public spirit and energy now at the fire. He has rushed a dozen times into the house, and returned bearing something valuable in his arms, beyond the strength of other men. Tearing off weather-boarding to get at the flames; on the top of the stable engaged in the same, by turns, there, here where; men running hither and thither like children at his command; his has gone in the confusion of the fire to get out a life to the more element, no man there refuses to feel him to be the hero of the hour, Agamemnon, king of men. But Dr. Peel does his work miracles. When morning breaks it is upon the chimneys only and a few charred timbers, and a bed of ashes, the whole of the house is a once living home, from which life and flesh are gone. All that is left is for Dr. Peel to start a subscription list, before the ashes are cold, and for breakfast, in Dr. Ginnis's behalf, heading it with a handsome amount, and canvassing the more unassuming amounts for him.

In his heavy loss Dr. Ginnis accepts the assistance with gratitude, but adds to Dr. Peel: "A thousand dollars, Peel, is all I can give just now, sir; but if you could only help me to prove it was the work of an incendiary, even if we did not know whom, and I could get damages—just to know that certainly would be a great satisfaction to me."

He does not say it, but to have it known that his house had been selected out of all others in Somerville as that of the most prominent patriot there for destruction, would have gone far to console the Doctor.

"That was my full belief at first," says Dr. Peel, with oaths, "when I found the pipe I showed you lying near the stable among the straw. Some careless old negro woman. If I was you I would not trouble myself, sir, and I was to know that any negro of mine had lost me so splendid a property—" And the friend describes, with awful passivity, the vengeance he would inflict.

And Mr. Ferguson? Is it full compensation to him for the insults of the night that it has, at least, yielded him one of the most interesting pages for his collection. With more than the neatness, precision, and ink, and black stock with which he keeps his own land and other accounts does he enter this bulletin for posterity, date, events, results in full.

The second day after the fire Dr. Peel rides out to see Alonzo Wright. No man could make a handsomer apology for having accidentally lamed his friend's shoulder, which is badly hurt.

"I was opposed to going on at first, you will remember, General Wright. I only wanted to frighten the old scamp. But I got excited by your eloquence, and by the sound of a stone. When I got hold of that axe I was in such a desperate hurry, too, to get at the fellow—"

"Let us say no more about it," interrupts Mr. Wright. "I am sorry for that man Ginnis, of course, but I am very glad the fire happened just as it did. When I am drunk I am a perfect fool, rather a devil incarnate. If any thing had happened to that brave old man I could never have forgiven myself. What an old Trojan he is! I will make a point to speak to him the next time I see him in the street. It was the same with Mr. Arthur. I made myself a perfect blackguard with him once—you may have heard of it—and he got up to the place and we were. I went in next day and apologized. I've told Anne here nobody tics the knot if she ever marries her but I. She says no one but an Abolitionist, or Union man, which is the same thing. True as steel he is, for all he is so quiet. But let us talk about Burnside, any thing. I made a fool of myself that night in Somerville, am ashamed of it, and have made Anne a half promise never to go to the places any more." This, with a good many strong expressions between, from Mr. Wright sober, a person bearing a resemblance to Mr. Wright drunk.

So Dr. Peel, taking another cup of the coffee —"the genuine article, Doctor; no rye, barley, corn, sweet-potatoes, or other trash in it"—and Miss Anne's making and another slice of Miss Anne's sponge-cake—only blondes like Anne can ever make the sponge-cake; brunettes succeed in pound, preserves, and the like, not in sponge—Dr. Peel, we say, changes the topic to the highly interesting one of speedy success. At which point, Colonel Juggins having ridden over to trade certain oxen with Mr. Wright, Dr. Peel left to be entertained by Miss Anne.

Petite Anne! A canary-bird is small, we know, never so small as when in contrast with the eagle. Blushes are coming and going on Anne's cheeks only as fresh and fresh roses succeed in pound, preserves, and the like, not in sponge—Dr. Peel, we say, changes the topic to the highly interesting one of speedy success. At which point, Colonel Juggins having ridden over to trade certain oxen with Mr. Wright, Dr. Peel left to be entertained by Miss Anne.

There was a history of epithets, passing even that of the Abbé Delille. Every individual substantive was as regularly followed by its attendant adjective, as the round lady of the last century by her chaperoning page. In this pompous diction a man became a mortal, a horse a courser, the moon was styled pale Luna. By these rules every maiden was never called so, but invariably "the authors of my being;" a dream was a vision, a glass a crystal vase, a kiss a sweet, a sun a radiant orb, and a tempest a whirlwind: all of which, no doubt, tended to produce a style of exceeding sublimity and beauty.

Pierre Corneille was a charming writer for the feet ten in height, thirty-eight years old, with foxy hair, a high color, and small, cunning gray eyes. He was accustomed to having straight fun, cut up the body into pieces, and then, in order to conceal his crime, set fire to the house, wherein his base children perished. Such an accumulation of horrors had shed quite a romantic halo round their perpetrator. Ladies of rank and fashion flocked to the jail to hear him sing; and his singing was in a wonderful request, as soon as it became known that Madame Cesarine Langelot, the lioness of the district, possessed a copy of the words of his whole ballad, placed between a ballad by a professor of rhetoric and a problem by the engineer-in-chief of the department; neither gentleman, to say the truth, being much flattered by such close juxtaposition with the interesting pet-prisoner. When Pierre Corneille, with a towering brow and air of solid cunning, was placed in the dock, the names of twelve jurors were drawn by lot, and the president demanded of the counsel on either side whether they wished to exercise their right of challenge. Both declined doing so, every objection that could be made seeming null; but the attorney-general added, that he would require the drawing of a supplementary juror. But neither of them did so; an officer conducted Major Vernor to the appointed place, and amidst profound silence the indictment was read. Major Vernor had lived in the town during the last two years, and no one knew any thing against him, yet none could tell when, or where, or whom he had served. He seemed to have neither family nor friends; and when any of the townspeople were invited to sound him on the subject, he always replied in a manner by no means calculated to encourage confidence: "Do I reside here? Is about how matter appears?" he would say. "Your shabby old town suits me well enough as a residence, but if you don't think I have a right to live in it, I shall be most happy to convince you of the fact at daybreak to-morrow with gun, sword, or pistol." Major Vernor was evidently the man to make good his word; the few persons who had entered his lodgings reported that his bedroom resembled an armory, so ready was it provided with all sorts of offensive weapons. Notwithstanding this he seemed a very respectable sort of man, regular in his habits, punctual in his payments, and, as the phrase is, an excellent cigars, sent him, he used to say, by a friend in Havana. He was a tall, very thin, hard man, always dressed in black; his mustaches curled to a point; and he invariably wore his hat cocked over his right eye. He sometimes passed the greatest part of his public reading-rooms of the town, but he never played at any game, or conversed with the company, remaining perfectly silent unless addressed in the direct manner, when he would answer briefly, but in a sarcastic tone, when he felt his cigar, twisted his mustaches, and with a stiff, silent bow took his departure. It sometimes happened that one of the company, bolder than the others, said, "Good-night, major!" Then the major would stop, fix his gray eye on the speaker, and reply, "Good-night, monsieur!" but in so rude and angry a tone that the words sounded more like a malediction than a polite salutation. It was generally said that whoever thus ventured to address the major, was, during the remainder of the evening, the victim of some strange

"Me an' Orange think so too, on'y we is out of tobacco. A few dollars for our women-folks, how coins of gold from his purse. "You may have that over and above, and welcome. The rest any day it is safe for you. You and Orange can't be too careful, remember, Jem. You know how to get it to me if you hear any thing. When I need you boys I'll let you know."

But what could have struck an eves-dropper in all this interview most was the singular bearing of those two very different villains to each other. It can not be expected of us to describe, but it was very singular—very singular indeed.

A STRANGE STORY.

When the criminal, Pierre Granger, escorted by four gens d'armes, was placed in the dock of the court of assize, there was a general murmur in the crowd which had assembled from every quarter to be present at his trial.

Pierre Granger was not an ordinary culprit—not one of those poor wretches whom the court, as a matter of form, furnishes with an advocate, judges in the presence of a heedless audience, and sends to oblivion in the convict prisons of the State. He had figured at Angrif in the columns of the newspapers; and while M. Lipervier the prosecutor his defense, M. Loursagan, the attorney-general, was to conduct the prosecution. Now, at the time of which I write, these two men stood at the head of their profession. Whenever it was known that they were to be ranged against each other in any cause, crowds immediately flocked to enjoy their eloquent sentences, sonorous periods, and phrases as round and as polished as so many billiard-balls, or was a perfect art of torpedo figures, a delicious confusion of periphrases and metaphors. All the figures of rhetoric were dulled before the abstract antithesis, and sported, jested, and struggled with each other, like Virgil's playful shepherds. There was a luxury of epithets, passing even that of the Abbé Delille. Every individual substantive was as regularly followed by its attendant adjective, as the round lady of the last century by her chaperoning page. In this pompous diction a man became a mortal, a horse a courser, the moon was styled pale Luna. By these rules every maiden was never called so, but invariably "the authors of my being;" a dream was a vision, a glass a crystal vase, a kiss a sweet, a sun a radiant orb, and a tempest a whirlwind: all of which, no doubt, tended to produce a style of exceeding sublimity and beauty.

Such an accumulation of horrors had shed quite a romantic halo round their perpetrator. Ladies of rank and fashion flocked to the jail to hear him sing; and his singing was in a wonderful request, as soon as it became known that Madame Cesarine Langelot, the lioness of the district, possessed a copy of the words of his whole ballad, placed between a ballad by a professor of rhetoric and a problem by the engineer-in-chief of the department; neither gentleman, to say the truth, being much flattered by such close juxtaposition with the interesting pet-prisoner. But neither of them did so; an officer conducted Major Vernor to the appointed place, and amidst profound silence the indictment was read. It sometimes happened that one of the company, bolder than the others, said, "Good-night, major!" Then the major would stop, fix his gray eye on the speaker, and reply, "Good-night, monsieur!" but in so rude and angry a tone that the words sounded more like a malediction than a polite salutation. It was generally said that whoever thus ventured to address the major, was, during the remainder of the evening, the victim of some strange fill-buck. He regularly lost at play, was sure to knock his elbow through a handsome lamp or vase, or in some way to get entangled in a misadventure. So firmly were the good townsfolk persuaded that the major possessed an evil eye that their common expression, when any one met with a misfortune, was: "He must have said 'good-night' to the major."

This mysterious character dined every day at the ordinary of the Crown Hotel, and although habitually silent, seemed usually contented with the fare. One day, however, after having eaten some bread soup, he cast his eye along the table, frowned, and calling the host, said: "How comes it that the dinner to-day is entirely meagre?"

"Monsieur no doubt forgets that this is Good Friday."

"Send me up two mutton-chops."

"Impossible, major—there is not an ounce of meat to be had at any butcher's in the town."

"Let me have some fowl."

"That is not to be had either."

"What a set of fools!" exclaimed the major, striking his clenched hand on the table with such force that the bottles reeled and rocked just as if all the wine in the bottles had got into their heads. Then he called the waiter, and said, "Baptiste, go to my lodging, and bring me the inlaid carbine which hangs over my pillow."

The poor host trembled, and grew very pale when Baptiste returned with a double-barrelled gun, beautifully inlaid with silver. The major then examined the locks, put on fresh caps, cocked both barrels, and walked out, followed at a respectful distance by the guests and inmates of the house. Not far off stood an old ivy-mantled church, whose angular projections were haunted by many ravens. Two large ones were out of a harvest just as the major came up and took aim for a double shot. Down tumbled both the unlucky birds at his feet.

"Sacré bleu!" said he, picking them up. "I'm peculiarly sold—they're quite lean."

He returned to the hotel, and, according to his expression, "quieted" his ill-humored body was dressed in a savory stew, and the other simply roasted. Of both dishes he partook so heartily that not a vestige of either remained, and he declared that he had never eaten more relishing food. From that day the major became an object of amazement to some, of terror to others, of curiosity to all. Whenever he appeared on the public promenade every one avoided him; at the theatre his box was generally occupied by himself alone; and each old woman that met him in the street invariably stopped to cross herself. Major Vernor was never known to enter a church, or accept an invitation; at first he used to receive a good many of these, and the gentlemen finally ceased him to light his pipe.

Such, then, was the thirteenth juror drawn in the cause of Pierre Grenger, and it may easily be understood with the audience were moved at hearing the name of Major Vernor. The paper of accusation, notwithstanding drawn up by the storyey-general with a force and particularity of description which horrified the ladies present, was read amidst profound silence broken only by the snoring of the prisoner, who had coolly settled himself to sleep. The gens d'armes tried to rouse him from his slumber, but they merely succeeded in making him now and then fluff open his dull, brutish eyes. When the clerk had ceased to read, Pierre Granger was with difficulty thoroughly awakened, and the president proceeded to question him. The interrogatory fully revealed, in all its horror, the thoroughly stupid foolishness of the wretch. He had killed his wife, he said, because they couldn't agree; he had set his house on fire because it was a cold night, and he wanted to make a good blaze to warm himself; as to his children, they were dirty, squalling little things—no loss to him or to any one else. He would be ashamed to pursue all the details of this disgusting trial. M. Louraugain and M. Léperrier both made marvellously eloquent speeches, but the latter deserved peculiar credit, having very little of a cause to sustain. Although he well knew that his client was as thorough a scoundrel as ever breathed, and that his conviction would be a blessing to society, yet he pleaded his cause with all a lawyer's conscientiousness. When he got to the provision he made for the absence from his eyes of tears, the last and most precious, I imagine, which he carefully reserved for an especially solemn occasion—just as some families preserve a few bottles of fine old wine to be drunk at the marriage of a daughter or the coming of age of a son. At length the case closed, and the president was going to rise up; but as the heat in court was excessive, and every one present stood in need of refreshment, leave was given for the jury to retire for half an hour and the hall was cleared for the same space of time, in order that it might undergo a thorough ventilation. During this interval, while twelve of the jurors were cooling themselves with ices and sherbet, the thirteenth lighted a cigar, and, reclining in an arm-chair, smoked away with the gravity of a Turk.

"What a capital cigar!" sighed one of the jurors, as he watched, with an envious eye, the confident little clouds escaping from the smoker's lips.

"Would you like to try one?" asked the major, politely offering his cigar-case.

"If it would not trespass too much on your kindness."

"By no means. You are heartily welcome." The juror took a cigar, and lighted it at that of his obliging neighbor. "Well, how do you like it?" asked the major.

"Delicious! It has an uncommonly pleasant aroma. From whence are you supplied?"

"From Havana." Several gentlemen now approached, casting longing eyes at Major Vernor's cigar-case.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I am really grieved that I have not a single cigar left to offer you, having just given the last to our worthy friend. To-morrow, however, I hope to have a fresh supply, and shall then ask you to do me the honor of accepting some."

At that moment an official came in to announce that the court had resumed its sitting: the jury hastened to their box, and the president began his charge. Scarcely had he commenced, however, when the juror who had smoked the cigar rose, and in a trembling voice begged permission to retire, as he felt very ill. Indeed, while in the act of speaking, he fell backward, and lay senseless on the floor. The president, of course, directed that he should be carefully conveyed to his home, and desired Major Vernor to take his place. Six strokes sounded from the old clock of the town-hall as the jury retired to deliberate on their verdict in the case of Pierre Granger. Eleven gentlemen exclaimed with one voice that the wretched assassin's guilt was perfectly clear, and that they could not hesitate for a moment as to their decision. Major Vernor, however, stood up, closed his back against the door, and regarding his colleagues with a peculiarly sinister expression, said, slowly—

"I shall acquit Pierre Granger, and you shall all do the same."

"Sir," replied the foreman, in a severe tone, "you are answerable to your colleagues for your own actions, but I do not see what right you have to offer us a gratuitous insult."

"Am I then so unfortunate as to offend you?" asked the major, meekly.

"Certainly, in supposing us capable of breaking the solemn oath which we have taken to do impartial justice. I am a man of honor—"

"Bah!" interrupted the major; "are you quite sure of that?"

A general murmur of indignation arose.

"Do you know, Sir, that such a question is a harsh insult?"

"You are quite mistaken," said Major Vernor. "What I said was drawn forth by a feeling of the solemn responsibility which rests on us all. Before I can resolve to make a dead body of a living, moving being, I must feel satisfied that both you and I are less guilty than Pierre Granger, who, after all, is not so certain."

An ominous silence ensued. The major's words seemed to strike home to every breast, and at length one of the jurors said, "You seem, Sir, to regard the question from a philosophical point of view."

"Just so, Monsieur."

"You know me, then?" said the juror, in a trembling voice.

"Not very intimately, my dear Sir, but just sufficiently to appreciate your fondness for discounting bills at what your enemies might call usurious interest. I think it is about two years ago that you an honest poor man, the father of a large family, blew out his brains, in despair, at being refused by you a short renewal, and then went and implored on his knees."

Without replying M. Cerneau retired to the farthest corner of the room and wiped off the large drops of sweat which started from his brow.

"What does this mean?" inquired another juror impatiently. "Have we come hither to act a scene from the 'Memoirs of the Devil?'"

"Sir, you know this well," replied the major; "but may I advise you, Monsieur de Bardine, to calm your nerves?"

"Sir, you are impertinent, and I shall certainly do myself the pleasure to chastise you."

"As how?"

"With my sword. I shall do you the honor to meet you to-morrow."

"An honor which, being a man of sense, I must beg to decline. You shall not fight a duel against Monsieur de Bardine; you murder them. Have you forgotten your duel with Monsieur de Lilly, which took place in the Bois de Boulogne at sunrise? While he was off his guard you treacherously struck him through the heart. The prospect of a similar catastrophe is certainly by no means inviting."

With an instinctive movement M. de Bardine's neighbors drew off.

"I shall call you with virtuous indignation," sneered the major. "It especially becomes you, Monsieur Darien—"

"Major," cried another juror, "you're a villain!"

"Pardon me, my dear Monsieur Calfat, let us call things by their proper names. You, Sir, are accustomed, I believe, to be the man who himself set fire to his house six months after having insured it at treble its value in order to obtain by the conflagration enough to pay the money without making sufficient inquiry."

A stifled groan escaped from M. Calfat's lips as he covered his face with his hands.

"Who are you that you thus dare to constitute yourself our judge?" asked another, looking fiercely at Vernor.

"Who am I, Monsieur Feron? Simply one who can appreciate your motives for voting with the other court-cards in your hand, and making the dice turn up as you please."

M. Feron gave an involuntary start, and thence-forward held his peace. The scene, aided by the darkness of approaching night, had now assumed a terrific grandeur. The voice of the major, the glaring ears of eleven pale, trembling men, with a cold metallic distinctness, as if each word inflicted a blow.

"Monsieur Vernor," said Monsieur Bardine, hissing laugh. "Well, my honorable colleagues," he exclaimed, "does this poor Pierre Granger still appear to you unworthy of compassion? Do you grant you he has committed a fault, and a fault which you would not have committed for his place. He has not had the good fortune in snaking his turtsuits with a show of virtue—that was his real crime. Now if, after having killed his wife, he had paid handsomely for masses to be said for her repose—if he had purchased a burial-ground, and caused to be raised to her memory a beautiful square column, with a monument, with a flowery epitaph on it in gold letters—why, then we should all have shed tears of sympathy, and pronounced Pierre Granger the most tender husband. Don't you agree with me, Monsieur Norbec?"

M. Norbec started as if he had received an electric shock. "It is false!" he murmured. "I did not poison Eliza; she died of pulmonary consumption."

"True," said the major; "you remind me of a circumstance which I had nearly forgotten. Madame Norbec, who possessed a large fortune in her own right, died without issue five months after she had made you her sole legatee."

Then the major arose slowly. They were now in total darkness. Suddenly came the sharp click of a pistol, and the obscurity was for a moment brightened by a flash, but there was no report—the weapon had missed fire. The major burst into a long and loud fit of laughter. "Charming! delightful! Ah, my dear Sir, I'm exclaimed to the foreman, "you were the only honest man of the party; and see how, to oblige me, you have made an attempt on my person! I promote you as an honorable level with Pierre Granger!" Then, having rung the bell, he called for candles, and when they were brought, he said, turning to them, "I suppose you don't want to sleep here; let us make haste and finish our business.

Ten minutes afterward the foreman handed in the issue paper—a verdict of Not Guilty—and Pierre Granger was discharged amidst the hisses and execrations of the crowd, which indeed were prevented only by a strong military force from assaulting both judge and jury. Major Vernor coolly walked up to the dock, and, amidst the cries under that of Pierre Granger, went out with him through a side-door.

From that hour neither the one nor the other was ever seen again in Chalons. Some days after there was a terrible thunder-storm; the ripe harvest was beaten down by hailstones as large as pigeons' eggs, and a flash of lightning striking the steeple of the old ivy-covered church tore down its gilded cross.

This strange story was related to me one day last year by a convict in the infirmary of the prison of Toulon. I have given the recitals from his lips, and as I was leaving the building the sergeant who accompanied me said, "So, Sir, you have been listening to the wonderful ridiculousness of Number 19,788?"

"What do you mean? This history—"

"Is false and ridiculous, I could say. Number 19,788 is an atrocious criminal, who was sent to the galleys for life, and who during the last few months has been undergoing the most severe punishment. His monomania consists chiefly in telling stories to prove that all judges and jurors are rogues and villains. He was formerly a lawyer, by a most respectable and upright jury, of having robbed and tried to murder Major Vernor. He is now about to be placed in a lunatic asylum, and then you will probably be the last visitor who will hear his curious inventions."

"And who is Major Vernor?"

"A brave and gallant officer, who has lived at Toulon beloved and respected during the last twelve years. You will probably see him to-day, sitting at his Honor's table, after the table-d'hôte dinner at the Crown Hotel."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"PSHAW!" exclaimed Mr. Browne, contemptuously, as he flung an open letter on the hotel-table magazine. "I can't find a decent story here. Now, what are all these?"

Mrs. Browne came and sat down on the arm of her husband's chair, and her legs lord was reclining. "Those? Why, these are crochet patterns?"

"And what, pray, is crochet?" inquired Mr. Browne, "that is a pin-cushion—and there," turning over a leaf, "is another pattern, such a bother to be made don't know where to begin! I am going to get materials to borrow and commence one for the toilet-table in our spare room."

"Ah!" responded the gentleman, reflectively. "Do you happen to know how many yards of crochet-lace you have made for the spare-room since we were married?"

"Well, you know that pretty white satin one baby spoiled with chocolate."

"Curious plaything," murmured Mr. B.

"And that somewhere—under or on the pink silk one; and I began a cushion out of black velvet, but I gave it away, and I've got the beautiful crimson—"

"Where are you going, Mr. Browne?"

"Only to my writing-desk," replied that gentleman, who was already on his feet.

"Dear me, how abrupt!" ejaculated the lady, taking up her crochet-cotton and pattern, and resuming what she had tossed upon the table. Pretty soon, however, tired of the silence, she softly stole to the writing-desk, and peeping over Mr. Browne's shoulder, said, "May I see what you are writing?"

"Why, my dear, I am writing for you. Or stay, I will read it to you." And placing her on a very comfortable seat, he commenced reading:

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE PIN-CUSHION.

Although for centuries the pin-cushion has been a denizen of human habitations, and has therefore had room given to prolific in the very centre of civilization, its physiology and habits have been little noticed by naturalists. It is even the place to be assigned to it in the order of animated nature has been a matter of dispute.

Some naturalists class it with the hedge-hog, porcupine, and allied animals, on account of the fine sharp points with which instead of shedding loose spines on the approach of man, it bristles itself. Others, however, have been led to this conclusion by observing that it frequented human habitations, and chose chambers and parlors in preference for stable, and in consequence is an insect, and to class it with the spider and cockroach.

Cuvier, however, who was the first to dissect the creature, and observe with care its anatomical structure and habits, has given the latest and most correct information respecting the pin-cushion a place in the order Rodentia, or gnawing animals, between the rat and the (he says) coney.

The pin-cushion is a creature of which it may be said its habits, like its form, are subject to great variety in different climes. Individuals of the species are found in every part of the world, and in all. All, however, so far as observed, have a soft, homogeneous body, covered with short, close hair, which in such a form, tough skin, in which are set, more or less thickly, a great number of pins, some of which serve, probably, as its principal but not organs of nutrition with the world, as it has no instinctive fear of fire or locomotion. It has eyes however, of a peculiarly brilliant hue, which are placed in the centre of the head, seeking the society of the gas-fitter, and is therefore, in the opinion of many, a decidedly Intelligent animal. It is also very fond of the company of man, though it decidedly prefers that of women. It delights in the vicinity of writing-tables, or watching, or to make its nest in fashionable bonnets, or to take up its abode in any spot sacred to the memory of departed friends. Its favorite resort is the work-basket. In fact it is a domestic animal, and is rarely found in a wild state.

Its habits are in the temperate regions, and prefers cities and large towns. It has been found in the tropics, but neither Parry nor Kane make any mention of having found it in the frozen North. It is most prolific, and attains the greatest size in hotels, barbers' shops, pawn-brokers' shops, and similar places. Though notable for a wandering disposition, it is rare to find two of these habits frequented together.

The pin-cushion frequently enjoys long life. The simplicity of its internal structure preserves it from many of the ailments to which the nobler animals are subject. It is most liable to perish through severe abrasion or diminution of the external skin, to which it is exceedingly exposed. When these occur immediate aid should be conducted, as nature appears to possess no restorative power, by means of proper applications the wounded pin-cushion may be preserved, and one being taken, it will usually pass a long, contented life, partaking at last through simple old age alone.

"Dear me! Mr. Browne," exclaimed the lady as that gentleman came to a pause, "what an amount of nonsense you can write about nothing."

"Nothing! Why, I am sure I thought I had been writing about this wise animal. But if you object to calling it nothing I have no objection. Only I am hungry—I am sure that was the last—and that was before I had read my second point in the pin-cushion."

And they went down to tea.

If Mr. Browne's brain had been less prolific we should have had room to give our lady-readers some descriptions of "new styles for pin-cushions." As it is we can only say that they can scarcely fail of finding a paragraph headed "New styles for pin-cushion" if they open any popular periodical (for ladies).

It is certainly to be hoped that the following statement, which we find in the papers, is a mistake:

THE BOMBARDMENT OF VALPARAISO, CHILI, BY THE SPANISH FLEET UNDER ADMIRAL

DEZ NUNEZ, March 31, 1866.—Sketched by an Attache of the Chilean Embassy.—[See Page 309.]

MR. THOMPSON'S UMBRELLA.

"AUGUSTA, I wish you would practice Chopin's march. Mr. Thompson likes music."

Oh, how sick I was of hearing about Mr. Thompson! My poor aunt—she meant it very kindly, of course, but she little knew how she made me hate those single gentlemen whom she so wished me to please. I was an orphan, and had forty pounds a year, and my aunt's annuity died with her; so I suppose her anxiety to see me married was both commendable and natural, but to me it was dreadful. Moreover, perhaps because I was a proud girl, and perhaps, too, because I was a foolish one, the mere fact of a man, young or middle-aged—for only the old and wedded were excluded—coming to the house on my account, made him detestable in my eyes. I should not wonder if that were not the reason why I pleased none. I was said to be pretty—I may say that now, alas! it is so long ago—but plainer girls, with no greater advantages than I had, went off at a premium in the marriage market, and I found myself Augusta Raymond, unasked and unsought for. I did not care, not I. I only lamented that aunt would worry both those unfortunate gentlemen and me with vain efforts to make them a mire me, and make me like them. She was my best friend, however, and I loved her dearly. So I sat me down to the piano and played Chopin's march, and practiced for the benefit of the devoted Mr. Thompson, who was to come this evening, and who little knew, poor fellow! he had been invited to spend a week with us for the express purpose of falling in love with his second cousin's niece. I had not seen him since I was a child. He was a young man then, tall, dark, and grave, and already on the road to prosperity. He was a rich man now—at least rich for such a poor girl as I was, but he was Mr. Thompson, and I hated him; besides, he must be old, quite old.

I thought of all these things while I was playing, and then I forget them, for the divine music bore me away, and music was a passion to me.

We lived in the country, and a small but beautiful garden inclosed my aunt's cottage. It was a low one, with broad rooms; a little dark, perhaps, yet strangely pleasant. At least they seemed so to me. I dearly liked the room in which I now sat playing. It was our best room, but it was also our sitting-room. A central table was strewn with books, some of which were dear old friends, and others were pleasant and new acquaintances. Flower-stands, work-baskets, and delightful chairs, chairs made to rest or dream in, added to the attractions of this apartment. I enjoyed it very much as I played; but then, to be sure, the windows were all open, and every one gave me a glimpse of the green garden with its beds of blue sky above its budding trees, and the sweet scent of the mignonnette came in with every breath of air. Where are you now, pleasant room and green garden? The ruthless hand of man has laid you waste, and my eyes can see you no more. Is there no home for lost places, no dream-like like the Indian's hunting-ground, where the things that have once been may enjoy a shadowy existence? Are you really gone, or gone with me, save when you come back every time a woman, whose hair is turning gray, hears that grand mournful march and wishes your pleasant homeliness would seem so little akin?

"My dear! Mr. Thompson!" said my aunt's voice, as I closed the instrument. I turned round and saw him—tall, dark, grave, very little altered, and not at all old. We had expected him for dinner, and he had come for luncheon: I thought the mistake arose. As he opened the garden gate he met my aunt. They heard me playing, and stood by one of the windows to listen. When I ceased they entered the room, and it was then that, as I said, I saw him.

I did not like it at the time, but I knew it later; I liked him from that very moment. And not sure that every girl would have liked Mr. Thompson. He was decidedly good-looking, and he was both shrewd and pleasant; but he had a quaint and abrupt manner, which was apt to startle strangers. And it well, however. I liked that eccentricity which never took him too far, and that slight want of polish which gave flavor to every thing he did. I liked all, excepting his umbrella. That I detested. It was large, solid, massive, and dreadfully obtrusive. He had it in his hand on that bright, warm day, and hung on our acquaintance lasted, I never saw Mr. Thompson without it. Later, when our intimacy had progressed, I taxed him with this, "Yes," he said, good-humoredly, "I confess it is my hobby. My earliest recollection as a boy was to possess an umbrella, and my greatest happiness as a man is to go about with one."

Of course we did not speak about his umbrella on the first morning we spent together. Mr. Thompson praised my music, and, looking me full in the face, told me I played divinely. He said it without preamble, and I saw he meant it. My aunt was delighted, and I felt pleased; but somehow or other I also felt that Mr. Thompson treated me like a little girl; and so he did—not merely then, but ever afterward. Tiresome man! I had thought him old before I saw him, and I could not make him think me old now that he saw me.

Mr. Thompson did not stay a week with us, but a month. Oh, that happy month, with its long, long days and delicious evenings, and music and sweet converse! shall I ever forget it? If the wakening was bitter, let me remember that the dream was very sweet.

Mr. Thompson was to leave us next morning, and we were in the garden together. I was, for this time how I felt toward him, and, kind though he was, I dobbled if he cared much for me. And when he said, "Augusta, I have something to say to you," my heart began to beat. He used to call me Augusta now and then, having known me as a child; but never had he said it so kindly as this evening.

Ah, well! I suppose many women have to go through the bitterness which came to me then. Mr. Thompson had met my cousin Jessie at Mrs. Gray's, proposed to her, and been accepted. From the moment he mentioned Jessie's name I knew my fate.

Without seeking it, I suppose, she had ever stood between me and every good. She had taken the friendship of my best friend, the liking of my nearest relative—I was not really my aunt's niece, only her late husband's—and now she had deliberately stalked in the love of the only man I had ever cared for. Surely she was to blame in that, but oh, how hard, how very hard, it seemed to me! The nightingale sang in the trees above us, pure brilliant stars burned in the sky, the garden was full of fragrance, and Mr. Thompson went on pouring Jessie's praises in my ear. She was so handsome, so bright, so genial, and so delightfully innocent. And then no wonder he was told we all this rest! And what do you suppose he told me all this for? Why, because he wanted me to go and live with them. My aunt's health had been failing of late, and he was aware that I thought of leaving her; and now he wanted me to be sure of a home. I burst into tears.

"My dear, good child," he cried, warmly, "if I were not going away, I would not have grieved you so. You have, I know, a true, warm heart. Your dear aunt may live for years; only, if she should not, Jessie and I—"

"Pray don't!" I interrupted. I could not bear it. The more he praised me, the harder he was, the more I wept and felt miserable. At length, at my request, he left me. I grew calmer after a while, and went in.

"Do play Chopin's march for us, my dear," said my aunt. Poor dear aunt! she wanted me to fascinate him to the last. I played to my most Jessie, whom she disliked so, had been beforehand with me there.

I played it again. It was the knell of all my hopes. A gray twilight filled the room, and they could not see the tears which flowed down my cheeks. I played what they said, and I believe I did. Something from myself was in the music that evening, and that something was very sorrowful. Mr. Thompson came to the piano when I had done. The servant brought in the lights and a letter for my aunt. While she was reading it, he said, gayly:

"You will think over it."

"Pray don't," I entreated.

"But you do not know how much I like you," he insisted; "and then you will do my little beedles Jessie good—poor child darling! Besides, I have not put my request on something."

This crowned all. I guessed his meaning; he had a younger brother for whom he meant me. He had all his said so this evening in the garden. "I would do John, who was rather light, all the good in his world." I could not bear it. I rose and went up to aunt.

"What news, aunty?" I asked.

"News, indeed!" she cried, amazed. "There's Jessie going to marry my cousin, Mr. Norris, old enough to be her father. I wonder what he will do with the little flirt!"

There was a pause.

Mr. Thompson came forward. I did not dare to look at him.

"What Jessie is that?" he asked. "Surely not Miss Raymond's cousin?"

"Yes; the same. Do you know her?"

"I have seen her at Mrs. Gray's."

He spoke very calmly. I suppose he did not believe it. I pitied him; from my heart I pitied him.

"Perhaps it is not true, aunt?" I said.

"Not true! why she writes it to me herself—there's her letter."

I looked at him now. He was pale as death, but very firm. Neither troubled look nor quivering lip gave token of the emotion he must feel. Something now called my aunt out of the room.

"Augusta, may I look at it?" he asked, glancing toward the letter, which my aunt had handed to me.

I could not refuse him. I gave him the letter. He read it through with the coldness of stone, then looking for his umbrella, which he would always keep in a corner of the sitting-room, he said, very calmly:

"I think I shall go and take a walk."

And he went out, and we saw him no more till the next morning, just before he left.

My aunt was disappointed to find that Mr. Thompson had not proposed to me after all, and I was glad to be heard to express the coldness of my heart. My value had gone down with my cousin's faithlessness; mine had been at the best but a reflected light. I was liked because I was Jessie's friend.

She became Mrs. Norris soon after this. She was married from my aunt's house out of regard to Mr. Norris, who was related to her, and who disliked Miss Grey. "That busy-body" he called her, and I am afraid she was a busy-body. Jessie was very bright, and pretty, and engaging, but I teased me unmercifully about Mr. Thompson. She was sure, she said, he had made love to me, and looked at me and Jessie alternately when she spoke. But I betrayed neither his secret nor mine; and though she vexed me when she quizzed him to Mr. Norris, especially about his umbrella, I did keep silent.

"I am sure he will be married with his umbrella under his arm," she said, the evening before her own wedding. "Don't you think so?"

I did not answer her; I went out into the garden and wondered how she had changed me. Alas! I might have wondered how, without seeking it, he had charmed me.

Jessie's marriage was a blow to my aunt. She had always thought I should go off first. She was also cruelly disappointed by Mr. Thompson's indifference, and perhaps by my own. Jessie's party of my altered looks. I believe I got pale and thin just then. And I was always playing Chopin's march.

"My dear," said my aunt to me one evening, "is not that very mournful?"

"I like it, aunt," I replied; but I resolved to play it no more.

Mr. Thompson had called, "she said, with a sigh. "I wonder he did not propose to you," she added, abruptly.

I was mute.

"I wish I had never asked him here," she resumed; "I can not help thinking—"

"Don't, pray don't!" I interrupted.

She did not insist, but she made me go and sit by her. She caressed me, she coaxed me, and little by little she drew my secret from me.

"My poor darling," she said, when I had confessed all, "he may value you yet."

"No, aunt; he never will. But pray do not trouble about me. I mean to get over it, and I will."

I spoke resolutely, and my aunt praised me.

"You have always been the best of girls," she said, tenderly, "and I am glad you have had confidence in me. I shall not seem to have been blind this year; but now I will take you to the sea-side. You must have a change, my poor darling!"

She kissed me. I never knew how calm and happy I felt in that gray room, sitting by my dear aunt's side and looking at the starry sky. The nightingale was singing again as on that sad evening when I had felt so broken-hearted; tears rose to my eyes when I remembered it, and his last kindness, and my foolish cherished hopes; but the bitterness was gone from my sorrow.

"You must have a change," said my aunt again.

Alas! the change came with the morning. My aunt was late for breakfast. I went up to her room and found her calmly sleeping. But oh! too calm, too deathlike, for gentle slumbers. The kind eyes which had rested on me in love were closed, the voice which had ever spoken in praise and endearment was silenced for ever and ever.

I suppose it was not Jessie's fault that her husband was not a gentleman; but I found it very hard. Poor dear aunt, she always did mean to make a will in my favor, and she never did. Mr. Norris inherited the property I was told. He gave me the piano which had been bought for me a few other articles of no great value, and all my aunt's wardrobe. He kept her jewels. I left him one fine, and the furniture, for which, as he said truly enough, I had no use. Moreover, he allowed me to remain in the cottage till Lady-day; though perhaps, as he could not live in two houses at a time, and must pay the rent whether he lived in it or not, his was not a favor after all. And, to forgive me, I fear I was very sinful during the dark days that followed. I had some friends who did, or rather who said the best; but there was one who never came near me, who gave me no token of his existence, who had no kind word for me, who let me struggle through my hard trial, and who never offered a helping hand. He might at least have written, have consoled with me in my sorrow, but he did not. And he was in the neighborhood. He was often at Mr. Norris's house. Jessie herself told me so. True, he had business to transact with Mr. Norris, but he could have found time to do it?

He did it, and he did more. Mr. Norris was thrown off his horse one morning and brought home dead. Jessie became a widow, and a poor one, said the world. She had been not a rich man after all, and he left many debts. I only went to see her once. I found her cold, callous, and defiant under her misfortunes. I could have gone again if Mr. Thompson had not been Mr. Norris's executor. He had business to settle with the widow, and I could only suppose that Jessie could not bear to see them together. It was very wrong and very useless, but it was so. Mrs. Gray often came to see me. I think she comforted me much. She gave me a world of wearisome advice, and told me much that I would rather not have heard. What was it to me that Jessie's parents kept him so often and so late with Jessie? They were both free; and if he chose to forgive her and marry her, and if she chose to marry a poor man for money—I say it again—what was it to me?

And yet I suppose it was something after all; for when Mrs. Gray came one afternoon in February, I felt the loneliest being on this wide earth. She had harped again on that hateful string—that Mr. Thompson would be very smitten with Miss Norris.

"And what do you think, my dear?" she added; "he thought you were gone. He seemed quite surprised when I told him I had seen you on Sunday. 'What, is she not gone?' he asked—'gone to London?' 'No, indeed! What should she go to London for?' 'Why, I understood that, but from something he said, I saw he thought you were engaged to be married. 'I wish she were, poor dear!' I replied: 'for she is so young and so lonely and lovely.' I have no doubt he thinks so too, and so it is to prevent Mr. Norris from being lonely that he goes to see him so often. That is the reason, I suppose; besides, it had been snowing, and the gray sky and white garden and silent air had something both lone and dreary to it. I was not quite alone then. Early in the winter I had taken in a poor half-starved stray dog, and, though he was but a shaggy, pitiful-looking thing, he made a pet of him. He had laid by his vagrant habits willingly enough, and he now lay sleeping on the rug at my feet. Poor Carlo! I thought of the money, and thought not of the future. Yet how long could I keep him? —and if I cast him away who would have him? Mrs. Gray advised me very strongly to recommend him—nothing but his old honest heart, and who would care for that? "Poor Carlo—poor old Carlo!" I thought; and, perhaps because my heart was rather full just then, tears rose to my eyes as I thought of the kind friend by before him. I believe I thought of something else too. I remember a vision I saw in the burning coals; how it came there Heaven knows. I saw them both, as no doubt they often were, bending over accounts which they read together, then looking up and exchanging looks and words which to me could mean nothing. I wonder why I came back to images which tortured me—but it was so. I do not know how long Mrs. Gray had been gone when Carlo gave a joyful bark; the gate-bell rang; I saw a tall dark form pass across the window, and my little maid opened the door, saying:

"Mr. Thompson, ma'am."

I rose. He came in, with his umbrella as usual, and Carlo went up to him and wagged a friendly welcome. I could not say one word. I was dreadfully agitated. I felt quite sure he had come to tell me that he meant to marry Jessie, and to ask me to go and stay with them, or something of the kind. Perhaps she could have brought him. Or perhaps, as Jessie had, no doubt, told him that I was gone, he had, on learning the truth, felt ashamed of his long neglect, and had come to make some sort of excuse. He made none; but he asked how I was, took a chair, looked rather hard at me, and, without waiting for my answer, found I was not very well.

"No, I am not ill, you know," I replied, a little carelessly. "I trust you are well, Mr. Thompson."

He said he was very well, and he looked at the fire. For a while we were both silent. I spoke first. My remark was scarcely a gracious one.

"I heard you were so much engaged that I scarcely expected to see you," I said.

I was vexed with myself as soon as I had said it. He might think I was annoyed at his long absence, and, surely, I was not? But he took my implied reproach very well. He answered that he had been engaged—that he had been ought to be—but that every thing was over now. Mrs. Norris, he added, had left this morning. My heart gave a great throb; but I was silent.

"She left in no very contented mood, I believe," he resumed. "The balance in her favor was low enough when she reckoned. Mrs. Norris was something like a hundred a year. This and a few jewels constitute the net profit she derives from her husband's death. These reproaches are not to be repeated often, you see. The capital of youth and beauty has but a time—a brief one; it is apt to wear out, and Jessie seems caught in the act here. Mrs. Norris, not having found it so, is disappointed. I suppose it is natural; but you know I can afford to be generous."

I supposed not; but how all that cold, hard talk pained me.

"You have a fancy," he resumed, "that this kind lady expected some other ending to our accounts. This is not very flattering to my vanity, unless, indeed, as showing my marketable value; is it, now?"

I would not answer that question. His tone, his manner vexed me. Suddenly he raised his eyes to mine.

"Did such a rumor reach you?" he asked.

"Yes; many times. My aunt told me at home. I believe I stammered something, but I do not know what.

"Then you have heard it," he said, looking scarcely pleased; "the world is very kind. And you believed it, too! I had hoped you knew me better."

He rose hastily, and I felt that he spoke coldly, which was not dead yet, and I bade him speak.

Was I asleep or dreaming? Mr. Thompson spoke of my aunt, but he did not say how he loved her position, and expressed the strongest wish to take care of me.

"But," he added, with some hesitation, "I can do so but in one fashion—as your husband. Will you overlook all those peculiarities in my temper, which I fear you have seen, and take what there is of true and good in me? Can you, will you, do this?"

I looked at me in doubt. Ah! this was one of my bitterest moments. He cared so little for me that he had never seen, never suspected, how much I loved him, that he expected me to take him so. I clasped my hands and twisted them nervously; I could not speak at once.

"Do you, Mr. Thompson," I said, at last, "and you—"

"Well, what about me! Do you mean, can I, too, do this?"

"Yes; can you do it?"

"Why, surely—else I had never proposed it."

He knit rather at the doubt my question implied, and he looked at me as he smiled. Both look and smile exasperated me.

"Mr. Thompson," I said, excitedly, "I have not deserved this. Carlo, come here."

My poor shaggy Carlo came forward, wagging his tail. I put my hand on his head, and looked up at me wistfully and fondly, as only dogs can look when they vainly seek to read the meaning of a human face.

"He was an outcast," I said, looking at Mr. Thompson; "he was starving; he came to this house, I took him, and he saved me. I had a fresh pity on him—I gave him a mat to lie on and a crust to eat. He loves me for it; but, Mr. Thompson, I am not a dog, and I will not be taken up from your beast's level—I can take care of myself."

Mr. Thompson threw himself back in his chair, and uttered a surveyed whistle as I made this free commentary upon his proposal.

"Well, well," he said, recovering slowly, "I am convinced that you should not care for me, but I did not expect you would take it so."

"And how could I take it?" I cried. "You give me—I need not pity. Ah, Mr. Thompson, if I were not the poor, forlorn girl I am, would you feel or speak so? You think I do not know much girls are wooed and won? If you cared an atom for me, would you dare to come to me with such language?"

"What language?"

"What did you mean by taking care of me?"

"I said, Yes, I would. I wish to take care of you—true, fond, loving care; nothing shall make me uneasy it."

He spoke gently, and a manly glow rose to his face; but I would not give in, and I said, angrily, that I did not want to be taken care of.

"Do let us drop these unlucky words," he entreated; "and do tell me whether you will marry me—Yes or No. Let it be, if you like, that I want you to take care of me. I am much older than you are, you know."

I don't know what possessed me. I said "No." Oh! how I would have liked to recall the word, but it was spoken, and he rose with a clouded and disappointed face. He lingered a little, and asked me why it was No and not Yes? I said we could not be happy together. He bowed gravely and left me. I thought he was hurt, for he did not add a word. No assurance of friendship, of good-will, not even hope that I would relent or change my mind, passed his lips. The door closed upon him. I heard the garden gate fall to, and I felt in a sort of stupor. It was over. What madness had made me banish him? Every day took him away further from me—never—never again should we meet. Perhaps he would write. He left me then, if I could have spoken the truth. Ah! if I could have said to him:

"I can not be happy with you because I love, and you do not! because my love and your pity would suffer all day long if I were your wife; because it is easier to do without you than to have you on these terms." If I could have said all this, would our meeting have ended thus? It was too late to think of that now, but it was not too late to suffer. I leaned my face in the pillow of the couch on which I was sitting, and cried and sobbed as if my heart would break.

Poor Carlo's cold nose thrust in the hand which hung down by my side in the folds of my dress roused me. I looked up and saw Mr. Thompson. He was very red, and seemed flurried.

"I have forgotten my umbrella," he said, a little nervously.

Yes, there it was, in the corner, that horrible umbrella of his! But instead of going to look for it he suddenly came and sat down on the couch by me. I do not know how I looked, but I felt ready to die with shame. He took my hand and kissed it.

"My dear Miss Raymond," he said, persuasively, "why should we not be happy together? I can not bear to give you up, indeed I can not."

I looked at him in doubt.

"Then do you really like me?" I asked.

"Do I like you? Why, what else have I been saying all along?"

"You said you wanted to take care of me."

"Oh, if you are only sorry to be—" he began, resignedly. But we did not go back to that; we went back to nothing, for a miserable girl suddenly became the happiest of women. Still I was not quite satisfied.

"You would not have come back if it had not been for that horrible umbrella of yours," I said, with a little jealousy.

"Very true," he replied, with his peculiar smile; "but I did come back, and I glanced in through the window first, and saw you hiding your face on that cushion, and Carlo looking at you as if he thought it strange you should be so forlorn; and so I came in for my umbrella; and, to tell you the truth, I had forgotten it on purpose."

Perhaps he only said it to please me; but as I looked in his face I did not think so then; and, though years have passed over us both, I do not think so now.

SEED-SOWING.

I.

MR. LINKLETTER perceived in Amelia—a dawning lady of sixteen—a growing interest when questions of love and matrimony were under discussion. Mr. Linkletter had loved and lost. Not being lost in the beautiful way that leaves a sweet and tender pain behind, but loved and lost in a bitterly practical and unsentimental way. I should put it plainer if I said that, life being viewed as a vast gamblingtable and matrimony a lottery, he had staked his love—and had won. He had suffered, as a rule, profoundly; and his experience he knew to be worth more than untold gold, if its lessons would but be turned to the young and fervent-hearted. Little Amelia was one such. Mr. Linkletter was thrown frequently into her society, and, wishing to sow good seed and not bear, he had striven to keep her esteem by listening with every indication of interest to her callow prattle about beaux and the sort of thing. He found his opportunity to speak words of warning and wisdom to Amelia.

One day, discovering that she believed to him with high sentimental interest, he suffered himself to talk at such length as this:

"You think you love, do you, Amelia? Perhaps you do. I can't tell. But let me whisper this secret to you: girls of your age do not often love profoundly, nor quite wisely concerning their own hearts. How should a little lass whose mind is immature—wholly in the formation state still—be able to tell the difference between a girlish fancy and the time will wear away, and that true love which sinks deep into the soul, and knows no change nor death till the grave covers the heart in which it lies buried. It would not be fair to expect that of her. Love is a thing that can not die. It is nonsense for any one to say that a person, having once been conscious to love, that love changes, that it cools or deadens, that the lover becomes tired of his sweet-heart. Impossible! 'Love once is to love forever.'"

"This kind of love, Amelia, does not often take up its dwelling-place in the heart of a girl of sixteen or a boy of eighteen. Not but that it may and can, but that it hardly ever does. When it does there is something rarely exceptional about it. If I were to say what I thought was the most sad of which the impulses of the heart may be relied on as a safe index, I should place it somewhere beyond the age of twenty-five, for either sex. For men, perhaps later. Men's minds usually do not mature in the direction of the emotions so early as women's do. When a man or woman seriously 'falls in love' (as folks say) at the age of twenty-six or seven, or upward, it is pretty sure to be a true passion, which can not be destroyed. If it is a false one it will pass away speedily. But to really love at that age, and to marry, is to be happy."

Feeling himself getting into deep waters, Mr. Linkletter paused.

"Are people always happy who marry when they are twenty-six or seven?" asked Amelia, with charming simplicity.

"There!" said Mr. Linkletter, "I wanted just such a question, Amelia, to help me out. No; don't let any such absurdity as that get before your eyes, and blind them to the truth. We are talking—"

Mr. Linkletter perhaps forgot that he was himself doing the talking.

"We are talking, you must bear in mind, about love. Now the world is full of people who don't marry for love, and don't pretend to. They marry for wealth, or for convenience, or for pride; some marry for hate. That these marriages are unhappy is to be expected, and is nothing to the fair. But when people marry, as they suppose, for love, they certainly ought to be happy. Now here's the thing in a nutshell. If it is true, they usually will be happy—they must be (and I positively assert that a true and noble love can never die). All eighteen they are fascinated by judging in this matter; at say twenty-six or seven they are capable, if they ever are. So if a girl of sixteen thinks she loves, there is no certainty that she does love—she is terribly liable to be mistaken about it. But if a woman of twenty-five thinks she loves, it is pretty certain to be so. I have known fifty cases of marriages for love (so supposed) at eighteen, and they all proved ill-assorted and miserable ones. Now for the end and result of this sermon, Amelia," Mr. Linkletter smiled, "is this—that marriages contracted between persons who would be sure of proving unhappy. You are young; the opposite sex is peculiarly attractive to you; your heart feels the need to love, and requires only its victim, as the poets say, for an object to cling to, is quite as likely to cling to the wrong object as to the right one. Then step to think how many more than a hundred young men you see it is barely possible the one exists in whom your heart will find that perfect, ideal love that will rise to you through life, isn't there a grave danger that you, in your determination to love somebody, will love—or seem to love—the wrong one? Now fancy for an instant that you are married to one of these youths at the age of seventeen; a few years—say, a few months—away from you is that your love will be the same? Is time it dies; you may find some 'surcease of sorrow' in the new and different love you give to your child—but you feel that that is not the true love which you bear your husband. This is mournful, but, alas, how many go through life, and, if they find you may know nothing worse than the mere 'dreariness of emptiness' herein! But suppose the worst happens—suppose, when you become one by, and you are twenty-seven, you chance to meet the man you should have married—what then? Ah, that is the terrible thing! But what help is there for you now? It is too late!—too late! You are bound about by other ties, which must not and can not be broken! You look back on your past life, and see wherein you erred, and that you must bear the consequences of your error through life. You can do nothing—nothing, for Heaven to help you carry your weary load."

Mr. Linkletter bowed his head on his hand, thinking I know not what thoughts. Pray God they spring from his silence that he was done, stole out of the room. He heard the door close behind her, and raised his head but to see. So add the further word he would have said: bidding the young girl beware of becoming bewitched by the mere senses, and of fading the step into the night some day and was beyond all setting right.

However, he believed he had sown good seed; and he lighted a cigar and went to his office.

II.

I HAVE a love-scene to describe. Gather round me, young ladies. It is bona fide.

Scene, a pretty parlor. Time, evening. Window—curtains down. Gas—lighted.

A young man of perhaps twenty-one was kneeling at the feet of a beautiful girl with warm brown eyes and flowing curls.

That a young man of respectable parentage should kneel on the floor at the feet of a young lady of equally respectable parentage, in the midst of a civilized community, in the State of New York and in the year 1862, is an absurdity, I freely admit. But in that strangely positive girl Charley Christie find himself on the evening in question, and Kate M'Call looked down upon him not unkindly while he so accounted.

"Kate," said the young man, "won't you say yes? You must say one or the other to-night, and you know that you have pronounced the simple word that fatal word before."

"Oh, Charley, how can I?" said little Miss, seventeen to a day, and very impressible. "What would father and mother say?"

"They would refuse, I suppose. I'm sure they would. Your father likes me. Do say yes!"

Poor Kate was in a quandary. It was a trying position for a girl of her romantic nature, to sit there and witness such a handsome fellow as Charley Christie, with such sweet whiskers, kneeling at her feet with his earnest, up-looking eyes, and begging her to "say yes."

All that "yes" meant, being said, was that she would marry Charley the next day, privately.

"Oh dear, I am afraid, Charley!"

"You love me, Kate?"

"Yes, indeed, I think I do. But I should be so afraid, when I go home to Penville again, and had to tell father and mother what I had been doing. I—I think I had better not."

"You refuse me, Kate?" said the young man, in deep distress.

"No—not exactly. But yes—you must let me have time to think of it a little."

"You're not going to tell any one?"

"Oh, no, Charley!"

"Then when will you give me an answer?"

"Why, you are so sudden, Charley. Give me till day after to-morrow."

"So long as that, Kate?"

"That is not so very long. I will give you an answer day after to-morrow."

Having said so much, Kate felt a great relief, and this helped her in sticking to her point.

So Charley got off his knees without having heard her "say yes," thus violating his own terms.

Kate was at this time visiting her grandparents in this city. Young Christie, as an old acquaintance in Penville, had been permitted to escort her about to places of amusement, and a week of unimportant evenings in her company had brought the youth to his present pass.

The next day Kate went to a tea-party given at Amelia Marsfield's, and there she met that queer old fellow, Mr. Linklatter—a man past thirty-five, but not a bad-looking gentleman!

Mr. Linklatter was pleased with Kate's ingenuous face and soft eyes, and talked with her a good deal. Kate thought he was much wiser in that character, if any, I never asked him; nor whether he had any opportunities that he ought not to have neglected. Kate was fifteen.

While he sat talking with Kate in the parlor after tea he was suddenly hailed across the room by Mrs. Gossop, a pretty widow of twenty-five, with the exclamation:

"Mr. Linklatter, what is this heresy? Amelia says you think she is not in love the other day that no one could love till they were twenty-six or seven years old."

"Me?" said Mr. Linklatter, blushing deeply at finding his private seed-sowing thus being converted into a spectacle for a roomful of ladies. "Why, I did not say that. What would be an absurdity."

"Why yes you did, Mr. Linklatter!" cried Amelia, turning on him with a look of much astonishment.

But Mr. Linklatter shook his head. Alas, he would have been glad to hold his tongue, but they would not let him.

"Then what did you say?" asked Amelia, a little piqued.

"Yes, what did you say, Mr. Linklatter?" put in Mrs. Gossop.

"I said—I—I—that is—"

"Don't mind. Why did he stammer so?—and blush so? He asked himself why, and got no answer from himself.

"I said—I—that is to say: It is one thing to sit in a rocking-chair twiddling your watch-key, and calmly and deliberately uttering sentiments which you judge for the private and especial behoof of a single young lady auditor in whom you feel a kindly interest; and it is another thing to have a chorus of female voices pounce upon a withdrawn sort of a cross-question of, 'What did you say?' Say it again, Sir. Repeat your words, Sir. Let us know what all this means.'"

"Amelia," said Mr. Linklatter, gravely, endeavoring to recover his calmness, "do you soberly say that I said no one under this one could love till they were twenty-six or seven years old? Is that what I said?"

"Yes," said Amelia, who innocently believed herself to be stating the gist of Mr. Linklatter's whole argument; "I know you said so, Mr. Linklatter, for I heard you, and I don't forget so easily."

"It is impossible I should have uttered such an absurdity, child," said Mr. Linklatter, a little warmer—stumbling over what he was; "why not say twenty-six years and three months? A statement of that kind is absurd."

Amelia was confounded, but obstinate.

Mr. Linklatter grew more cool.

"I will try and tell you what I did say, ladies," said he, finally, "if—I advanced, in general terms, the principle that love, as between the sexes, was a sentiment that could not well exist in persons who were breed. A girl of eighteen or a young man of twenty is not likely to be capable of judging wisely concerning that which is to be a question of strong hold upon his or her heart; and although it may be a true love, the probabilities are a hundred to one that it is not the love which will endure forever, and bless the life of the pair. I said, that at twenty-five or upward, one is not likely to be mistaken in the matter; that at the younger age one is very likely to be. Marriages contracted at so early an age prove almost always unhappy. Such marriages are, as a general rule, in a sort of panics—are often born of the moment—and two foolish children may bind themselves in a weak, blind hope, and succeed only in tying all the rest of their lives. I deem it the most dreadful danger (6 which our young people are exposed, the facility with which private marriages are performed in this State. The clergyman who will thus marry two big babies ought to be thrashed; but there are in this city plenty of clergymen who will do it."

Mr. Linklatter, having thus strayed a little aside from his proper theme, suddenly made a faint effort to return to it, and concluded:

"As a general principle, the child that walks into a pond will be drowned; and, as a general principle, the child under twenty who ventures the untried waters of matrimony will be sorry they had not waited till old enough to swim."

Here Mr. Linklatter paused in a miserable state of dissatisfaction with himself.

And as he went to his room that night he muttered to himself:

"I am almost resolved to register an oath, like the man in the farce, that I will never undertake to do a difficult thing in a service again. The fate of that hasty little Amelia getting no more good than that out of my sermon the other day! I am dumpled to have made bad sowing a humbug."

Don't, Linklatter, my friend. That would be rash and false.

Let me whisper to you that brown-eyed Kate M'Call took into her heart the seeds you dropped while in the parlor, as a flower drinks the dew it needed that very hour. She left the house that night wiser and stronger than she entered it—all through you.

Charley Christie, if he had waited on his knees for Kate's "I Yes," would have staid in that position till this day. For Kate said "No."

Inside of six months Charley Christie found another flame, and Kate M'Call was as nothing to him. She is still at home in Penville—still under twenty-five—still beautiful, and growing more loveable every year. Who marries her for love his heart will be made glad.

And some fell upon a rock; and as soon as it was sprung up it withered away, because it lacked moisture.

"And some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprang up with it and choked it.

"And other fell on good ground."

There is always good ground somewhere. Let us not weary, Linklatter.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A GUARDED ACCOUNT OF IT.—A man asked the cause of his father's death, answered that, "while he was addressing a large religious assemblage of people, who were listening to his remarks with the deepest interest, a portion of the platform on which he was standing gave way beneath him, whereby he was precipitated several feet with such violence as to break his neck." His father was hung.

"May you?" was the reply. "You may."
For you come politely,

Not with a mute, and a shall, and a will,
But pleasantly, orderly, neat, and still.
Crowing permission with 'Stay?'
So, May, you may come and stay."

WARNING TO MEDDLERS.—Meddling with others somebless brings us into scrapes, and travelers one of the elders of a certain church used to say, "and, worse." A young fellow entered the church and took his seat, keeping his hat on. The elder, noticing it, requested him to take it off. His request not being complied with, he spoke to the young man a second time, and seeing he still refused, the elder gently lifted the hat off, when, to his chagrin, out rolled a pack of dice, which the young man had taken from one accustomed with decorum. "Man," quietly said the youth, "see what you have done!"

WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE, M.P.

GLADSTONE.

Upon the death of Lord PALMERSTON it became evident that the duties of leader in the English House of Commons must devolve upon Mr. GLADSTONE, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Many misgivings were felt as to his fitness for so responsible a position. There was no question, of course there could be none, as to his ability; but it was doubted whether he possessed the necessary discretion, tact, and command of temper—qualities which had been so characteristic of his predecessor. Mr. GLADSTONE has thus far been fully equal to the occasion, and for judgment and prudence, as well as for pre-eminent ability, he stands to-day the first of English statesmen.

The Right Honorable WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE, the fourth son of the late Sir JOHN GLADSTONE, Bart., was born at Liverpool, December 29, 1809. He graduated at Oxford in 1831. Shortly after his election as member of Parliament for Newark, in 1832, Sir ROBERT PEEL appointed him to a junior Lordship of the Treasury, and two months later to the post of Under-Secretary for Colonial Affairs. Together with his ministerial leader GLADSTONE soon retired from office and remained in the Opposition until PEEL's return to power in 1841. He was then sworn a member of the Privy Council, having accepted the Vice-Presidency of the Board of Trade. In this position it became his duty to explain and defend in the Lower House the commercial policy of the Government. The revision of the British tariff in 1842 was almost entirely the result of his energy and industry. In 1847 he was chosen the colleague of Sir ROBERT HARRY INGLIS as member for the University of Oxford. He could not unite thoroughly with the High Church and Tory party, and he refused to accept office under the short-lived ministry of the Earl of DERBY in 1852. He was, however, returned that year by the University of Oxford, though not without a sharp contest. His influence more than that of any other man contributed to the early dissolution of the DERBY administration and the succession of the Earl of ABERDEEN. Under the latter he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. Lord PALMERSTON took the Government in 1855, and in a few weeks Mr. GLADSTONE resigned on account of a difference with the ministry in regard to the conduct of the Crimean war. He still continued to give the PALMERSTON ministry his support, and in June, 1859, he resumed the Chancellorship of the Exchequer, which office he has since retained. In the late elections he failed to be returned to Parliament by the University of Oxford, and now sits as a member for Lancashire.

As an author Mr. GLADSTONE is chiefly known by two works—that on Church and State and his work on the Homeric Poems. The former was the subject of one of Lord MACAULAY's critical essays in the Edinburgh Review.

As a statesman Mr. GLADSTONE strictly belongs to no party. He is as conservative as he is liberal. Without the popularity of JOHN BRIGHT among the British masses, he yet inspires general confidence in all classes of society. In his late acute work upon England LOUIS BLANC says, that the peculiarity of GLADSTONE's mind, which gives him often a hesitating tone in speech and a real reluctance in action, is his exquisite sense of justice, which shows him how much is to be said upon both sides of a question.

A FEARFUL CRASH.

IN Hartford, Connecticut, there occurred on the morning of May 2 a singular accident, which we illustrate in the accompanying engraving. The Hartford Courant of May 5 thus describes the affair:

About 2 o'clock Wednesday morning the north wall of the building known as the City Bindery, near the corner of Trumbull and Pearl streets, fell with a loud crash which startled many of the inhabitants of that vicinity from their slumbers as though it had been an earthquake. The earth had been removed to such an extent to make room for the new building about to be erected by CASE, LOCKWOOD, & CO., that the heavy rains of Tuesday probably started the foundation—hence the accident. The upper story was occupied by CASE, LOCKWOOD, & CO. for bindery purposes, the stories below by O. D. CASE & CO., and others. Owing to the lateness of the hour we were unable to ascertain the extent of the damage done, but the loss will amount to thousands of dollars. It is fearful to think what might have been, had the accident occurred a few hours later, as there are upward of two hundred males and females employed in the building. It seems a providential escape for them.

We mentioned briefly Wednesday morning the fall of the north wall of the City Bindery building on Trumbull Street. In digging a cellar for a new building to be erected by CASE, LOCKWOOD, & CO., on the site of the old jail, workmen went so close to the bindery and under its wall that the violent rain of Tuesday night washed away the remaining foundation, and the wall tumbled with a tremendous crash. A party will running east and west through the building saved the south half from destruction.

The south wall of this structure is standing, and it is said that some of the employés of the establishment who came across the Park yesterday morning entered the building before discovering that any thing had happened. The total loss can not, of course, be exactly settled upon; it will amount probably to over fifty thousand dollars.

O. D. CASE & CO., publishers, conducted their business in the third floor. They had 2000 volumes of GREELEY'S "American Conflict," Vol. I., all ready for delivery; 1500 volumes of JUDGE HENRY MAYER'S "Four Years in Secession;" a quantity of MITCHELL'S Outline Maps. Their loss can not at present be known.

CASE, LOCKWOOD, & CO., in the two upper stories and attic, had 5000 volumes of "Anecdotes of the Rebellion," a part ready for delivery to the Hartford Publishing Company, besides a quantity in various stages of forwardness; selling price $4 a volume.—These will not be a total loss. They also had 15,000 volumes of GREELEY'S "Conflict" in the bindery works for O. D. CASE & CO., selling price $4 to $7 a volume. They were also getting out a quantity of Cottage Bibles, and forty different school-books, on a contract for 30,000, in part already delivered, prices ranging from 75 cents to $3 a volume.

FALL OF THE CITY BINDERY OF O. D. CASE & CO., HARTFORD, CT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY PRESCOTT, HARTFORD, CT.]

BURNING OF CHURCHES IN PETERSBURG.

IN Petersburg, Virginia, where there is said to be, generally, on the part of the citizens, a good feeling toward the freedmen, there is yet enough left of the old barbarism of slavery to incite to the wanton destruction of churches for no other reason than that they are frequented by colored people.

At about 2 A.M. on the morning of May 1 flames were discovered issuing from the Sunday-school of the Union Street (colored) Methodist Church. This room was a separate building, standing a few feet distant from the main body of the Church. Upon the alarm being given the firemen quickly repaired to the spot and succeeded in saving the church, but the school-room was entirely destroyed.

About two hours after this conflagration the alarm was again sounded, and the new African Baptist Church on Harrison Street was found to be on fire, which, notwithstanding the earnest endeavors of the fire department, burned to the ground, the flames having gained a great headway before being discovered.

During the progress of these fires attempts were made to burn two other African churches, the old African on Harrison Street, now used as a school-room, and the Gillfield, quite a handsome edifice on Gill Street. The destruction of these buildings has inflicted a wanton and undeserved injury upon the colored people.

The Petersburg Daily Index, commenting on these fires, says:

If the guilty parties imagined that they would find the faintest shadow of approval of their villainy in the sympathy of this community, they have been woefully deceived. In no part of Virginia, or of the South, does a better feeling exist between the whites and blacks. With exceptions too trifling for mention, the demeanor of the colored people in Petersburg has been all that could be desired, and the commendation of their general conduct has been unstinted. But if they had been as riotous as they have been order-by, if they had been as troublesome as they have been if well behaved, such a method of retaliation as this, if it were so designed, would meet the unqualified reproach of our people.

FIRES AT PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA—RUINS OF THE COLORED BAPTIST CHURCH ON HARRISON STREET.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY LAZELLE & M'MULLEN, PETERSBURG, VA.]

If such things are possible where so good a feeling exists toward the colored people, what treatment may they the latter expect in quarters where it is known that they are the objects of intense and unrelenting hatred?

"MUSTERED OUT" COLORED VOLUNTEERS.

"STANDING before the office of Colonel PAGE, Quarter-master," says our artist, from whose sketch we have engraved the picture on page 308, "the scene which I have sketched was very interesting, occasioned by the meeting of 'mustered out' colored troops with their wives and friends at Little Rock, Arkansas. Just in from Duvall's Bluff, where they had been stationed, their landing created a fury among the resident colored females, many of whom, I am afraid, were disappointed in not meeting those whom they expected. Others rushed into the arms of their husbands with an outburst of uncontrollable affection. Ceremonious introductions between comrades and wives displayed a degree of politeness quite commendatory to all the parties concerned. Children are about with bundles of blankets or knapsacks for their papas, or begged the privilege of carrying a gun for some able warrior, and all in all it was a good humor with the exception of those who missed the faces of their husbands or brothers."

THE BILLS.

HEAR the Tradesmen with their bills—
Scrivened bills!
What a world of misery their very look instills!
Here they bother, bother, bother,
All the day and half the night!
As first one and then another
At our well-rings, to smother
Our pecunious delight;
Keeping time, time, time,
In a sort of Dun-ic rhyme
To the tick which erst they promised, but which now their presents blow sublime.
Bills, bills, bills, bills, bills,
Bills, bills, bills—
With the wrangling and the tangling of their bills!

* * * * *

Read the contents of the bills—
Itemed bills!
What a world of bankrupt thoughts in every entry bills!
On our sleepless couch at night,
How in silver will affright
At the melancholy menace we can't shun!
For every boy that brings
The abominable things
Is a dun.
And the people—ah, the people—
They that conspire to heap ill—
Every one—
And who gaining, gaining, gaining—
A mercury crew—
Feel a glory in so draining
From our pockets every sou—
They are Grocers, they are Bakers,
They are Tailors, Mantua-makers,
They are Jews;
And their vile Collector runs;
And he duns, duns, duns,
For payment of the bills!
And his merry bonum thrills
With the pain's' of the bills!
And he bozzes and he swills;
Keeping time, time, time,
In a sort of Bacchanal rhyme
To the payin' of the bills—
Of the bills:
Keeping time, time, time,
In a sort of drunken rhyme,
To the robbing of the bills—
Of the bills, bills, bills—
To the fobbing of the bills;
Giving very little time
As he drills, drills, drills
In a harpy Dun-ic rhyme
For the payment of the bills—
Of the bills, bills, bills—
No delayment of the bills,
Of the bills, bills, bills,
Bills, bills, bills—
Of the owing and outgoing of the bills.

RECONSTRUCTION.

It is reported on good authority that President Johnson met his Cabinet on the 80th of April, to consult with the members on the report submitted by the Committee of Fifteen. It is said that, with a single exception, all the members declared themselves entirely satisfied with it. Secretary Seward was not present. The President was asked if he would veto the bill, and he replied in the negative, and declared himself against all conditions whatever. The exception was represented to be that the Southern States, in the shape of amendments to the Constitution, by the proper action of the Legislatures, should have it under the Constitution no State could be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. The President says he can conscientiously ought to be at once admitted into the respective States, as he proposed, and the Union restored. He was for a rigid adherence to the Constitution as it is, and, as the Constitution had provided no amendment to meet a terrible rebellion, he thought that the Government could be restored without a resort to new legislation. He said, in general terms, that if the organic law is to be changed at all, it should be done when all the States had and can people can participate in the alteration.

THE CAPTURE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

It appears from the records of the Treasury Department that, while the escape and capture of the President of the rebellion were the chief events which occupied the attention of the country, the Government Wilson says that Lieutenant-Colonels Hardwick and Pritchard were assisting in civil and military affairs and activity with which they conducted the pursuit, and that it is to their energy and skill more than to any other person that they were ignorant of the report of the time of the capture. Colonel Pritchard says he was at the time of the capture, and distinguish the uniform. He was also that he could not have been in the dress of a woman. In the course of his narrative, Colonel Pritchard says that the camp was accosted by Davis from among the prisoners, who asked if I was the officer in command; and upon my answering him that I was, he inquired what I was to call him, he replied that I might call him what it was—I replied that I should call him Davis. I would call him Davis; and upon a moment's hesitation he said that was the name. Then he called his children by their with true royal dignity, and exclaimed: 'I suppose you consider it a great feather in your cap to capture women and children; but it is theft and Vandalism!'" Nothing is said in the narrative about his being disguised.

OUR FINANCIAL CONDITION.

The last of May public debt statement from the Treasury Department shows a reduction in the gross debt of $15,505,875 since April 1; the funded gold-bearing debt of 1867 increased $6,000,000; the gold-bearing 5-20 legal tenders decrease $7,000,000; the deposits in the Treasury, including $9,000,000 of gold, amount to about $54,000, while the cash on hand to pay them off amounts to $137,000,000, of which $76,000,000 is gold. The amount of this gold belonging absolutely to the Treasury is $61,000,000, the amount belonging to the certificate holders. The whole reduction since last summer, when the war debt reached its maximum, is $400,000,000.

GENERAL SHERIDAN BEFORE THE RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

We make the following abstract from the evidence submitted by General Sheridan to the Reconstruction Committee containing his department:

Q.—What are now the feelings of those who took part in the rebellion, as manifested within your limits toward the General Government? A.—I believe they accept the situation, and have an earnest desire for the restoration of perfect Union, but exhibit, at the same time, an unmistakable desire for glorification.

Q.—What has been the effect of the unstinted exercise of the pardoning power upon such persons? A.—It has given them more friendly or otherwise toward the Federal Government? A.—I have noticed no particular change in sentiment on account of the clemency of the Executive.

Q.—What would be the effect of withdrawing, upon the State organization, if the people were left without control to act for themselves? A.—I believe they would quarrel among themselves, and that the sensible and substantial people would regret the absence of the military force.

Q.—Are the offices of the State now in the hands of loyal or disloyal men? A.—A very large number of the offices of the State are in the hands of returned Union-Confederate soldiers and other active participants in the rebellion; I am unable to say what their actual sentiments are in reference to the General Government, but think their outspoken sentiments good to some extent. I have not the best policy in order to hold the office: I have seen those high in authority in a translation state for the same reason.

Q.—What are regarded as the chief recommendations for offices, and what sort of persons would be elected without any outside influence? A.—The inclination to glorify rebellion gives those who were active participants in it the preference of election by the people or appointment by those in power.

Q.—What would be the condition of the loyal men if they were left without any protection by the Federal Government? A.—My impression is that the power they would feel unsafe, and many of them leave the country.

Q.—Your opinion is to be governed by the constitutions of a military force in your department, and your views of the duties of the Freedmen's Bureau? A.—I maintain a military force in my division for the following reasons: The Freedmen's Bureau is necessary to protect the people, and to give an actual and moral support to the Freedmen's Bureau in the work out his social system. I also believe its presence necessary to prevent quarreling among the white people themselves.

Q.—What is your opinion as to the necessity and expediency of the Freedmen's Bureau? A.—The Freedmen's Bureau gives that security to the freedman which arises from his having some one to look after and watch his interests. A change might be made by appointing an Inspector-General of Freedmen, with subordinates, whose distinct Inspectors, under charge of the Department Commander, which would be much more economical; but it would be imposing duties on the military which I do not recommend, as I think it should be kept entirely separate to do with civil affairs.

Q.—What would be the condition and fate of the freedman if left without protection under the exclusive control of the State governments? A.—The freedman would be a great deal of trouble. A large number of the people would be in need field for some time. Many of the freedmen who would not; and a war of races to some extent would probably be the result.
